Toronto's Kiever Congregation has commissioned local composer Charles Heller to translate into English his song cycle Letters from Bozena for an upcoming performance at that downtown synagogue as part of Holocaust Education Week.

Letters from Bozena is a musical work for soprano, viola and piano. Heller based the work on a series of letters written by his Czech grandmother, Bozena, to her son Otto in England. Heller found the letters in his mother's house after the latter died in 2006.

His grandmother, Bozena Hellerova wrote the letters in German in 1939 and 1940 after learning that Otto, who had mysteriously disappeared, had taken a flight to London just before the Nazis invaded Czechoslovakia. "He flew on an impulse to get out of Europe, and that's how he escaped," Heller said. "If he hadn't gotten out within hours, he would have been trapped."

Tragically, almost everyone else in the family – 17 relatives in all – perished in Theresienstadt and Auschwitz.

Bozena, however, died in 1940 before the Nazis could murder her. Her letters describe the growing tension and fear of that tragic period, and are suffused with a mother's hopes and prayers for a better future for the refugee survivors.

Since they were written in a difficult, old-fashioned German script, it took Heller several years to decipher them, and then only with the help of experts in Europe. But once he was able to read them, he was amazed at the almost musical rhythm of his grandmother's prose.

"It's as if she wrote them with music on her mind," he said. "I realized when reading them that even though they are just ordinary letters, they would create something special if set to music."

Heller's parents met and married in London, England, where he was born. He has been living in Canada for 35 years and was choir director of Beth Emeth Congregation for 30 of those years. He now composes and arranges cantorial music and has written a book on Jewish music, What To Listen For in Jewish Music, which was published several years ago.

Heller said that while he was writing Letters from Bozena, he had the peculiar feeling that he was somehow giving his late grandmother a new kind of existence. "It reminds me of what we say in the memorial prayers," he said. "In the K'el Male Rachamim, it says, 'K'zohar harakia', the dead souls shine like a light in the sky."

The German version of Letters from Bozena premiered in London in 2010 with Duo Bohemia featuring renowned Israeli violist Rivka Golani.

The English version is due to be performed at the Kiever Synagogue, 25 Bellevue Ave., Toronto, on Nov. 10 at 2 p.m., with soprano Stacie Carmona, Bram Goldhamer on piano and Barry Shiffman on viola.

The concert is free and just one of many events being offered as part of Holocaust Education Week (HEW), Nov. 3 to 9, with additional pre-HEW and post-HEW events as well. For details, please visit http://holocaustcentre.com.

Cellist straddling two musical worlds

Jordana Divon
Special to The CJN

Cellist Matt Haimovitz is used to playing in some pretty unconventional spots, but perhaps none quite as intimate as the last place he performed a brief interlude in B-minor.

"I was flying from San Francisco to New York a few weeks ago," he explained on the phone. "I was really tired and I was sleeping most of the flight, and when I woke up, the stewardess said, 'Oh, the captain is a classically trained pianist and is excited you're on the plane. Would you play a concert for us?'"

Naturally, he complied.

"She put the handset to the cello for the broadcast. It was surreal to be up in the air that high and play some music and just hear the strains of Bach."

When he heads to Toronto's Koerner Hall on Nov. 5 to play the cello solo in Ernest Bloch's Schelomo (Hebraic Rhapsody), the venue will be a little larger, but the Israeli-born virtuoso's commitment to performance will be no less intense.

"I'm looking forward to it," he said of the program that will be conducted by Maestro Marco Parisotto and backed by the Ontario Philharmonic as part of the Moordale Concerts series. "Koerner Hall is one of the great halls in Canada, so I'm excited to play there."

Composed during Bloch's "Jewish Cycle," Schelomo is a gorgeously moody musical narrative about the story of King Solomon, with Haimovitz's cello acting as its lyrical moor.

"The interpretation of it is so rich that the relationship of the solo cello line to the character of King Solomon just sort of takes you back in time and place and really puts you in a completely different world," he said.

The character-driven drama of the rhapsody also appeals to the 42-year-old's sense of adventure, the same one that led him to reject the trappings of a traditional career in classical music and forge his own path – a path that was set as soon as legendary violinist Itzhak Perlman singled him out at a California music camp in the early 1980s.

Matt Haimovitz plays at Koerner Hall Nov. 5

Within short order, the preteen prodigy from Bat Yam was whisked away to New York where he began to study at Julliard with legendary cellist Leonard Rose.

Rose, who before his death in 1984, taught everyone from Yo-Yo Ma to Yehuda Hanani, referred to Haimovitz as "probably the greatest talent I have ever taught." Haimovitz would have been just shy of his 14th birthday at the time.

While expectations of half that intensity have been known to derail many a talented young artist, the musician says he found a way to compartmentalize the pressure.

"I always felt like I had some perspective on what was going on and I could step back. Even early on, I felt I had some clarity on what my true priority was and my true focus and passion. That's what I tried to hold onto all the way through."

That same clarity has also inspired him to take a far riskier route than his peers. Frustrated by what he perceived as the limitations of his chosen profession, Haimovitz made a daring break with tradition.

He began to experiment with contemporary composers like Philip Glass and, hungry for a different kind of audience, would take his act to nightclubs, rock bars and jazz clubs.

"I was following a very specific path as a virtuoso soloist, playing the same concerti over and over again with orchestras, and knowing three years in advance what I'd be playing and not being able to change that," he explains. "I'd come across a piece or work with a composer and I'd want to change the program or add something to it and it was impossible. I was stuck with what I was doing."

While more stately, grizzled eyebrows would rise over Haimovitz's chosen concert schedule, his reputation ensured that he would always be welcome back in any traditional venue. At this point in his career, the boundary between concert hall and rock bar have even started to blur.

"For me the two worlds are reconciled. I try to bring what I learned from the nightclubs and rock clubs and jazz clubs back into that sense of intimacy and connection with the audience to the concert hall and I try to bring the standards of the high values of the concert hall into the clubs."

The pursuit of the new is the principle that continuess to guide Haimovitz as he successfully straddles the two worlds. He's interested in "stripping away the layers" that have grown over iconic pieces and imbuing the classics with a freshness that he hopes will attract music lovers who may not understand what makes classical music still relevant.

"Orchestras and conductors can play the music, and it's as though you're hearing it for the first time, and that's what I try to do when I play," he said. I try to get to the core and spirit of [the piece], understand the composer's intentions and connect with it in a personal way and then express and communicate that to others."

And if he can do that on an airplane, just imagine what he can do in a place with proper acoustics.

Cello phenomenon Matt Haimovitz joins the Ontario Philharmonic Orchestra and Maestro Marco Parisotto for two masterworks by composers of Jewish origin – Ernest Bloch and the giant of the symphony, Gustav Mahler.

The concert takes place Tuesday, Nov. 5, 8 p.m. at Koerner Hall, 273 Bloor St. W., Tickets, $40, are available from www.mooredaleconcerts.com, or by phoning 416-922-3714, ext. 103. It is the fourth joint presentation between Mooredale Concerts and the Ontario Philharmonic.

Shul not a priority for young, Jewish adults

Ottawa shuls recognize importance of youth involvement

Monique Elliot
Special to The CJN

Ottawa's Limmud conference this month drew mostly an aging crowd, a worrying trend, organizers say.

There's a visible absence of youths and young professionals at Congregation Beth Shalom, where the conference took place, said synagogue president Ian Sherman, who estimates about 85 to 90 per cent of the congregation is 50 years of age or older.

Limmud, an international organization based in the United Kingdom and run by volunteers, is, according to its website, "dedicated to Jewish learning in all its variety… [through] events with a lively approach to Jewish learning."

Referring to one of the many programs at the conference, a panel on "Why do young adults turn away from shul?" Sherman said he feels discouraged to see so few young adults at shul.

"There has been a dramatic decrease with a capital 'D.' It counteracts my feeling of optimism that shul life can be better. It's depressing," he said.

Young adults at the conference said they are finding it increasingly difficult to relate to the tradition of attending shul regularly.

"I think it's well-known that we're losing young adults," said Samantha Banks, 25, a young professional who was one of the panellists.

"I didn't go to Jewish day school, I didn't go to Hebrew school, [I] did my bat mitzvah and I go to shul three times a year," she said. "And working with young professionals, I would say the majority of my [peers] are similar to this way of practicing.

"It's interesting because we're so Jewish-hungry: we wear our Jewish stars around our necks… It's something we want to do and we're proud to do," Banks said. "We go to our universities and rally because we're proud of it, but going to synagogue doesn't seem to be a priority for young Jewish professionals."

Carleton University student Jordan Stenzler, 22, said he believes the relationship with shul weakens for his generation as they age.

"Once you get into high school, you're not as involved and you lose your connection," he said.

Both Banks and Stenzler stressed their relationship with their faith is not the issue and point out barriers that make going to shul less appealing for their generation.

"I believe we go to shul because our parents brought us to shul," Banks said. "When we move away from our parents, we don't have people to go with, we can't afford it ourselves, we don't understand what the heck is going on, we can't relate to the leadership of the congregation and we have no friends there."

The service can be four to five hours long, and young adults say they place priority on their postsecondary studies and jobs. Stenzler said he sees going to shul as "a second workday."

A shortened service would be more effective in drawing in youth, they said, because it would show the rabbis have chosen their lessons carefully.

"Shul-hopper" panellist Eric Trottier said a lack of understanding of the lessons because of language barriers can also be frustrating.

"We want to learn and we want to be here," he said, and suggested that providing Hebrew translations should become more the norm, and "creating Jewish literacy from the ground up" should be a priority so that future generations can better understand and become more involved.

Banks, along with two of her peers, brainstormed solutions with three local rabbis and the audience in an interactive panel during the conference.

The speakers agreed that creating a mentorship program, organizing social and networking opportunities, and sharing new experiences – religious or otherwise – could increase youth involvement.

"We need to make the shul a place that is welcoming for things other than learning," Banks said.

One congregation successfully attracting this young, urban demographic is the Glebe Shul, named for the Ottawa neighbourhood where it was founded by Rabbi Michael Goldstein and his wife, Stacy, in 2011.

"Why people, I think, have migrated to the Glebe Shul, is because even though the leadership is Orthodox, it's a very welcoming environment. It's not imposing or restricting, and it lets you practise how you want to practise," Banks said. "Our generation is full of culture, full of pride, but traditional practices don't necessarily fall within our day-to-day [routines]."

Rabbi Goldstein said his shul, known as "a shul without walls," attracts young Jews who are "not particularly interested in religion," but who crave a sense of community and belonging after moving to Ottawa for work or university.

"Shul needs to be completely re-imagined" to establish a strong relationship with Jewish youth, he said.

Sherman said he welcomed the suggestions offered and intends to collaborate with other local synagogues to implement some of the more creative ideas the discussion generated.

Banks proposed that shuls should host tailgating parties before sporting events and then discuss lessons learned after the congregation watches the game.

"We'll be doing that," Sherman said, laughing.

"It's nice to know there's an emerging generation out there that still cares."

Just what does a mashgiach do?

Kosher Living
Richard Rabkin

"What is a 'mashgiach' and what exactly do they do?"

This is a question we often receive at the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR) –one often followed by "and how do you spell that – "M-A-S-H-G-I-A-C-H?" So why don't we examine the roles and responsibilities of a COR mashgiach.

Just like the government has health inspectors who visit restaurants to ensure compliance with the government's health and safety standards, in simple terms, a mashgiach, or a kashrut supervisor, ensures that an establishment is in compliance with kashrut standards.

Is there a program where one studies to become a mashgiach?

Much of the training is on the job. New COR mashgichim go through a training regimen with senior COR mashgichim. In addition, a mashgiach must be knowledgeable about the laws of kashrut and be scrupulous about their observance in his or her own personal life. Yes I did say "her." A common misconception is that a mashgiach must be a man. This is not the case, and COR employs a number of talented female mashgichot.

A mashgiach's roles and responsibilities may vary depending on the type of establishment where he or she is working, but in most cases, the mashgiach is responsible for ensuring that every product or ingredient that enters a COR-certified establishment is kosher. In fact, deliveries may only be made after the mashgiach has verified the associated paperwork and approved the delivery's contents.

A mashgiach must also clean fruits and vegetables of insects. Aside from being, well, a little disgusting, insects are also not kosher. You'd be surprised how many common fruits and vegetables are infested with insects – those that are visible to the naked eye – so the mashgiach has to be ready to roll up his sleeves and "de-bug" (if that's a word). A mashgiach will also turn on the cooking equipment and pilot lights to ensure that the food is compliant with a regulation called bishul yisrael – that a Jewish person must be involved in the act of cooking food in order for it to be considered kosher.

In many COR-supervised establishments, the mashgiach is what we call a "working mashgiach." A working mashgiach is optional, but some restaurants find him beneficial because not only does he oversee the integrity of the kosher program, he's also an employee of the business, helping in any way he can. Because meat is highly kosher-sensitive, a kosher-observant person is required on premises at all times. As a result, many meat restaurants employ a working mashgiach.

COR-supervised dairy or pareve restaurants only require a yotzei venichnas (coming and going) mashgiach, and these establishments typically receive around three visits per day from our COR "route mashgichim" who are assigned restaurants in their quadrant of responsibility and simply travel a circuit a few times daily.

A caterer's mashgiach situation may be a little bit more complicated. Caterers typically cook in their own kitchens (called commissaries), and the working mashgiach onsite ensures that everything is kosher. But what happens when a caterer delivers food to an offsite event, such as a golf club, museum or other event venue? If the event organizer has requested that this be a "supervised event," it means that they have requested a mashgiach who will, for example, be responsible for making sure that the kosher food is not reheated with non-kosher equipment, served on non-kosher dishes, or that no non-kosher beverages or food are brought into the event.

At "supervised events," COR-supervised certificates will be placed at the entrance of the event so guests will know that the event is under COR supervision. If there's no mashgiach present, however, there's no one overseeing the event's kosher program. This is what we call an "unsupervised event."

As you can see, it's a difficult job, but mashgichim are really the unsung heroes of every kosher consumer. It would not be an exaggeration to say that without the mashgiach, kosher food would be virtually nonexistent. That would make for a lot of hungry Jews – and no one wants to see that.

Naturally sweet, gluten-free, egg-free and dairy-free, too!

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Cookbook author Ricki Heller can show you how to have your cake (and pie and cookies) and great health, too, in her newest cookbook, Naturally Sweet & Gluten-Free (Sellers Publishing). After decades of baking and indulging in unhealthy sweets, Heller was inspired to radically alter her diet.

The result was a comprehensive dessert cookbook without gluten, eggs, dairy or refined sugars. Many of her recipes are also soy-free (or offer a soy-free option), corn-free (all but one!), and nut-free (or offer a nut-free option). Allergy-friendly and entirely vegan, the sweets in her book taste great and are good for you, too. Heller has taken great care to ensure that every recipe will taste and look just as good as a traditional dessert. There are mouthwatering photos throughout the book.

With a mother who was a baker, Heller first wielded a wooden spoon when she was about six, and has barely let go of it since. When she suffered health issues because of her sweets addiction and had to cut all refined sweeteners from her life, Heller decided it was time for a change.

She writes: "I began to search for alternatives that I could bake that (a) didn't contain any of the unhealthy ingredients I'd been accustomed to using; and (b) still tasted good. This quest led to a stint baking vegan desserts for a vegetarian restaurant here in Toronto, and later starting my own baking company. I still love dessert and think it can be both healthy and delicious."

GRAIN-FREE AUTUMN FRUIT CRUMBLE

This is another one of those "desserts that can be breakfast." With the abundance of fall fruit and absence of grains, this dish offers a great lower-glycemic way to start your day. Add a bit more protein, and you're all set! For best results, select crisp, sweet apples, such as gala, honeycrisp, or pink lady, and firm pears, such as d'Anjou or Bosc.

For the topping:
1/3 cup coconut sugar
1/2 cup natural raw walnut pieces
1/2 cup natural raw skin-on almonds, preferable organic
1/3 cup coconut flour
1/4 cup potato starch
1 tbsp. ground cinnamon generous pinch fine sea salt
3 tbsp. coconut oil, at room temperature, preferably organic
30 drops pure plain or vanilla stevia liquid, or to taste
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
3 tbsp. water
For the Filling:
2 medium pears, washed, cored and diced, peeled or unpeeled
2 medium-sweet apples, washed, cored and diced, peeled or unpeeled
1 cup fresh or frozen cranberries
1 tsp ground cinnamon
1/4 tsp. ground ginger
2 tbsp. coconut sugar
juice of 1/2 lemon
1/4 tsp. pure stevia powder or 1/2 tsp. pure plain or vanilla stevia liquid, or to taste

Preheat the oven to 350. Grease a 9-in. square pan or a 6-cup casserole or soufflé dish with nonstick spray or coconut oil.

Make the topping: Place the coconut sugar, walnuts, almonds, coconut flour, potato starch, cinnamon and salt in the bowl of a food processor and process until the mixture resembles a fine meal with no pieces of nuts visible.

In a small, heavy-bottomed pot, melt the coconut oil. Whisk in the stevia, vanilla and water. Pour the coconut oil mixture in a ring around the dry ingredients in the processor and pulse until it all comes together. It should look like moist clumps. Set aside.

Make the filling: In a large bowl, toss the pears, apples and cranberries together with the cinnamon and ginger. In a small bowl, mix together the coconut sugar, lemon juice and stevia, and stir until the sugar begins to dissolve. Drizzle over the fruit and then toss again to coat evenly.

Assemble and bake the crumble: Turn the fruit mixture into the prepared casserole dish and sprinkle with the topping. Press down gently on the topping.

Bake for 40 to 60 minutes (depending on the depth of your pan, you will need more or less time for the fruit to cook), rotating the dish about halfway through baking, until the crumble topping is deeply browned and the fruit is soft. Serve immediately or at room temperature. Serves 6 to 8. May be frozen

COCONUT MACAROONS

3/4 cup natural raw skin-on almonds, preferably organic
2 tbsp. finely ground flax seeds (from about 1 tbsp. or 15 ml whole seeds)
1/8 tsp. fine sea salt
2 cups unsweetened shredded coconut, medium shred
1/4 cup coconut nectar
1/4 cup light agave nectar
20 to 25 drops pure plain or vanilla stevia liquid, or to taste
1/4 cup tahini (sesame seed paste)
1 tsp. pure vanilla extract
1/2 tsp. (2.5 ml) pure coconut extract (optional)

Preheat the oven to 350. Line 2 cookie sheets with parchment paper, or spray with nonstick spray.

In the bowl of a food processor, whir the almonds, flax, and salt together until they resemble a coarse meal, about the texture of cornmeal, without any identifiable pieces of almond visible. Add the coconut and pulse once or twice to combine.

Next pour the coconut nectar, agave nectar, stevia, tahini, vanilla, and coconut extract, if using, over the dry ingredients. Process again until everything is incorporated and the mixture forms a sticky ball (you may need to stop and scrape down the sides of the processor bowl once or twice). Stop as soon as the mixture holds together, to avoid grinding the coconut too fine.

Using a small ice-cream scoop or tablespoon, drop small mounds of the mixture onto the cookie sheets about 1 inch apart. Wet your palms (or use a silicone spatula) and flatten the cookies slightly.

Bake for 10 to 12 minutes, rotating the cookie sheets about halfway through baking, until the cookies are deep golden brown on top. Cool completely before removing to a rack (the cookies will firm up as they cool). Makes 14 to 16. May be frozen

From Jerusalem with love

Singer Paula Abdul poses inside the Ahava (Love) statue in the Israel Museum garden in Jerusalem. Abdul, who was raised Jewish, was in Israel to celebrate her bat mitzvah at the Western Wall. She said that being in Israel was a dream come true. "From age 17 I have been working, and haven't taken a vacation for eight years. I knew when I had the chance I would come to Israel and see it like a regular tourist. Today I am fulfilling the dream and am very excited to be in Israel. I only landed yesterday and I already feel I won't want to leave," she said last week. (Israel Sun photo)

Merkel's Kristallnacht message to Germans: fight anti-Semitism

JTA

BERLIN—The people of Germany need "civil courage" to stand up against anti-Semitism, German Chancellor Angela Merkel said on the eve of Kristallnacht's 75th anniversary.

Merkel, speaking on her weekly podcast with 17-year-old Jewish student Samuel Vingron, also said the fact that Jewish institutions still need police protection is a sobering reality 75 years after the pogrom known as the "Night of Broken Glass."

Angela Merkel

The remarks, broadcast on her website this weekend precede the anniversary of the pogrom, which will be marked in ceremonies throughout Germany.

In Berlin, in addition to the Jewish community's annual ceremony, some 100 businesses will put stickers on their windows to symbolize the broken glass when Nazis rampaged homes, businesses and synagogues on the night of Nov. 9-10, 1938.

More than 1,000 synagogues were destroyed, nearly 100 Jews were murdered and tens of thousands of Jewish men were deported to concentration camps. The government held Jews financially liable for the damages and confiscated insurance payments.

Dieter Graumann, president of the Central Council of Jews in Germany, will address some 200 members of the Conference of European Rabbis on Nov. 10, in a synagogue that escaped destruction and is now part of the Rabbinerseminar zu Berlin.

Couple was high suicide risk, doctor says

Carolyn Blackman

Holocaust survivors jumped to their deaths

Vladimir Fiser and Marika Ferber, the elderly Jewish couple who jumped to their deaths from an Etobicoke apartment building last week, had high risk factors for suicide, said Baycrest Health Sciences' chief of psychiatry.

"Those with physical illness, impaired functions, and have difficulty with their medications have a high risk factor," Dr. Robert Madan said.

He added that as Holocaust survivors, their risk was also higher.

A study done by University of Toronto and Baycrest, which appeared in the Journal of Traumatic Stress, in 2007, showed there is an increase rate of suicide and suicide attempts among the elderly who were exposed to the Holocaust.

Fiser, 89 and Ferber 84, who were married, were found at the base of their apartment building at 8 a.m. Oct. 29. Suicide notes were later found by police in the couple's 18th-floor apartment.

Born in Croatia, they were friends as youngsters, but were reportedly separated in 1941 when the Nazis invaded Yugoslavia.

Fiser's father and many of his family members were killed during the war, and he fled to Italy, where he was a war refugee until the Germans invaded in 1943.

Body Found

TORONTO — Police believe they found the body of a Jewish senior from Uruguay who was reported missing by her family last week. Police said her body was found around 1 p.m. Oct. 30 on a river bank near a reservoir and that she may have fallen into a valley-like area. Edith Gus Peltinovich, 72, was last seen Oct. 28 walking toward G. Ross Lord Park in the northwest corner of the city, which contains a large water reservoir. Gus had been in Canada since early October visiting family who live near the park. She spoke only Spanish and Yiddish. The search for her involved officers on foot and horseback, as well as the marine unit and a helicopter.

Speakers Banned

MONTREAL — Le Mood, a Federation CJA-funded project that brands itself as an alternative Jewish community event for diverse voices, disinvited two controversial scheduled speakers less than two weeks before its third annual conference. Aaron Lakoff, a Jewish anti-Zionist activist, and fellow journalist Sarah Woolf say they were told by festival director Mike Savatovsky on Oct. 22 that Le Mood had cancelled the two panels they were to give at the Nov. 3 event. Le Mood issued an Oct. 30 statement that it's open to criticism of the government of Israel, but does not have "an obligation to provide a platform to people actively engaged in delegitimizing the State of Israel." Woolf was to moderate a panel discussion featuring Lakoff and two other speakers on radicalism among Montreal Jews and the role Jewish radicals play there today. Woolf was to host a second panel on a tour she's preparing on historic sites in Montreal's old garment district and the experience of Jewish workers in that industry in the early 20th century

CJN Columnist Among Kotel Dissenters

MONTREAL — Norma Joseph is among 20 Women of the Wall members and others – and the sole Canadian – who have told Israeli Minister of Religion Naftali Bennett that they won't stop praying at the main area of the Kotel.

Norma Joseph

Joseph, a Concordia University religion professor, CJN columnist and wife of an Orthodox rabbi, is among the signatories of an Oct. 30 letter telling the Israeli government they reject their own group's compromise to allow women to pray at an alternative site near the Western Wall, apart from where men daven.

The letter was prompted by a split in the 25-year-old group after its leader Anat Hoffman's decision to abandon the longtime goal of women praying together at the Kotel itself in exchange for partial control over a new egalitarian prayer area at Robinson's Arch. The decision was supported by the Women of the Wall's board.

The dissidents say Robinson's Arch "is not now and has never been the Kotel" and that they will continue to pray at the Kotel on Rosh Chodesh and "other times."

"The government proposes making structural changes at Robinson's Arch to create a site to which all whose prayer practice is not tolerated by those who now control the Kotel will be relegated, leaving the Kotel permanently and officially in the hands of a segment of Jewry that suffers the presence of other Jews only on its terms," they say. "Regrettably, the Israeli government is yielding to intimidation, threats and violence as the basis for policy making, rather than upholding the equality of rights of all citizens in public space that is enshrined in Israel's Declaration of Independence."

The other signatories come from Israel and the United States, as well as one from Australia.

Thornhill park renamed for Holocaust survivor

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Felix Opatowski says he feels like "a million dollars" after learning that a Thornhill park has been renamed in his honour.

A Holocaust survivor who lived in the Lodz Ghetto and was imprisoned at Auschwitz-Birkenau, he said that "now that I have so much land, maybe I'll put up a condo."

He might joke about the fact that the city of Markham is renaming Tamarack Park East, located off Tamarack Drive in the Willowbrook Road area, "but truly, I am overcome. When I found out, I had tears in my eyes.

"Maybe now, people will think about the Holocaust, and in 500 years, they'll remember my name."

Markham Mayor Frank Scarpitti publicly announced the renaming of the park at Shaar Shalom Synagogue's Shabbat service on Oct. 26. At the same time, Scarpitti talked about his recent visit to the site of the Dachau concentration camp in Germany.

For more Holocaust-related stories, please see pages 7, 11, 15, 16

Opatowski, who attended the service with his wife, Regina, said that he was "so impressed with the mayor's speech, that when I closed my eyes, I was sure I was listening to a Jew."

The mayor said that the seeds for renaming the park began with Howard Shore, a Thornhill-Markham city councillor, who worked on the plan to rename a Thornhill-area park to honour and recognize a Holocaust survivor, not only for his individual experience, "but as a testament to all [those who survived] and those who did not."

Opatowski was recognized by Markham city council at its International Holocaust Remembrance Day commemoration last January.

Felix Opatowski

At age 15, Opatowski smuggled goods out of the Lodz Ghetto in exchange for food for his starving family, and later, he was a runner for the Polish Underground inside Auschwitz-Birkenau.

Since moving to Canada, he has spoken to thousands of students across the country about the Holocaust, and he's the author of his personal story, Gateway to Hell.

Shore, who is "excited and proud" about the name change, said that naming a park after a survivor is a wonderful way to pay tribute to someone who lived through the most horrific genocide in modern history.

"Although painful memories haunt them, many of the survivors are brave enough to speak about their experiences time and time again, so that others can learn about the importance of tolerance and the acceptance of diversity," Shore said.

He said he's also planning to have a monument erected in the park to pay tribute to survivors and those who perished in the Holocaust.

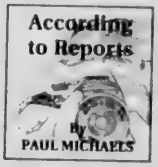
Optimists, pessimists differ on Israel's strategic situation

With the Middle East wracked by upheaval and uncertainty, it's been fascinating to see competing analyses in the media and in policy circles of Israel's current strategic situation.

On what we might call the "optimists' side" are pieces such as Roger Cohen's October 18 New York Times column: "It is possible to imagine a scenario more favourable to Israel than the current one, but it is not easy.



"Syria is giving up its chemical weapons. In the civil war there, Hezbollah and Iran are bleeding. The Egyptian army has ousted the Muslim Brotherhood, restored a trusted interlocutor for Israel, and embarked on a squeeze of Hamas in Gaza. In Turkey, Recep Tayyip Erdogan, the prime minister, has overstretched; the glow is off his aggressive stand for Palestine," Cohen writes.

In the Oct. 17 issue of Foreign Policy, Aaron David Miller also underscores how regional changes have improved Israel's overall strategic position at a time when the United States is withdrawing from its previous involvement in the region. "To be sure," he observes, "the threat from Islamic extremism has not gone away. But the notion that the Islamists and their Sunni or Shiite arcs are poised to take over the Middle East and require some new grand interventionist strategy is another example of threat inflation."

Like Cohen, Miller cites the decline of the Muslim Brotherhood and the isolation of Hamas, adding that, with respect to Syria, "[Hassan] Nasrallah and Hezbollah have been weakened by [Bashar] Assad's travail."

Consequently, Miller argues, "Israel's own situation has also improved dramatically. Indeed, three factors – Israel's formidable capacity; steadfast support from the United States, and stunning Arab incapacity – have created a situation where Israel is stronger and more secure than it's ever been."

Overall, Miller aims for perspective: "Iran's nuclear pretentions remain an acute challenge, and an unresolved Palestinian problem holds longer-term worries, too. But the notion that the Jewish state is a hapless victim, the Middle East's sitting duck, has been an illusion for some time now."

To take just one more example: Efraim Inbar, director of the Begin-Sadat Center For Strategic Studies (BESA), has recently written a 20-page monograph, "Time Is on Israel's Side," in which he concludes that the strength of Israel's democracy and high-tech economy, its multi-layered missile defence shield, and the weakness of Arab countries – including a steep decline in their military capability – leave Israel in a much more secure regional position than ever before. Inbar doesn't ignore Iran's nuclear threat and potential regional nuclear proliferation, but he believes that Israel has the capacity to handle these challenges.

However, on the "pessimists' side" is the view expressed, for instance, by Walter Russell Mead (in the Oct. 27 American Interest) that Israel cannot count on the Americans, especially, where Iran is concerned: "The Israelis worry most of all that the U.S. will accept a nuclear agreement [with Tehran] that leaves Iran closer to a bomb than the Israelis would like to see them, sacrificing Israeli security interests as understood in Jerusalem in order to keep the U.S. out of a war."

Other analysts also point to the threat to Israel of the 100,000-plus missiles in the hands of Iranian-backed Hezbollah and Hamas, and the growth of Iran's Shia crescent that's unmatched by the Sunni arc (Turkey, Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia), which is disorganized and, though numerically superior, not nearly as focused as Shia forces. Then there's a growing Russian presence, inimical to Israel's interests, backing Iran and attempting to fill the breach left by the United States (as with Egypt).

Whereas Inbar argues that "the ascendance of a Shiite 'crescent'… makes Israel a potential ally of the moderate [Sunni] Arab states," others point out that this implicit alliance has only limited value to Israel. Turkey's continuing hostility to Israel is part of this weakness.

On balance, it's fair to say that this is a mixed picture for Israel's security, but one where predictions about even near-future outcomes are difficult to make with any confidence.

The elephant in the Jewish room

Guest Editorial

The bad news spin on the Pew report on U.S. Jewry has been pervasive, the good news spin not as much. J.J. Goldberg of the Forward argues that in terms of numbers, the news is good. Predictions that the American Jewish population would dip below five million by now have not panned out. Instead, it has risen to 6.5 million.

But the intermarriage rate outside the Orthodox community hovers around 70 per cent. Factor in the Orthodox and the rate is holding at "only" 58 per cent.

The Orthodox dare not be smug at their relative good news. First, there is significant attrition within the Orthodox – low by comparison, but still significant. And the fact that 90 per cent of the Jewish population is not Orthodox should give them pause. Given the indicators, including earlier marriage and more children per family, the percentage who say they are Orthodox should be higher.

There is plenty of blame to throw around. If the product, Judaism, is good, why is the buy-in not reflective of the product?

This is a community issue. Everyone has a responsibility to make an impact, but no one person, or organization, can overcome this challenge alone.

The Pew report leaves an empty feeling. Why, with the gigantic efforts of so many, is there so much drop-off from Judaism? Is there an elephant in the room that has escaped scrutiny?

Here is one unpleasant possibility. Ours is a generation that prizes happiness and contentedness. A truly Jewish home should offer that very happiness-contentedness mix. Surely there are many such homes. But there are also far too many unhappy Jewish homes in which the children grow up in fear.

That fear is often the result of abuse, a serious but still under-reported reality in Jewish homes. The upshot of this abuse often is the resolve of the victims to reject their roots, and either leave the fold entirely, or stay in a perfunctory way, but loaded with cynicism and disdain.

How bad is the abuse situation in the Jewish community? As bad as it is outside the Jewish community, approximately 15 per cent, across all denominations. Making matters worse is that Jewish women tend to stay two to three times longer in the abusive relationship, seven to 13 years rather than three to five years. Add to the abuse another 15 per cent (best guess) growing up in dour, sour, unhappy environments, and we have an epidemic of unhappiness that adversely affects Jewish affirmation in elephant-like proportions.

So instead of railing against the murky picture in the Pew report, it is more appropriate, and helpful to launch an assault against abuse. No rabbi should go more than a few months without that issue being a major sermon. No one who is aware of abuse dare be silent. No Jewish school should look the other way when suspicion arises. And the community resources available to abuse victims must become a priority.

We do this not in order to bolster the statistics. We need to do this because it is the right thing to do. And usually, when the right thing is done, good things ensue.

Where is Israel's peace partner?

Regarding the fiasco in the Middle East, I am constantly reminded of the classic children's story, The Emperor's New Clothes. It is a perfect metaphor for how Israel handles itself and how the world responds accordingly. It is absolutely baffling to me that the charade continues and that Israel and the world pretend that Israel actually has a peace partner. Who are we kidding?

The story that I allude to is all about pretending – pretending that the emperor is actually wearing outstanding royal robes when in fact he is wearing nothing at all. The swindler tailors have told the king's subjects that anyone who sees otherwise is merely stupid and incompetent. Finally, a child speaks the truth and the bubble bursts. The charade is over.

Why do our Israeli leaders pretend that we actually have someone to negotiate with, someone whose interests are the same as ours? Thus the myth, the metaphor and the insanity continue. When will this nonsense end, and who will finally have the guts to speak the truth? Anyone?

Netanyahu's win wasn't surprising

Yair Lootsteen was "astonished" that in the May 1996 elections Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu defeated the "peace" candidate, and Rabin heir apparent, Shimon Peres, with over 60 per cent of the Jewish vote ("Remembering Rabin becomes less partisan," The CJN, Oct. 10).

Given that between Feb. 25 and March 4, 1996, four Palestinian suicide bombers murdered 60 Israelis and wounded another 284, it is surprising that Netanyahu did not do even better. It was these actions by Palestinian rejectionists that did more harm to the Oslo accords than the assassination of Yitzchak Rabin by Yigal Amir.

In 2000, then-Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak made a very generous offer that even Rabin would have balked at, and this was rewarded with the second intifadah, costing another 1,000 Israeli lives, so it is naïve to think if Rabin had not been assassinated the Middle East would look that much different today.

Supervision doesn't make it kosher

It may surprise readers that not every Israeli winery is considered kosher, especially many of the smaller vineyards, even when following kashrut standards ("Vineyards revive ancient Negev wine route," The CJN, Oct. 24). One reason for this is the cost (financial and political) of supervision by the Chief Rabbinate Council of Israel.

In Israel, only the rabbinate can declare something kosher. Rujum, one of the wineries in the article, is trying a new path. They now work with the Masorti Movement (the Conservative Movement in Israel) for their supervision. The supervision, while overseeing the process, cannot legally declare the wine "kosher." Instead, the labels say "kosher of trust."

While some will say the supervision is all that matters in the end, it is important to realize that neither the rabbinate nor other supervising organizations make something kosher. It is an observance of the laws and processes that make something kosher. The label and hechsher are simply modern innovations that make buying and selling easier. Just ask the thousands of kashrut-observant households about their kitchens. None are under supervision. All are kosher by trust.

We must not glorify assimilation.

According to the article "Skating legend hid her Jewish past" (The CJN, Oct. 24), Ellen Burka not only hid her Jewishness, but gave it up, raising her family as Christians.

Did Ellen Burka ever return to being Jewish?

If not, I have trouble understanding why she would be inducted into the Jewish Sports Hall of Fame and why The CJN would place her life story on the its front page.

She may be a wonderful person who led an exemplary life, but she is no longer Jewish. I do not judge her or her reasons for hiding her Jewishness, but six million people died defending their right to be Jewish. Surely we must have some heroes who are proud to be Jewish to write about.

75th anniversary of Kristallnacht:

Remembering the cartoonists who spoke out

Rafael Medoff
JNS.org

"I could scarcely believe that such a thing could occur in a 20th-century civilization," U.S. President Franklin Delano Roosevelt declared in the wake of the Nazis' Kristallnacht pogrom, which devastated the German Jewish community 75 years ago this month.

Most Americans, like their president, were appalled to read of Nazi stormtroopers burning down hundreds of synagogues, ransacking thousands of Jewish-owned businesses, murdering some 100 Jews, and hauling 30,000 more off to concentration camps on Nov. 9-10, 1938. In the days following the pogrom, three American editorial cartoonists would try to channel the public's sympathy for the victims into concrete steps to help German Jewry.

In response to Kristallnacht, Roosevelt recalled the U.S. ambassador from Germany for "consultations" and extended the visitors' visas of the approximately 12,000 German Jewish refugees who were then in the United States. But at the same time, the president announced that liberalization of America's tight immigration quotas was "not in contemplation."

In the wake of Kristallnacht, humanitarian-minded members of the U.S. Congress introduced legislation to aid German Jewry. The Wagner-Rogers bill proposed the admission of 20,000 German refugee children outside the quotas. Nativist and isolationist groups vociferously opposed the Wagner-Rogers bill.

Typical of the opposition's perspective was a remark by Roosevelt's cousin, Laura Delano Houghteling, who was the wife of the U.S. commissioner of immigration. She warned that "20,000 charming children would all too soon grow into 20,000 ugly adults."

An appeal to the president by First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt to support Wagner-Rogers fell on deaf ears, and an inquiry by a congresswoman as to the president's position was returned to his secretary marked "File No action FDR." Mindful of polls showing most Americans opposed more immigration, Roosevelt preferred to follow public opinion rather than lead it. Without his support, the Wagner-Rogers bill was buried in committee.

Ironically, when Pets Magazine the following year launched a campaign to have Americans take in pure-bred British puppies so they would not be harmed by German bombing raids, the magazine was flooded with several thousand offers of haven for the dogs.

Most American editorial cartoonists, like most Americans, exhibited little interest in the plight of Germany's Jews. But there were exceptions. A handful of cartoonists used their platforms not only to express sympathy for the refugees but also to call for practical steps to help them.

Six days after Kristallnacht, Paul Carmack, staff cartoonist for the Christian Science Monitor, drew a cartoon in response to the pogrom. [Images courtesy of the David S. Wyman Institute for Holocaust Studies]

A Christian Science Monitor editorial cartoon, by J. Parker Robinson, responding to Kristallnacht.

Six days after Kristallnacht, Paul Carmack, staff cartoonist for the Christian Science Monitor, drew a cartoon titled "The Best Answer to Race Persecution." It showed a large hand, labelled "Humanity," handing a document titled "Assistance" to a crowd of Jewish refugees.

Five days later, the Christian Science Monitor published another editorial cartoon responding to Kristallnacht, this time by J. Parker Robinson. It showed a mass of people, labelled "Jews," marching past a sign pointing to "Exile," with a giant question mark looming over the horizon. He titled the cartoon "Wanted: A Christian Answer." The question was the fate of the Jews. The answer, the cartoonist insisted, was for Christians to accept their moral responsibility to help the downtrodden.

Meanwhile, in the pages of the Chicago Daily News, another cartoonist pleaded for help for Germany's Jews. Staff cartoonist Cecil Jensen drew a group of Jewish refugees on a large rock, surrounded by turbulent ocean waves. They can see, in the distance, a 17th-century-style ship, labelled "World Rescue Efforts." Whether or not the ship will save the refugees is unclear. Jensen titled the cartoon "Mayflower," invoking America's own powerful historical symbol of refugees from religious persecution reaching a safe haven.

In the pages of the Chicago Daily News, cartoonist Cecil Jensen pleaded for help for Germany's Jews.

Sadly, few Americans heeded the appeals of Carmack, Robinson, and Jensen, despite the horrors of Kristallnacht. When a "Mayflower" ship called the St. Louis approached America's shores just a few months later, Roosevelt turned it away.

Expressions of sympathy were not matched by deeds. There were no U.S. economic sanctions against Nazi Germany, no severing of diplomatic relations, no easing of immigration quotas.

The Roosevelt administration's muted reaction to Kristallnacht foreshadowed the terrible silence with which it would greet the Nazis' Final Solution.

Inspiring heroes with stories of heroes

Gil Troy in Montreal

I recently addressed a conference in Toronto of Jewish communal workers. Looking at the crowd of poverty workers, elder-care experts and educators, I felt moved. "You are heroes," I said. "You are our community's connectors, the glue bonding us, and living embodiments of our Jewish values."

My speech title was "Cultivating a Cult of Success." I'm no MBA, management consultant or even much of a manager. As an academic, I rarely manage or am managed. To me, the secret of success for Jewish community workers is remembering that they are mission driven. Their mission is fighting the good fight, doing good works, helping us all strengthen our Jewish identities by living up to our most cherished Jewish values.

"Whoever you are, whatever you believe, by doing what you do, you are doing holy work," I proclaimed.

I acknowledged, of course the frustrations and limitations, as in all jobs. The bad stuff in a job is what you get paid for. The good stuff – building community, saving community – you do happily, for free.

To illustrate my point, I shared the stories of three of my heroes, who stretched themselves and others to make the world a better place. I spoke of Daniel Patrick Moynihan, an aide to John Kennedy and then Lyndon Johnson, who was pilloried for writing a memo, called "the Moynihan Report" in 1965, which recognized that the problem of absentee fathers in black neighbourhoods was spreading poverty – and would get worse. Even though he offered an academic analysis, hoping to help African-Americans, he was accused of racism.

His bitterness at this false accusation was painful, but liberating. It freed him from following the conventional wisdom and emboldened him to do the right thing, regardless of the consequences. A decade later, in 1975, when he spearheaded the fight against the United Nations' "Zionism is racism" resolution, being far more "confrontational" than his boss, his colleagues, his allies and the New York Times wanted him to be, he did it because he knew the resolution was wrong. In denouncing the resolution so vociferously, he was also condemning the small-minded people who had distorted his words a decade before and feared truth and truth-seekers.

A second hero – a most unlikely choice for a group of Canadian social activists – was former U.S. president Ronald Reagan. I didn't address his politics or his diplomacy. I spoke about the fact that, having been born in February 1911, he was just short of 70 when he was inaugurated and 78 when he retired after two terms, making him America's oldest president.

Reagan used his sense of humour to compensate for whatever deficits he had. Forgetting the names of White House staffers from day to day, he joked about what fun it was to go to work: "You meet the nicest people every day – again and again and again." He also disarmed opponents by letting them underestimate him, joking, when asked about B-29s, which were fighter bombers, whether those were vitamins he needed to take.

Reagan confounded his opponents and surprised the doubters by not just surviving, but thriving in office. Brian Mulroney, his colleague as Canadian prime minister during Reagan's second term, said he tried to learn from the older Reagan about not being so thin-skinned, about being settled within oneself.

My final hero was Emanuel Ringelblum from the Warsaw Ghetto. A social worker, political activist and historian, he educated the world – and future generations – about what was occurring under Nazism by collecting thousands of documents depicting life in the ghetto. He then hid the documents in metal boxes and milk cans. Two of the caches were discovered. One remains missing. Ringelblum died in the ghetto. But his archives, including drawings showing Jews helping each other out during this nightmare, have taught us about the evils of Nazism, the wonders of Judaism and the power of the human spirit.

These three – an anti-poverty worker turned diplomat, an elderly president, and a farsighted educator and historian, teach us about the immortality of idealism and ideas. None of us may be as heroic as these three, or the people I was addressing. But we all should challenge ourselves to live by our values, to develop our Jewish identities, and to live large – not with big indulgences and spending sprees, but by having a sense of mission and helping to improve the world.

We, too, are aboriginal

Urban Writer Avrum Rosensweig

Chances are you don't know the following: over a 400-year period, our land's first people were marginalized until they were considered non-citizens, strangers, insignificant. This process was subtle and slow, but don't be fooled: the Europeans who arrived on our shores systematically and strategically made our First Nations people feel invisible, as insignificant as an ant on your desk.

Here's some background.

It would be easy to look back at the history of our Aboriginal Peoples and see a bunch of people scattered throughout the land, running wild and savagely warring with others and spending days sharpening their arrowheads. That's the "John Wayne myth," which is as nonsensical as the story of Jews, warped noses and all, sitting by the "gate," hands extended, collecting debts from Christians.

But like us, the Jewish People, Aboriginals in this land lived by a code of laws and had a sophisticated way of life. Elders passed on oral stories from one generation to the next. Native children learned that they were part of the entire creation, and they gave thanks to nature for their survival. We Jews call this process Torah sheba'al peh (oral Torah).

First Nations gave respect to all things in their environment, animate or otherwise. They did so through songs, dance, festivals and ceremonies – just like we do through ritual. According to an Aboriginal Affairs online history, "In the Woodland First Nations, for example, a hunter would talk or sing to a bear before it died, thanking the animal for providing the hunter and his family with much-needed food."

You might also read this: "The Haudenosaunee held six to eight festivals a year relating to the cultivation of the soil and ripening of fruits and berries. There was a seven-day festival to give thanks when corn was planted, for example, and another when it was green. A third festival was held when corn was harvested." This sounds very much like our Shalosh Regalim, the three major holidays we celebrate at key times in the agricultural calendar.

As the colonialists arrived in great numbers, they demanded more land from Aboriginal Peoples. By the 1830s, only small lots were made available to the First Nations in Upper Canada. Through this land grab, First Nations had less and less, and essentially became strangers on their former lands.

At the same time, Christians worked arduously to convert native peoples to their religion, as various denominations still do today with our people. The lives of our Aboriginal Peoples became more and more dismal due to starvation, disease and a clear plan to marginalize them within what we now call Canada. Their spirit was all but destroyed.

There is much more history to learn, clearly, and I advise you to go online and read as much as you can about the history of Canada's original peoples particularly the residential school years. The truth is beginning to emerge.

(As you study, you'll discover that the decimation of Aboriginal People's society, as I mentioned, happened over four centuries. The compelling point within this is that Native people today cannot remember what the "glory days" were like when they had control over their own land and culture. This is unlike our own people, who came out of the Holocaust with a clear memory of what had happened only a decade prior. I make this comparison, because I often hear from our own people, "Well, we put our lives back together after the Holocaust. Why can't First Nations?" The comparison is incomplete.)

There's a wave of interest within our community about our First Nations, Metis and Inuit brothers and sisters. Educate yourself. Learn about the Reform movement's recent resolution in support of First Nations and Ve'ahavta's health-promotion program in the Kenora region of Ontario. Become part of this movement.

We, too, are Aboriginal people in the Land of Israel, and we understand that sort of struggle. We were also victims of anti-Semitism right here in Canada. Let's use all of that knowledge and experience, as well as the beauty we share between our cultures, to create a strong bond with First Nations, Metis and Inuit.

There is much to learn. There is much to share. It is time.

Israeli hospital gets first-ever Arab donation

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Meir Medical Centre in Kfar Saba, Israel, has been around for 57 years. With around 800 beds and leading departments in cardiology and orthopedics, it serves a population of close to one million. It boasts top-flight research, is a teaching hospital and features exchange programs with hospitals around the world, including three in Toronto.

But recently, it broke new ground in a rather unexpected sphere. For the first time in its history, it received a substantial donation from a consortium of Arab-Israeli citizens. Twenty Arab donors got together to give the Meir Medical Center a gift of 300,000 shekels ($89,000).

"It was the first time Arab Israelis donated to any Israeli hospital," according to Arie Fishbein, CEO of Friends of the Meir Medical Center.

Fishbein, who has been charged with handling external relations for the hospital, was in Toronto last week to meet with Canadian Friends of the Meir Medical Center.

The hospital is known not only for its diverse population that it serves, but for its equally diverse staff. "We have an Arab doctor who organized 20 Arabs together to donate to Meir," he said.

The Meir Medical Center is the fourth-largest hospital in Israel, and from its location north of Tel Aviv, "it takes care of one million people in the region," Fishbein said. There are many Arab villages and communities in the area it serves.

It was that kind of inclusive and integrated medical facility that led one Canadian to donate more than $1 million to the hospital last year, said Arie Raif, vice-chair and CEO of the Canadian Friends of Meir Medical Center.

Altogether, in the four years he's headed the hospital's local support group, Canadians have contributed more than $2.5 million to it. The bulk of the funds have gone to the children's facility and the cardiology unit, where Canadian funds were used to acquire new equipment.

One of Raif's primary tasks is to raise Meir's profile in Canada, particularly among younger people. The Canadian support group now has "a few thousand" supporters. The main event on the organization's calendar is its annual gala in which the hospital's Medal of Merit is awarded to worthy recipients.

This year's event will take place April 6 and will see the Medal of Merit awarded to Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau, Dr. Allan Abramovitch, a urologist at Scarborough Hospital and Jacqueline Abramovitch, a community activist, as well as Karen Mock, a human rights activist, and David Mock, a professor and former dean of the faculty of dentistry at the University of Toronto.

Raif is eager to foster professional relationships between Canadian and Israeli medical practitioners. An exchange program is already in place with Mount Sinai Hospital, with doctors of each centre working in the other's intensive care units, while the Hospital for Sick Children and Meir are conducting joint research, as are Sunnybrook Health Science Centre and the Meir hospital.

During his visit to Toronto, Fishbein was introduced to members of the Canadian Friends' board. It was his first trip abroad on behalf of the hospital, indicating the high regard the centre has for its Canadian supporters, he said.

Fishbein has been on the job only a few weeks. He was recruited to the position from Israel Aircraft Industries (IAI), where he worked as a project manager. Before that, he had served for 28 years in the Israel Defense Forces (IDF), mostly in air defence. When he left the IDF, he was a brigadier general in charge of the Air Force's anti-aircraft disposition and ground defence. He had 15,000 soldiers under his command. Earlier, he headed the IDF's delegation to the United States when it acquired the Patriot missile defence system.

It turns out, he's not the first ex-soldier to parlay his military knowledge into a job at Meir. One of the hospital's professors of medicine is a former F-16 fighter pilot. The doctor/warrior developed a simulator – similar to one used to train pilots – to teach other doctors how to diagnose patients so they "do not crash," Fishbein said.

From his vantage point at the intersection of the health and military professions and his intimate knowledge of the country's defence profile, Fishbein is confident the country can meet any challenges hurled at it – at least in terms of missiles and rockets.

Israel will soon be protected by a triple ring consisting of the Iron Dome, David's Sling and the Arrow. In a few years, perhaps as soon as five, the country will add a laser weapon system to shoot down incoming rockets.

"From day to day, we're becoming safer and safer," he added.

Temple restores its three Torahs

One 250-year-old Czech scroll survived the Holocaust

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Temple Kol Ami, one of Greater Toronto's fastest-growing congregations, is embarking on a year-long project to restore its three Torah scrolls, including a 250-year-old Czech scroll that survived the Holocaust.

Rabbi Micah Streiffer, spiritual leader of the Reform synagogue in Thornhill, Ont., asked for renowned American Torah scribe, or sofer, Neil Yerman to restore the scrolls.

"We contacted Mr. Yerman because of his particular approach, which is both a torah restoration and a teaching approach," Rabbi Streiffer says.

Yerman was at Temple Kol Ami on Oct. 26 teaching families about which materials make a living Torah and examining the scrolls with them.

"It's something I call the 'Torah Detective Training Academy,'" Yerman told The CJN.

"We look for clues in the Torah. We want to find out something about where the Torah was from or how old the Torah might be, or something about the culture of the people [from where the scroll was written]."

Yerman, who is based in New York, will return to the synagogue two more times during the restoration process.

At one session this coming spring, he says he will ask congregants to clean parts of the scrolls and then hold a quill with him to fill in broken letters. This act fulfills an important Jewish commandment.

Members of the congregation and others in the community are encouraged to donate $72 or more to write a letter in any of the three Torahs.

"This type of programming brings the Torah... to a place that is very close to us – within our hearts, within the very essence of who we are," Yerman says.

"We bring that Torah home in a very real way by coming into physical contact with it and taking direct responsibility to bringing life back to it."

The temple hopes to have it finished by the next High Holidays, Rabbi Streiffer says. The project will likely cost around $40,000.

Temple Kol Ami's Czech Torah is one of more than 1,500 rescued from the Holocaust that have been distributed around the world.

"We see it as part of our obligation to that community to have their Torah scroll continue to be part of Jewish life today," Rabbi Streiffer says. "We see ourselves as carrying on the work and the life of a Jewish community that was destroyed during the Holocaust."

Yerman doesn't just restore Torahs. He has written several new scrolls as well, including for nearby Temple Har Zion in October 2012. He has worked in scribal art since 1987, which also includes calligraphic work and illuminating scrolls.

"My love of drawing and my love of letters started at a very, very young age," Yerman says. "I loved penmanship. That has never gone away. I love writing and I love letter form of many languages."

Temple Kol Ami is located in the Leo Baeck Day School and has 165 member families.

New film examines Israel's first leaders

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Yehuda Avner, the best-selling author of personal memoirs that detail his service to four former Israeli prime ministers, was in Toronto last week for the Canadian premier of the documentary based on his book.

The Prime Ministers: The Pioneers, the latest production of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Academy Award-winning film division Moriah Films, provides viewers with a behind-the-scenes look into how Israel's pioneers shaped the Jewish State into the country it is today.

Avi Benlolo, right, and Yehuda Avner

Written and produced by Richard Trank and Simon Wiesenthal Center founder and Academy Award-winning film producer Rabbi Marvin Hier, part one of the two-part documentary features interviews with Avner, who moved from Britain to Israel in 1947 and served for decades as a key adviser, ambassador and English speechwriter to Israeli prime ministers Levi Eshkol, Golda Meir, Yitzhak Rabin and Menachem Begin.

A seemingly bottomless pit of compelling, detailed anecdotes about some of Israel's greatest leaders, Avner, who spoke briefly before the screening at the Eglinton Grande in Toronto, said, "I can tell you that all of them, all the prime ministers... as Jews, they loved peace, but they loved freedom more."

After joining the Israeli Foreign Ministry in 1958, "he was privy to the most crucial decision-making moments, such as Operation Entebbe and the signing of the Israel-Egypt peace treaty," said David Cynamon, co-chair and sponsor of the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal for Holocaust Studies event.

"It is fortunate for us that he kept meticulous notes to share a remarkable account of pivotal moments in Israel's history," Cynamon added.

In addition to providing insight into the ways Israel's leaders navigated through crisis after crisis, Avner also shed light on the relationships they developed with American leaders, including U.S. presidents Lyndon B. Johnson and Richard Nixon, and former U.S. National Security Adviser Henry Kissinger.

His 731-page book was a product of short-hand notes made during secret government meetings involving the four prime ministers that he stashed away in a drawer until he began writing his memoir in 2005, at the age of 76. It wasn't until 2010 that he completed his manuscript.

Avner said the purpose of writing the memoir "was not simply to write the history, but to bring history back to life. To bring [to life] the episodes and the personalities and how they behaved in certain situations... in Israel's first testing, challenging days, days fraught with peril."

Although the film didn't offer a lot of new information about Israel's history, it did give viewers a glimpse into the personalities and the strengths and weaknesses of each of the prime ministers he served. Avner described Eshkol, voiced by actor Leonard Nimoy, as the "most affable man, utterly accessible," and as a man who "loved Yiddishisms."

Voiced by Michael Douglas, Rabin, who served as ambassador to the United States from 1968 to 1974, was described by Avner as "painfully shy," with a "mind so analytical, so structured."

Avner described Meir, voiced by Sandra Bullock, as a woman who "exuded warmth" and was a "classic Jewish grandmother who kept an eye on you," but also as an orator who would become "the face of Israel."

"She proved herself time and again as a person who could bite the bullet... She would not negotiate with terrorists... She believed that if you negotiated with terrorists, there would be no end to it," Avner recalled.

The film also chronicled some of the most pivotal moments in the young country's history, including the Six Day War and the capture of the Old City; Eshkol's sudden death and Meir's succession as prime minister, and the military intelligence blunder that resulted in the surprise attack by Egypt and Syria on Israel in 1973.

The film ends with Meir's resignation in 1974, but Avner insists that for a woman with no war experience who suddenly found herself as a war commander, "if you look at the way the war began and the way it ended... Golda looms large in the pantheon of Israel's great prime ministers."

Part two of the documentary, The Soldiers and Peacemakers, which will highlight the years during which Rabin and Begin were in power, is scheduled to be released next spring.

Shul offers dementia care program

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Holy Blossom Temple will once again offer its Living With Dementia program, geared to family members caring for loved ones suffering with dementia.

Set to start in March, Living with Dementia is a satellite program run in partnership with the Reitman Centre for Alzheimer's support and training program at Mount Sinai Hospital, where the methods were developed.

Gerri Richman, who co-leads the 10-week program with Sandy Atlin, said it began in 2011 after Atlin, a retired adult educator whose husband has Alzheimer's disease, approached then-spiritual leader Rabbi John Moscowitz and told him that due to the synagogue's aging population, it would be helpful to bring in a support program.

Atlin said there's a strong need for such a program to be available and accessible in our community.

The program, which is free, consists of support, education, and coping and communication skills development for caregivers, as well as an arts-based program for loved ones with dementia.

Professionals, trained by the Reitman Centre, volunteer their time to teach and facilitate the program.

Richman, a life transitions coach, said that "while there are some supports offered through various associations, there is still not enough practical coping skills development available to family members who face the shocking transition from spouse or child to caregiver.

"Most family members are ill-equipped to handle the complete shift in relationship and role. This change requires the support of others and should not be faced alone."

A recent participant in the program said it gave her an opportunity to think, question and challenge herself in the daily handling of many issues which have been suddenly thrust upon her.

"You really made us question many of our automatic responses with thoughtful and better methods. You allowed us to change and observe the change in others," she said.

"The group has slowly coalesced into a wonderful support group where sharing information, resources and friendship have become so helpful in navigating the health-care system on a daily basis."

For information on the program, call Elana Fehler, 416-789-3291, ext. 221.

Kristallnacht horrors to be recalled at gala

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

The Canadian German Chamber of Industry and Commerce apologized last week to anyone who was offended by its choice to hold a gala dinner on Nov. 9, the anniversary of Kristallnacht, but said it will commemorate the Nazi pogrom at the event.

B'nai Brith Canada had issued a statement Oct. 29 saying the choice of date was in "bad taste."

"The sanctity of the anniversary coupled with the pledge never to forget the victims of the Holocaust should have been enough to dissuade the organizers from selecting Nov. 9," CEO Frank Dimant said.

However, the Canadian German group's president and CEO, Thomas Beck, said the date for the event, titled Night of a Thousand Stars, was chosen because it's the anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall.

"The chamber's gala dinner will bring together the Canadian German business community and, therefore, offer an opportunity to recall both – the Holocaust as well as the relief about the end of the Cold War and the end of the Iron Curtain that separated Europe," Beck said.

Thomas Beck

He noted that prior to the event, German Consul General Walter Stechel will take part in a commemoration of Kristallnacht, known as the Night of Broken Glass, as part of Holocaust Education Week, and he'll address dinner guests about the anniversary and hold a moment of silence.

"We hope that in this way, by drawing the attention of our members and friends to the historic resonance of this day, we can do justice to its ambivalence and offer our respect to the victims of this greatest crime against humanity that started on Nov. 9, 1938," Beck said.

B'nai Brith spokesperson Sam Eskenasi said his group is satisfied with the response of the chamber of commerce to its concerns, adding that B'nai Brith would be happy to work with it in the future on these kinds of issues.

MITZVAH CORPS: Shaarei Tefillah Congregation's first annual Mitzvathon was a huge success. More than 50 kids and adults of all ages came out to make more than 240 care packages for Jewish families in need, through Tomchei Shabbos, and raised nearly $3,000 for charity. They also learned about the importance of getting involved in chesed projects for the community.

Prof not surprised by new figures on Nazi repression

Number of camps higher than previously thought

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

The names are seared into the Jewish consciousness: Auschwitz, Buchenwald, Treblinka, Sobibor.

So are the names of Jewish ghettos set up across Nazi-occupied Europe. Many will also recall dozens of sub-camps, detention facilities, forced-labour sites and transit centres during the Holocaust.

But recent research shows that the extent of the Third Reich's apparatus for killing, imprisoning, dehumanizing and re-educating, not just Jews but gentiles, and even Germans themselves, was much vaster than previously believed.

Last March, the New York Times, in a story headlined "The Holocaust just got more shocking," reported on the results of research by the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum, which 13 years earlier, began cataloguing all the ghettos, slave-labour sites, concentration camps and killing factories that the Nazis had set up throughout Europe.

Seven decades after the fact, the results, to be contained in 12 encyclopedic volumes, showed there were some 42,500 Nazi camps and ghettos throughout Europe from 1933 to 1945. The figure staggered many Holocaust scholars.

"The numbers are so much higher than what we originally thought," said one. "Unbelievable."

The final bewildering list tabulated 30,000 slave-labour camps; 1,150 Jewish ghettos; 980 concentration camps; 1,000 prisoner-of-war camps; 500 brothels filled with sex slaves; and thousands of other camps used for police detention, euthanizing the elderly and infirm, performing forced abortions, "Germanizing" prisoners or transporting victims to killing centres. There were re-education camps for doctors, professors, lawyers, librarians, and even philosophers.

About the only Holocaust historian not shocked at the new figures was Robert Jan van Pelt of the University of Waterloo and the University of Toronto, who has conducted his own research, which closely parallels the results of the USHMM.

"The older number of 25,000 was a number that I knew quite well," van Pelt told The CJN. Asked if the new findings surprised him, he replied, "no, absolutely not."

One of the world's leading experts on Auschwitz, van Pelt is careful to point out that the first part of the title to his Nov. 5 talk for Holocaust Education Week – "The Holocaust Just Got More Shocking" – was not his idea, but that the second part – "The Camp as Form of Life in Nazi Germany" – was.

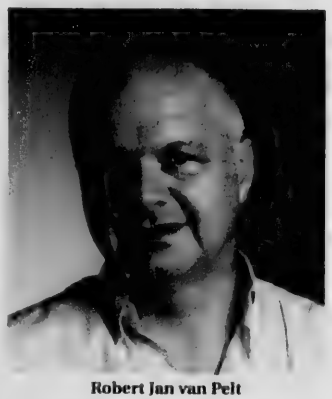
That's because his research reveals that camps which served either to punish or indoctrinate blanketed Germany even before World War II. They were considered a normal part of German life.

The proliferation of "betterment" camps in Germany in the mid-1930s "was a key element in the formation of a state and society that was willing to use internment, forced labour, concentration, and death camps as a common tool of politics," van Pelt's research has shown.

He believes that as many as 90 per cent of Germans who came of age during the Third Reich had some experience with being incarcerated for non-criminal offences.

"When people start talking about camps in Nazi Europe, what comes to mind are the concentration camps," van Pelt told The CJN in an interview prior to his talk at Shaar Shalom Synagogue. "In fact, the concentration camps are only a small part of this enormous phenomenon of German-controlled camps that covered the continent… these camps were everywhere, not only in 1944, but earlier."

Among the thousands of pre-war camps, van Pelt has been able to distinguish at least 44 different kinds in Germany alone. There were camps for "Aryans," for party functionaries, for the SS, "re-education" camps for lawyers, artists, physicians, civil servants and managers, for men and for women, and for the young and the very old. Pro-Nazi thinker Martin Heidegger even ran one for philosophers.



Robert Jan van Pelt

The idea was to Germanize and later, to Nazify. "Ideologically, they were dedicated to the idea of renewal and regeneration outside the confines of civil society," van Pelt noted.

In 1933, the Nazis quickly and effectively brought all of these initiatives under their control. By 1935, labour service camps for young men prior to military service were mandatory.

These were harsh places: hair was shorn, uniforms were mandatory and a tough physical regimen followed. There was little or no freedom.

Van Pelt sees a continuum between these early camps and the later Nazi death mills.

The camps helped create the "Nazi Man – the human being who was conditioned to be a bystander and ready to become a perpetrator. [They] created the human being who was willing to tolerate and even operate the other camps—the camps meant for 'The Other.' [They] created the preconditions for the Holocaust."

A special monthly message for the Baycrest community

CommunityMatters

Celebrating our community's Precious Legacy

Neuberger Holocaust Education Week is always an important time of reflection at Baycrest Health Sciences—not only because of the significance of remembrance, but because our Holocaust programs provide support for the largest cohort of survivors in Canada.

This year, as part of our commemoration of Neuberger Holocaust Education Week, we are inviting our community to visit Baycrest for a special photographic exhibition called Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life. This unique exhibit showcases the striking black and white photography of Elliot Sylman, himself the child of a Holocaust survivor.

This poignant collection features portraits of 180 survivors drawn from our own residents and program participants at the Terraces of Baycrest, the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, and our Café Europa program.

The title of this exhibit refers to the collection of Judaica from the Jewish Museum in Prague, which toured selections from the more than 200,000 objects, books, artistic artifacts and printed material collected by the Nazis from Jewish communities across Europe during the Second World War as anti-homage to Jewish life in what the Third Reich had intended as a "Museum of an Extinct Race."

What is unique about our exhibit is that it features not the symbols and objects of Jewish life, but the actual survivors who bravely brought themselves and their culture to a new life here in Toronto. Each of the photos is both moving and thought provoking, and presents an incredibly human reminder of the importance of remembrance and keeping survivors' legacies alive for generations to come.

To be sure, artifacts are also an important cultural reminder of our Jewish roots, and we are proud to complement our new photo exhibit with free access to The Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum. Our museum is a place for people of all ages to discover and enjoy the history and beauty of Judaic heritage.

In addition, Baycrest offers a range of programs and support for survivors and their families including drop-in programs, specialized services for child survivors and second-generation support groups. We also produce a series of unique publications focused on care giving for survivors.

It's important to know that these types of cultural, educational and support programs are fully funded by grants and the generosity of our donors—they are not paid for from our provincial operating funds. Yet they remain an intrinsic part of what makes Baycrest such a special place for our residents, clients and our community.

Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life is generously co-sponsored by Marilyn and Stephen Sinclair and the WordCheck Translation team in honour of Honey and Barry Sherman for their outstanding leadership and commitment to Holocaust education.

The photos will be on display until Jewish Heritage Month next May, and are free for the community to view inside our Bathurst Street entrance. The entire collection of photographs can also be accessed on our website, along with supporting curatorial information and artistic statements, at baycrest.org/preciouslegacy.

I invite you to take part in our commemoration of Neuberger Holocaust Education Week, and I welcome your feedback at community@baycrest.org.

Milstein links donors with 'worthwhile projects'

JNF Canada gets new shaliach

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The new shaliach for the Jewish National Fund of Canada, Yossi Milstein, said he's eager to build relationships with Canadian donors who want their contributions to benefit meaningful projects.

"My job is to liaise between Canadian donors and worthwhile projects in Israel and to make sure that the hard-earned money that people donate is put to good use," said the 60-year-old Milstein, who arrived in Toronto last month from Israel for a two-year term with JNF Canada.

Milstein is a second-generation emissary, born in Israel, but raised in a number of cities worldwide, as his father, Shraga Milstein, served as a Jewish Agency shaliach.

"I spent many years outside of Israel. I went to kindergarten in London," he said, adding that he also spent part of his teen years studying at Montreal's Herzliah High School.

Now, he's hoping to call on some of his high school buddies to help him get acquainted with Toronto's Jewish community.

"It takes time to get to know the people, and a place, and two years is a very short time for that... I have some high school friends who used to live in Montreal and now live in Toronto... I'm being helped to blend in quicker," he said.

Although working with JNF is new to Milstein, he has decades of experience in business, economics and fundraising.

In 1979, after obtaining a business degree from the New York Institute of Technology, Milstein returned to Israel, where he served the Tel Aviv municipality as an economist in the budget department, as a manager of the lands department, and as chief aide to the mayor.

"Because I knew well the mayor and the Tel Aviv Foundation – which collects money from all around the world for projects in Tel Aviv – [the Jewish Agency] asked me to help them in England."

In 1984, Milstein joined the Jewish Agency's aliyah department in London. That year, he also established and directed the London-based Tel Aviv Foundation, which he ran for 10 years.

Today, Milstein's focus is on raising funds and awareness about an organization that he believes has an "understated" image.

"JNF is the definition of Zionism today. People know about the blue box and planting trees, but they don't really know what JNF does. The have a budget of almost 1 billion shekels a year," he said.

"In the last few years, JNF took on a few more projects.

Yossi Milstein

One is water. You know that Israel has very serious water problems. What JNF is doing is funding, especially in the south, water reservoirs and clever ways of collecting water."

He explained that JNF has developed a new way to capture and make use of winter floodwaters from the Arava River to compensate for the water lost to the heat in the summer months.

He also talked about JNF's ambition to develop settlements in the Negev, by building on the local economy and the transportation infrastructure.

"Today, [JNF is] not just about planting trees. There is a very wide variety of projects that someone interested in donating to a project can find anything they desire. It's just a question of bridging the gap and matching the person to the project," Milstein said.

"I want to help donors and serve as their adviser to make sure their money goes to good use. A lot of the funds raised for Israel today, only a small portion reaches Israel... JNF prides itself on the fact that 100 per cent of the money goes to Israel."

Holocaust art at Kitchener gallery

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Christian Bernard Singer recalls the stories his great-grandmother used to tell her family about letters she would get from relatives in Europe before the war. The letters would ask their fortunate Canadian family member for help to get out. When war broke out, the letters got increasingly "panicky" as her European relatives would frantically ask for some kind of help.

But as a poor, Yiddish-speaking immigrant trying hard to make ends meet, there was little his great-grandmother, Yetta Kramer-Fromstein, could do, Singer recalled.

"Those were the stories I heard. My grandmother told me those stories and she was very upset."

The stories "hung around me for a while" and eventually served as inspiration for an exhibition of art on Holocaust themes that is currently running at the Canadian Clay and Glass Gallery in Waterloo, Ont., Singer said.

Titled WAR: Light Within/After the Darkness, the exhibit, previously reviewed in The CJN, features the work of seven artists who "poignantly evoke the realities faced by Jews and other innocent populations during the war," states a news release about the exhibition.

Singer, curator of the gallery, called on the artists to develop works that looked "at it from a place of resistance and survival. Where there is resistance and survival there is hope and beauty."

The contributing artists, four of them Jewish, were given quite a bit of latitude to create something appropriate based on the theme, he said.

Chari Cohen, a Toronto-based artist, "did a hanging forest of ceramic trees that are suspended" over parched earth through which seedlings are sprouting. It is meant to evoke the resistance of Jewish partisans and other fighters who hid in European forests.

Another display by Kingston-area artist Laura Donefer, features an installation of glass footprints, some cast from Holocaust survivors, that evokes the forced death marches "and the last traces that they existed," said Singer.

Other artists include Mary McKenzie, Oded and Pamela Ravek, Tina Poplawski, Claire Weissman-Wilks and Helene Brunet-Neumann. Some of the artists were inspired by their own family stories.

In his great-grandmother's telling, "eventually, the letters stopped coming."

They had originated in the town of Kosów (now Kosiv), which had been home to 4,000 Jews.

Singer later learned that between October 1941 and November 1942, the Nazis shot nearly all of the town's Jews, shoving them into mass graves. The rest were sent to concentration or extermination camps.

"As for the relatives, no one ever heard from them again."

The exhibit is on display until Jan. 5, 2014.

Technion close to deal with Toronto hospitals

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Israel's Technion University and the University Health Network (UHN) in Toronto are close to finalizing an arrangement that would see "significant" collaboration in medical research.

When concluded, the agreement will see stem cell research initiated at the Haifa campus of Technion University and the engineering of the cells at Toronto labs, followed by clinical testing locally. The stem cells would target damaged heart muscles.

"The Technion and the UHN have been discussing a very significant long- term collaboration in the areas of stem cell research and its application to the cardiovascular area," said Boaz Golanyi, vice-president for external relations and resource development for Technion.

Golanyi was in Toronto last week as part of a larger visit to the university's support groups around the world.

"One of the purposes of my visit here is to solidify the meetings and lead them to completion," he said. "We are getting close to completion of the negotiations."

The UHN represents Toronto General Hospital, Princess Margaret Cancer Centre, Toronto Western Hospital and Toronto Rehabilitation Institute, which are affiliated with the University of Toronto.

In addition, the Peter Munk Cardiac Centre has been involved in the discussions.

"Each party brings to the table unique strengths," said Golanyi. "We believe [an agreement] will lead to tremendous synergy and hopefully will facilitate important breakthroughs in cardiovascular research and better ways to treat heart diseases, heart failure and the like."

Boaz Golanyi

Beyond the expectation of medical breakthroughs, Golanyi stressed the "potential for significant economic benefits for Canada and Israel," resulting from the development and commercialization of medical technologies.

Though Israel's oldest university – it was founded in 1912 – the Technion has been among the leaders in blazing new paths as "an entrepreneurial university." In addition to its focus on basic research, it actively seeks to commercialize its findings and it has played an important role as a source for innovation and training, helping make Israel a "start-up nation."

The Technion offers degrees in science and engineering, and related fields including architecture, medicine, industrial management and education. Three members of its faculty have received the Nobel Prize in the last few years, "an amazing number for such a small university," Golanyi said.

While the Canadian deal has yet to be finalized, an arrangement involving joint research has been adopted by the Technion and Cornell University. On Dec. 19, 2011, the two schools won a competition to establish a high-end applied science and engineering institution in New York City.

The Technion-Cornell Innovation Institute (TCII) has the potential to generate economic benefits to both parties, and could lead to the creation of very lucrative intellectual property, Golanyi said.

The Technion also recently "signed a major agreement with China that could lead to bigger projects than in the United States," he said.

Guangdong Province in China is investing $250 million (all figures US) into a facility that will see the Technion collaborate with Shantou University. Chinese billionaire philanthropist Li Ka-shing, who through his foundation, donated $130 million to Technion, is participating in the Chinese venture, which will see creation of the Technion Guandong Institute of Technology, said Golanyi.

This will mark "an important new bridge between Israel and China to further enhance the commercial and economic ties between the two countries.

"China is looking for everything and anything," including water treatment technology and renewable energy. "China is interested in everything that moves in Israel," he quipped.

During his visit to Toronto, Golanyi addressed a meeting of The Economic Club of Canada, which was attended by representatives of local universities. His address included a look at Israeli "entrepreneurial universities and their economic impact."

The Technion promotes applied research and it has incorporated mechanisms to encourage faculty, students and alumni to participate in startups. That creates value to the employees and shareholders of a company as well to the university, he said.

By participating in business ventures, the university generates income while reducing its dependence on government subsidies. Even more significant is the access to "partners' huge databases, which can be more important than the money itself," he added.

Bronfman's art collection on auction

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

A large collection of Canadian decorative and fine art assembled by businessman and philanthropist Charles Bronfman in the 1980s and 1990s will go onto the auction block at Toronto-based Waddingtons.ca in a series of sales beginning Nov. 6.

The so-called Claridge Collection, which formerly adorned Bronfman's offices in Montreal, consists of some 900 contemporary works by 372 artists, including pieces by most of the recipients of the Saidye Bronfman Award, now part of the Governor General's Awards.

The assortment of works includes paintings, photography, sculptures, ceramics, glass and mixed media objets d'art. Assembled over a period of about 10 years by longtime Bronfman curator Franklin Silverstone, the pieces seem particularly rich in colour and whimsy.

"My mandate was to hand pick a fun, colourful and bright collection of the top Canadian artists, sculptors and crafts people, not based on who was popular at the time," Silverstone writes in the 214-page full-colour catalogue of the sale. An accompanying 154-page manual provides biographies of all participating artists.

Beginning in the 1980s, Charles Bronfman focused on acquiring new works by emerging artists across Canada. But now his son, Stephen Bronfman, has taken over Claridge and has decided to dismantle his father's collection to focus on building his own collection of Canadian emerging art.

Proceeds from the auction will benefit Historica Canada, a national charitable organization that promotes awareness of and pride in Canadian history, identity and citizenship.

Previews of the pieces begin Oct. 31 and continue until Nov. 5. The first two sales are slated for Nov. 6 – decorative arts at 1 p.m., fine arts at 7 p.m. A third sale is planned for 2014.

On a recent morning in Waddington's second-floor exhibition space above King Street East, Silverstone was asked to point out a few of his favourite works. He led this reporter from one piece to another like a bee going from flower to flower, offering a few words of praise about each. He highlighted an earthenware teapot by Greg Payce, raku pottery by Wayne Ngan and John Pickering, wood maquettes by Alan Wood, a self-portrait in clay by Victor Cicansky, and more.

All lots in the auction can be viewed online at Waddingtons.ca. The auction house is located at 275 King St. E., second floor.

Appeal for foster homes: help!

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash
B. A. (Hon), LL B.

Family Lawyer & Mediator
for 32 years

At present, within the Jewish community, there are many Jewish children who need stable, caring families to look after them until they can either return to their own families or begin to care for themselves. Within our community, there is an urgent need for foster families to care for deprived and troubled children.

The fostering of children who cannot live with their natural families is a moral and ethical duty whose basis in fact lies in biblical teaching and tradition. (See the book of Ester (2.7) and Midrash HaGadol (1:334-7).

The need for foster parents is such that Toronto's Jewish Family & Child Service and Montreal's Batshaw Youth & Family Centres have foster parent recruitment committees. These are composed of community representatives, board members and staff people, with a view to coordinating efforts to reach out to the Jewish community and promote the need for foster families. At times, these efforts are also coordinated with the other local children's aid societies whose needs are equally pressing.

Numbers of foster children at all-time high

At present, foster homes for children of all ages (infants to 16 years in Toronto, infants to 17 years in Montreal) are required but there is a particularly urgent need for foster parents interested in caring for children in their adolescence.

Generally, foster parents are asked to foster only one child, although as foster parents develop increased skill at fostering, some assume responsibility for two or three children. At times these children may be siblings, but they are just as likely to be unrelated.

Jewish Family and Child Service in Toronto has the highest number of children in care in its history. Similar conditions exist in Montreal. Rapidly changing economic and social conditions have contributed to significant changes in the fabric of the traditional family unit. Children in all strata of society, all cultures and communities have suffered as a result.

These changes will inevitably have long-term effects on the lives of children and it is doubtful that our present need for more foster parents to care for children of all ages — especially those in the mid-adolescent range — will diminish in the future. To allow both agencies to fulfill their mandates and commitment to service the needs of Jewish families in Toronto, York Region, and Montreal, Jewish families able and willing to assume a fostering role must come forward.

Help needed in both Toronto and Montreal

In Toronto JF&CS has 50 to 100 Jewish children in its care at any given time. They are individuals who:

- are at least 25 years old;
- are straight, lesbian, gay, bisexual, or transgender;
- have a sustainable income;
- are renters or homeowners with enough room for a foster youth;
- are/are not currently parents;
- are able to pass a criminal background check;
- are Jewish or have a spouse/partner who is Jewish.

The Montreal Batshaw Youth and Family Centres have their own set of standards: contact them by phone (see below) or at http://bit.ly/HgjLyp.

Those interested in exploring opportunities for care are urged to contact Jewish Family & Child Service in Toronto (416-638-7800) with their questions (ask for Intake). In Montreal, contact the Batshaw Youth and Family Centres, Jewish foster care recruitment office, at (514) 989-1885 x 1139.

To our community's shame and embarrassment, it is becoming increasingly difficult to find Jewish families to accommodate these blessed children. Are we beginning to forget Who has guided us since Sinai? "If I am not for myself, who is? And when I am for myself, what am I? And if not now, when?" — Hillel (Pirkei Avot, Chapters of the Fathers, 1:14).

Justice for victims of terrorism

Joe Oliver

Money is the lifeblood of terrorism. Terrorist organizations receive billions of dollars of support from states, organizations and individuals, yet those who supply this funding have rarely been successfully prosecuted.

That is about to change. The new Justice for Victims of Terrorism Act (JVTA) is Canada's latest tool in its effort to confront terrorism and terror financing.

The JVTA allows victims of terrorism to hold perpetrators and supporters of terrorism responsible by allowing the seizure of their assets and thwarting their access to Canada's financial system through civil litigation in Canada. The objective is to cripple terrorist infrastructure and provide justice for victims. By standing up for the rights of victims in the global fight against terrorism, perpetrators and supporters of terrorism are held accountable for their actions.

Financiers and facilitators of terrorism, unlike their front-line suicide bomber cannon fodder, fear exposure. The risk of being named in a civil suit will deter funding from potential sponsors who rely on anonymity.

Civil lawsuits leave financiers vulnerable to massive lawsuits that can deplete their funds or freeze their assets. Without funding, terrorist groups will have trouble recruiting and training their members, purchasing weapons and launching attacks.

The JVTA arrests the flow of blood by obstructing the flow of money. It turns the malicious ideas of terrorism on their head by attempting to cut off the terror economy in order to save, rather than wreak havoc on, innocent lives.

And there is of course the moral dimension. Victims are compensated for their loss and perpetrators are held to account financially. We cannot pretend it is adequate in either case, but it at least goes in the right direction.

I am heartened to see this new chapter in our fight against terrorism and thank the many courageous people who worked so tirelessly for this significant achievement. The first result: a Canadian citizen, Sherri Wise, is suing Iran for damages as a result of injuries sustained in a 1997 Hamas suicide bombing attack. This is possible because the act lifts immunity for states listed by the government of Canada as supporters of terrorism.

Canada has always taken a leadership role on the world stage against those who support terrorism. We walk the walk in sanctions against Iran, in votes at the United Nations, in closing our embassy in Tehran, in listing the Iranian Revolutionary Guard as a banned terrorist entity and in our staunch defence of Israel's right to defend itself against international terrorism and those with hostile intent.

By allowing the victims of terror to sue state sponsors of terrorism, we have created a new avenue to disrupt the actions of terrorist organizations. This law has granted victims a basic legal tool to help them rebuild their lives and ensure that others do not share their fate.

We should all celebrate that Canadians are now able to fight back against their terrorist attackers.

Joe Oliver is the MP for the Toronto riding of Eglinton-Lawrence.

CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The Jewish communities of Montreal and Toronto presented a cheque for $100,000 to Colette Roy-Laroche, mayor of Lac Mégantic, which continues to rebuild after a deadly train disaster in July.

The money was raised in the immediate aftermath of the tragedy through an emergency relief fund established by Federation CJA.

On Oct. 24, a busload of representatives from the Montreal community, headed by federation president Susan Laxer, travelled to the Eastern Townships to personally deliver the donation to the mayor, who has earned widespread admiration for her steadfastness in the town's recovery.

Among those making the trip were Irving Teitelbaum and Steve Gross, who owned Magasin Shier, a clothing store that was established by their late father-in-law in Lac Mégantic in 1940. This was the family's first store in a business that grew into a national chain encompassing Suzy Shier and La Senza.

Former employees were on hand to greet the delegation.

The relief fund collected $60,000 in Montreal and $40,000 from UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The money will go to the Fonds Avenier Lac Mégantic, a discretionary fund for various aspects of the town's rehabilitation.

"The mayor, and others who attended [the ceremony], were truly overwhelmed that the two Jewish communities care so much," Laxer said. "Funds from both communities were not an allocation of the two federations' existing annual campaigns, but rather the result of many individuals making donations online."

Victor Goldbloom, chair emeritus of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, Quebec region, who was Quebec's municipal affairs minister in the 1970s, reminded the audience of the Jewish community's 250-year history in the province.

"We are with you," he said. "We wish you the best in the future. We congratulate you on your courage and appreciate the warm welcome we have received."

Roberts developed test to diagnose heart attacks

Ottawa cardiologist honoured by JNF

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Nearly 500 people paid tribute to Dr. Robert Roberts, president and CEO of the University of Ottawa Heart Institute, at JNF Ottawa's 2013 Negev Dinner Oct. 29.

As a cardiologist, educator and scientist, Roberts has an international reputation. One of the founders of molecular cardiology, Roberts developed the MBCK test, the gold standard to diagnose heart attacks, and he discovered several genes responsible for heart disease, including the first gene for heart attacks.

"Part of the reason I am [being] honoured is because of my position at the University of Ottawa Heart Institute," Roberts said, "and I take the opportunity to thank the Jewish community for all that they have done for the Heart Institute, not just for your philanthropy, but so many of you have given of your time on our boards and committees. We are really appreciative of what the Jewish community has done for us."

Bret Stephens, a foreign affairs columnist and deputy editor of the Wall Street Journal, was guest speaker at the event. In addition to his other, and varied, journalistic experience, Stephens was named editor-in-chief of the Jerusalem Post at the age of 28, and during his tenure there, he oversaw the paper's extensive redesign.

Referring to a small group of protesters holding placards outside the entrance to the Fairmont Chateau Laurier hotel where the event was being held, Stephens questioned their knowledge of the cause they were rallying behind. Of "these young protesters outside whose sincerity I don't question, but whose IQs I do," he asked, "Why is it they are protesting a country that has done more for the environment than perhaps any other country in the world?"

He added that "No country in the world has voluntarily relinquished more land for peace than the State of Israel," and he reminded the audience that in the Middle East, only Israel ensures women's rights and gay rights as well; that only Israel has a free press; that only in Israel will a president or prime minister who is accused of a crime be convicted and jailed.

"If you are going to call yourself a liberal and progressive and do so in good conscience, the only state in the region you should be supporting, the only state that espouses your values, is Israel," he said.

Funds raised at the event will go to the Yir'on Recycled Water Reservoir, a 40,000-cubic-metre reservoir that's used to irrigate fruit orchards in the Upper East Galilee. The reservoir provides a solution for an ecologically hazardous situation by recycling effluents instead of letting them flow untreated.

Kosher slaughter not under Quebec scrutiny: CIJA

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jewish community officials have been reassured that the Quebec government's declaration that it's looking into ritual slaughter has "absolutely nothing" to do with shchitah.

Jonathan Kalles, the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' associate director of government relations in Quebec, told The CJN that a "senior official in the agriculture ministry" informed him that the government's concern is solely with certain aspects of Muslim halal slaughter.

"He said it has absolutely nothing to do with kosher slaughter. To their knowledge, there never has been a problem with kosher slaughter," Kalles said.

On Oct. 25, radio station CJAD reported that Agriculture Minister François Gendron was considering tightening regulations concerning the production of halal and kosher meat. It aired a month-old quote from Gendron in which he expressed concern about the hygiene of such practices, as well as for animal welfare.

Kalles said the minister's comment was in response to numerous complaints following the Muslim holiday of Eid, which took place in August.

It seems that some halal butchers killed a large number of animals at that time or that people slaughtered animals at home and existing regulations may not have been followed, Kalles said. "In any event, I was told no change to the regulations is imminent... At most, the ministry will enforce existing regulations more properly," he added.

Couple was in love, but 'tired and in pain'

He was then smuggled to Switzerland by a sympathetic police officer and spent the remainder of the war there.

They each moved to Israel after the war and married someone else, and each lost a spouse to cancer. They then turned to each other and married.

Fiser eventually earned a master's degree in social work in Toronto, where he worked in a psychiatric hospital, and Ferber, whose wartime story is not known, was a ballerina and teacher.

In recent years, Fiser suffered from heart problems, and Ferber had chronic back and leg pain. She needed the assistance of a walker or wheelchair, and her husband took her daily for injections for pain relief.

One neighbour said that they were in love, but were "tired and in pain."

Madan said mental illness and depression is almost always a factor in later-stage suicide, "and it is important to screen for this. People almost always give warning signs.

"People should not be afraid to ask if they think someone is at risk for suicide. It is a myth that asking someone about suicide plants an idea in their head. It is important to start a conversation."

There is lots of help available in the community, he said.

The Canadian Coalition for Seniors' Mental Health (www.ccsmh.ca) has put out a toolkit on suicide prevention and intervention, Madan said.

Richard Cummings, executive director of Jewish Family & Child, said that when he read the story of Fiser and Ferber, who were donors to JF & CS, he was "particularly saddened by the poignant love story.

"It is always sad to hear about desperation that leads to such an unfortunate ending. I am also saddened when I hear about families who were unable to reach out. At the same time, I am humbled that I do not know their story or their circumstances."

Holocaust survivors launch their memoirs

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

When Marguerite Élias Quddus was five years old, she found out that she was Jewish, but her parents kept telling her not to tell anyone that she was a Jew. That same year, authorities arrested her father and she was forced to wear the yellow star. Élias Quddus understood quickly what that symbol would mean to her life.

Growing up in Paris during the start of World War II, Élias Quddus and her older sister learned to remain silent about their identity. During the Holocaust, the sisters went to live in convents around Europe and pretended to be Catholics. Both survived the war.

Years later, Élias Quddus turned that harrowing story of survival into a memoir. Her short novel, In Hiding (published in French as Cachée) was one of five Holocaust survivor memoirs that the Azrieli Foundation launched Sunday at the opening event for 2013's Holocaust Education Week (HEW).

"My thoughts turned to an idea in chassidic thought. They say the telling of a story can itself save the world," said Naomi Azrieli, chair and CEO of the Azrieli Foundation.

"When we celebrate survivor's stories, there is this terrible weight of knowing that there are millions of stories of millions of victims that have never been told. In the sharing of a story, you can save the memory of a person. In keeping a memory alive, you also prevent a kind of second death… the death of when a person or event is forgotten."

The memoirs are a part of the Azrieli Foundation's Holocaust Survivor Memoirs program. This organization has published 40 stories in English and French that are written by Holocaust survivors who immigrated to Canada after the war.

The Azrieli Foundation also turned these five new stories into short films that show the author reading from the memoir, as well as animated sequences that bring their story to life.

The other memoirs launched were If Only It Were Fiction by Elsa Thon, Vanished Boyhood by George Stern, Survival Kit by Zuzana Sermer and If, By Miracle by Michael Kutz.

When writing her story, Élias Quddus also illustrated several pictures in it with crayon. "It took me eight years to do the book," she said in an inteview. "It was so difficult to write the story. I wrote in rhyme because of the musicality. It helped me to get all of the emotions out."

When printing In Hiding, the Azrieli Foundation took out the rhyming patterns but kept her illustrations.

Élias Quddus, who lives in the Montreal area, now speaks at conferences and to many university students about her life in Europe during the Holocaust. "I do everything I can to make people know what happened," she says. "That's what makes me get up every day, to do my duty. It keeps my brain working. I am doing something useful."

Holocaust Education Week, now in its 33rd year, runs through Nov. 9 across the Greater Toronto Area and other regions of Ontario. There are more than 150 diverse programs happening across Ontario for HEW, says Mira Goldfarb, executive director of the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, which organizes HEW.

"Survivors are sadly leaving us and also losing their ability to speak with strength and coherence about their narratives," Goldfarb said. "There has been a very tremendous effort on the part of Jewish organizations… to record and print those narratives."

Among the various programs set to run during the week are survivor testimonies, musical performances and film screenings. It is considered "the largest educational forum of its kind featuring world-renowned experts and Holocaust survivors."

In 2013, the Azrieli Foundation distributed over 11,000 copies of these survivor memoirs to high school classes from Newfoundland to the Northwest Territories. They are available free of charge to schools and Holocaust education programs, the funding coming from the foundation, donors and the sale of the books.

"If history were taught in the form of stories, it would never be forgotten," Azrieli said, drawing on a quote from author Rudyard Kipling. "We see that in the response of readers and students, after reading the memoirs, they want to learn more about the Holocaust."

Seniors raise their voices in song

Yankel Gladstone, a resident of the Terraces at Baycrest, wants to take his musical theatre group on the road.

He established the 22-member group when he moved to the Terraces three years ago, and until now it has only performed at the Terraces.

"We put on Sholom Aleichem's Esrog for Sukkot, and I would love to perform it at other retirement homes, said Gladstone, who at 88, is one of the group's youngest members. The oldest is 100, and the average age is in the mid-90s.

The founder, leader, script writer, and director of the chorus, Gladstone, originally from Montreal, came to the Terraces from New York, where he worked for a number of years.

"I was lonely here. I had an active life in New York, and I needed something here to keep me busy," he said.

"I volunteered to run a Yiddish-speaking group, and then I decided to get creative and asked [members] if they wanted to sing. We've never stopped."

His group is dedicated and committed, he said. "They love singing, and they've really bonded. They've embraced each other like family."

They work hard, though. "They call me a taskmaster. We rehearse often, and I meet with the actors privately to help them with their lines."

Everyone is welcome, he said. "A lot of people tell me they can't sing, but they end up as part of the group. I'm a good talent scout."

Being part of the group has been good for everyone, said Gladstone. "One man knocked on my door and said he's a new person since he joined, and the daughter of one of the members thanked me.

"Another man, who is now in palliative care, insisted on coming to the performance in his wheelchair. He just had to be part of the show."

What we've lost, and the road ahead

Guest Voice

Franklin Bialystok

Gerald Tulchinsky, our foremost scholar of Canadian Jewry, concludes his 2008 magisterial survey, Canada's Jews: A People's Journey by comparing our lives in Canada to those of our grandparents. Titled Oyfn Veg (On the Road), Tulchinsky ties what we have "lost," such as Yiddish, farm colonies and smaller communities, leadership in organized labour, and the vibrant street life of the immigrant community, to what we have achieved: a prominent position in the mainstream of Canadian society.

Were he to reprise his analysis today, he might add that we have also transformed our voice on the national stage. While we once spoke through Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) on behalf of Canada's Jews, human rights, and community relations, we now speak from a more centralized and homogeneous group of advocates.

CJC, founded in 1919 by a broad consortium of religious, business, labour and professional leaders from across the country, reflected our diversity. Dependent upon the financial support of Jewish contributions to UJA, CJC, with a small staff at the national and regional levels, but with a veritable army of volunteers, was active in working with other ethno-cultural communities, boards and ministries of education, police, and all levels of government to protect Canadians from hate speech, unfair employment and housing practices, and discrimination on the basis of religion, appearance, and gender.

CJC was not without its faults and was subject to criticism for overlapping its activities with those of federations and other community-supported advocacy organizations. It was criticized by some for being too close to the federal Liberal party and for a leadership that did not reflect the diversity of its members. There is some justification for these views. In recent years, there was no clear line of demarcation between CJC's advocacy on behalf of Israel from the mandate of the Canada-Israel Committee, nor did it distinguish its advocacy on university campuses from that of Hillel.

From its re-emergence in 1933 to 1960, its spokespeople were almost exclusively well-to-do males, bastions of the established Conservative and Reform elite. Yet, in this era, it lobbied for the immigration of European Jewry, teamed with B'nai Brith Canada and the Zionist Organization of Canada to create the Joint Community Relations Committee, and was at the forefront of the movement to abolish exclusionary laws based on race and religion.

From the 1960s to its demise in 2011, its membership spanned the spectrum of the community, its leaders numbering women, workers and educators. Its meetings were marked by spirited debates. Steadfastly apolitical, Congress reflected the values of most Canadian Jews and its brand was a model for advocates for other ethno-cultural minorities.

CJC has been subsumed by an umbrella organization that has condensed the myriad advocacy groups into a central body. By our silence, Canadian Jewry has ceded advocacy to a small number of individuals who purport to speak with a single voice in our name. This is not surprising, as many Jews perceive that anti-Semitism in Canada is growing and that support of the policies of the government of Israel is primary. In that sense, the demise of CJC is a reflection of who we are now and the road that we have chosen.

Comfortably ensconced in Canada's mainstream, we may be projecting an image of a unified community, but the price is our heritage of respectful debate and diversity.

A symposium on Canadian Jewish studies in honour of Gerald Tulchinsky will be held at the University of Toronto's Jackman Humanities Building, at Bloor and St. George Streets, Room 101, on Sunday, Nov. 17, from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. All are welcome. No registration or entrance charge. See http://cjs.utoronto.ca for details.

Monument to be dedicated

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — All 577 Jews who are known to have been killed while serving in the Canadian military during World Wars I and II and the Korean War are now memorialized at the Baron de Hirsch-Back River Cemeteries.

The names of almost 300 more fallen Canadian Jewish servicemen are now inscribed on new monuments at the Baron de Hirsch-Back River Cemeteries.

A three-piece monument will be dedicated at the de la Savane Road cemetery on Remembrance Day, Nov. 11 at 11 a.m.

The names of all 577 are inscribed on the memorial.

The cemetery, which is the largest Jewish cemetery in Canada and one of the oldest, has had a large monument in its veterans' section since after World War II.

But it contained only about 300 names, said Larry Rosenthal who has been instrumental in ensuring that all Canadian Jewish casualties be recognized.

Cemetery executive director Jay Aaron said the original monument, which is about 20 feet high, did not have room to add any more names. So, the cemetery, with some donations, underwrote the cost of adding two smaller monuments on either side of the main one.

"This is really something quite special for the cemetery – and the community," Aaron said.

Rosenthal sees it as the completion of the 41 years of effort he has made to have the contribution of Canadian Jewish servicemen in wartime recorded and honoured.

"This is very emotional for me. It's something that's been on my mind for so many years," he said. "My brother died for what he believed in. No sacrifice was too great, he felt, to stop fascism."

The 577 names are from the Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee National Archives, which for years has been researching and compiling the Canadian Jewish war dead. That project, which Rosenthal urged CJC to undertake, has brought to light a significant number of casualties, the vast majority from World War II, who were previously unknown to that national Jewish organization.

Names and basic data are available on its Canadian Jewish Casualties in the Armed Forces website, with additional material such as photos and letters uploaded as they become available.

The dedication ceremony will be conducted by Rabbi Moishe New, director of Chabad's Montreal Torah Centre.

The Byzantine period in Israel

Past Forward
Alex Gropper

The Byzantine period in Israel is one of those historical eras that falls between the cracks. It's not quite ancient, nor is it medieval. This is the period between the fall of the Roman Empire in the West and its survival in a changed form in the East. It's a transitional age between Roman rule and that of Islam after 638 CE. It also sees the emergence of Christianity as the official religion of first the Roman Empire and then its surviving eastern half.

The Byzantine Empire gets its name from the Greek colony of Byzantium, located on the Bosphorus, the body of water that joins the Mediterranean via the Aegean to the Black Sea. This is one of the most strategic places in the world. The Roman Emperor Constantine named the city after himself, Constantinople, the city of Constantine, after he permanently moved the capital of the Roman Empire there in 330 CE.

Byzantium was ideally located between the major areas of conflict in the empire, the Rhine-Danube frontier in the north and the eastern border with the Persian/Iranian speaking Sassanian Empire in the East.

The region of the eastern Mediterranean where Constantinople was located had been Greek-speaking since the time of Alexander's conquests in the fourth century BCE, if not even earlier. It would remain predominantly Greek-speaking for 1,000 years until the time of the Muslim conquests in the seventh century CE. This use of Greek is also quite evident in Israel, which had been renamed Palestine by the Romans after the second Jewish Revolt led by Simon Bar Kochba from 132 to 135 CE. The Romans chose this name because it was the Latin name of the Philistines, who had been Israel's greatest enemy in its early history.

The Greek language had been evident in the land for quite a while, judging by the number of inscriptions that have been found there since the Hellenistic period (the period from the conquests of Alexander to the victory of Octavius over the forces of Antony and Cleopatra at the Battle of Actium in 31 BCE). Although the land was briefly independent under the Hasmoneans (the family of Judah the Maccabee), it became a Roman client state after Pompey's takeover in 67 BCE and its subsequent rule by the Idumean dynasty of Herod the Great.

Dating to the Byzantine period in the fifth century CE, we have one of the major archeological finds of the past two years in Israel, that of the inscribed and illustrated mosaic floor of the synagogue at Tel Huqoq in the Galilee. Not that long ago, it was thought that there wasn't much of a Jewish presence in the land after the desolation of the two failed revolts against Rome. Over the years, archeology has overturned this view, showing that there was a vibrant Jewish life in Palestine centering on synagogues, many of which have been excavated since the Six Day War.

A grateful perspective

Midrashic Moments
Rachael Turkienicz

In the upcoming Torah portions, we read about Jacob, Rachel and Leah building their families. Their sons will become the ancestors of the 12 tribes of Israel, but we know very little about them. In fact, the most we know about each of their sons is the angst of their parents and the meanings of their names. None of it seems very positive.

Reuben, the first born, is named by Leah as a testament to her suffering. Simon, her next son, is named to commemorate that God has heard her cries. Each of the sons' names, with few exceptions, signify another moment of tension and competition that permeated all aspects of the parents' lives.

The exception that speaks volumes is the naming of Judah. The reason for his name, as stated by his mother Leah, is that she gives thanks to God. The aspect of gratitude unfolds as simultaneously simple and complex.

Leah's life is anything but easy. She was substituted for her sister in a wedding contract and subsequently gains the hatred of her husband. Hatred is the word that the Torah uses, and it serves to have us understand how difficult everyday life must be for her. Rachel is her biological sister, which means they enter their marriages to Jacob with all their childhood sibling baggage intact. Life must be a constant challenge.

And yet Leah thinks to show gratitude to God when Judah is born. Not only does she show thankfulness, she teaches this attribute to Reuben, her son. The midrash tells us that Reuben felt a special connection to Joseph and ends up saving his life, because he's grateful to Joseph for including him in his dream.

Joseph dreams that the sun, the moon and 11 stars bow down to him. The dream is understood by his brothers as their showing subservience to Joseph, since they viewed the 11 stars as representative of themselves. Reuben was grateful to Joseph for this dream, since it includes him with the other brothers. This detail was important to Reuben, because he had done something years before that he felt could have excluded him from the family, and yet Joseph was including him in the dream. Although it's a dream of subservience, Reuben sees a moment of gratitude toward his brother.

Although Leah leads a life of exclusion and isolation from love, she finds a moment of gratitude in the birth of a child. In fact, the rabbis of the midrash point out to us that Leah was the first of our ancestors to explicitly give thanks to God. She's responsible for introducing this foundational expression into the covenant. She shows us how each of us, as individuals, must find our moments of gratitude and teach our children to find theirs.

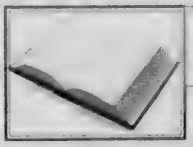
'Apatheism' is the biggest threat to Judaism

Rabbi Wayne Allen



Rabbinic Reflections

Since the end of the 18th century, there have been many who have challenged the truth and the efficacy of traditional religions. Most would be categorized as agnostics, those who are unsure if God exists. Given sufficient evidence, agnostics are willing to change from doubt to certainty. But until such evidence is presented, agnostics choose to suspend belief.

Atheists, however, make a bolder claim. In contrast to theists who say they're sure God exists, atheists claim they're sure that God does not exist. Yet the real challenge to theists comes from "apatheists": those who don't care whether or not God exists.

Apatheists go through life without even thinking about whether morality is imposed from above or composed below. To the issue of God's very existence they are sublimely indifferent. Apatheists are principally concerned with their own happiness and satisfaction with little regard to grand philosophy or theology. It's not that the issues of the immortality of the soul or life after death or the nature of sin are uninteresting. They're simply irrelevant. Apatheists might even find some religious teachings compatible with their own thinking if they happen to chance upon them.

But devoting the time to intentionally exploring the possibility is not under consideration.

A teacher of mine was once confronted by an obstreperous congregant who justified his obstructionism to apikorsus, meaning religious rejectionism, from the Hebrew corruption of the word for the Greek philosopher Epicurus. My teacher responded that he paid himself too much of a compliment. He lacked both the knowledge and the interest to be a true apikoros.

For Judaism today, the threat emanates not from educated and thoughtful atheists, but from disengaged and uncaring apatheists. These are the ones who go through the motions of religious participation when it suits them. They neither object to the practices of Judaism nor embrace them. They have no interest in changing any Jewish practice, because they simply find all Jewish practice unimportant. Whether or not women are counted in the minyan, for example, is not an issue for apatheists, because they would never consider attending a minyan anyway. And in the rare circumstance when they might attend – a baby-naming, for instance – they're content to accept with equanimity whatever the religious practice is of the synagogue in which it is held. While both theists and atheists share a passion for what they believe or do not believe, apatheists have no passion and no beliefs. It's not that apatheists are alienated from Judaism. They simply have no strong feelings about Judaism whatsoever.

As apatheists grow in number, Judaism is increasingly imperiled. Judaism can survive intellectual attacks against it. Judaism has always overcome the attacks of the elite. Judaism cannot survive the indifference of the masses. What might be done to stem the growth of apatheism or counter the apatheistic trend has not yet been put on the table for discussion by the community or by synagogues. Yet without urgent redress, the trend threatens the very future of Judaism in North America, if not beyond.

Rabbi Wayne Allen is provost of the Canadian Yeshiva and Rabbinical School.

Chanukah in November

From the Bimah
Rabbi Philip Scheim

As the end of August approached and Rosh Hashanah beckoned, we could not stop commenting on how early the holidays were this year. In fact, Rosh Hashanah will never begin earlier in the Gregorian calendar than its starting date of Sept. 5 in 2013.

What was said about this year's Yamim Nora'im can also be said about Chanukah, which this year falls mostly in November. (Our American friends are overwhelmed by this year's extremely rare coinciding of Chanukah with American Thanksgiving, leading to numerous Thanksgiving-kah programs, celebrations, and, nebech, sales!)

Judaic purists, of course, will note that the holidays this year are not early, that Rosh Hashanah, as always, was observed on the first and second days of Tishrei, and Chanukah, as always, will begin on the eve of the 25th of Kislev. Such purist thinking, however, overlooks the complexities of living Jewish lives in the context of the larger world, in which two calendars regulate our lives.

Even in Israel, where newspapers will note the Hebrew date, the "English" date will appear as well, and cheques are written according to 2013, not 5774. As Jews, we live in two worlds, and it's the navigation between those worlds that offers us both challenge and opportunity.

The challenge of functioning both in 2013 and 5774 is clear. We must decide, for example, whether the seventh day of the week is Saturday, a good opportunity to shop, travel and attend to household chores, or whether that day is Shabbat, a chance to withdraw from life's hectic pace to experience prayer and community in shul, to spend time together as families, to desist from the everyday, and to rest. Shabbat and Yom Tov enable us to favour 5774 over 2013, to allow our Jewish sense of time to override the secular schedule that otherwise dominates our lives.

This balancing act calls to mind the story of the Berdichever Rebbe, Levi Yitzkak, who, we are told, had two clocks on his living-room wall, one reflecting the time in Berdichev and the other the time in Jerusalem. Just as Jews through the ages and today have straddled the Jewish and secular calendars, similarly, for so many of our people through so much of our history, their bodies were situated in lands throughout the world, while their hearts found their way eastward, to Jerusalem.

So the challenge is clear: how are we to live successful lives in a largely non-Jewish environment while at the same time remaining true to our Jewish selves?

This year, when Christmas falls weeks after the last Chanukah candle will have burned out, there will be no Jewish holiday to compensate for the massively joyous celebrations that will surround us.

Our being able to cling to 5774 as 2013 winds down, while wishing our Christian friends, neighbours and family members well on their sacred festival, and our willingness to focus on our Jewish selves through synagogue, community, study and Israel will attest to our success in weathering the challenge of our dual-calendar destiny.

U.S. promises to consult with Israel on Iran

David Horovitz
The Times of Israel

The United States will inform and consult with Israel about any nuclear deal world powers arrive at with Iran before it is carried out, because the Jewish state's security is paramount, Under Secretary of State for Political Affairs Wendy Sherman said in an interview with Israel's Channel 10 on Sunday.

Wendy Sherman

"Whatever agreement we reach, Israel will know about, understand and [will have] consulted with us on, because Israel's security is bedrock and there is no closer security relationship than what we have with each other," she said.

Throughout the interview, however, the United States' chief nuclear negotiator refused to disclose details of the talks between the P5+1 countries (the United States, Russia, China, United Kingdom, and France, plus Germany) and Tehran, which are set to reconvene later this week.

Sherman noted that, unlike previous talks, the latest round with Iran showed "for the first time a serious and substantive negotiation," and Tehran's silence about the particulars of the talks "speaks to the seriousness of the negotiations."

She dismissed any comparison of the current talks to the Munich Conference in 1938, in which appeasement of Nazi Germany by British prime minister Neville Chamberlain administration compromised . Czechoslovakian security, helping trigger World War II.

"We haven't agreed to anything yet," Sherman said, reiterating the mantra of her boss, U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, that "no deal is better than a bad deal." She emphasized that the United States had yet to agree to lift painful sanctions crippling Iran's economy. Nor, she said, would an initial time-buying agreement remove "the fundamental architecture of the oil and banking sanctions."

"We must... assure ourselves that Iran will not be able to have a nuclear weapon," Sherman said.

Answering a query as to whether the United States trusts the sincerity of Iran and Iranian President Hassan Rouhani, Sherman said there was a great deal of mutual distrust and that world powers "approach these negotiations to try to deal with Iran's nuclear program and [U.S] President [Barack] Obama's commitment that Iran not obtain nuclear weapons."

Addressing Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's comments at the UN that Israel would stand alone against Iran if need be, Sherman remarked that the best resolution to the issue of Iran's nuclear program was "a peaceful negotiated solution" and that Netanyahu was well aware of the fact.

"Israel knows as well as any country, if not better than any country, the cost of war, the cost of military action," she said.

eBay apologizes for Holocaust memorabilia

JTA

LONDON — The online auction website eBay apologized over the weekend for allowing Holocaust memorabilia to be sold under its auspices.

The site removed about 30 items for sale within hours of an investigative report published in the Sunday edition of the Daily Mail. The report went up on the newspaper's website late Saturday night.

"We are very sorry these items have been listed on eBay and we are removing them," eBay said in a statement Sunday. "We don't allow listings of this nature, and dedicate thousands of staff to policing our site and use the latest technology to detect items that shouldn't be for sale.

"We very much regret that we didn't live up to our own standards. We have made a donation to charity to reflect our concern."

Among the items being offered for sale were a complete Auschwitz uniform, yellow Stars of David armbands worn by Jews during World War II, a Holocaust victim's suitcase and a pair of shoes belonging to a death camp victim.

eBay makes 10 per cent of the final sale of items auctioned on its site.

According to the Daily Mail, the items were being sold by Viktor Kempf, a self-proclaimed historian living in Vancouver.

Kempf told the newspaper he bought the clothes from a reputable dealer in America. He was asking $18,700 for a striped uniform reputedly worn by a prisoner in Auschwitz.

"I understand why people may think profiting is wrong but I sell these items to document [them] and to fund my book projects. If I was a descendant of a victim, I would want to see how my relatives lived. I would want to buy these items to remember them," he told the Daily Mail.

"I have had criticism in the past and I find it upsetting. I don't want people to think I'm just doing it for the money. These periods in history are horrific, nobody should ever forget them," he said.

The Daily Mail reported that Kempf was also selling concentration camp "trousers" with an estimate price of between $8,300 and $9,300. The trousers are said to have belonged to a Dawid Bittersfeld, who died at Auschwitz, and, according to Kempf, were "bought many years ago in Krakow, Poland" from his family.

Earlier in the week, it was still possible to find pages of Nazi-related items for sale on eBay Canada, mostly books about the Nazi era, but some vintage photographs, currency, coins and postage stamps.

Online classified sites, such as Craigslist, commonly list Nazi-era items for sale. Earlier this week, you could find on Vancouver Craigslist a reproduction of an SS Panzer officer's hat for $125; Third Reich posters for $250; a Nazi-era coin, $10; an SS dress uniform ceremonial dagger, $200, and a Hitler Youth pin, $100.

B'nai Brith Canada praised eBay and urged Amazon to follow its lead and pull Holocaust and Nazi-related items from its online catalog. Amazon has been criticized recently for offering Nazi items and paraphernalia online.

"eBay has done the right thing in pulling Holocaust items from its website," said B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant, said in a statement. "We hope that Amazon will take its corporate responsibility seriously and do the same. Selling items of this nature is not only an affront to those who perished in the Holocaust, but all those who suffered under the Nazi regime."

NSA reportedly spies on Israel

JTA

NEW YORK — Israel has been the target of spying by the U.S. National Security Agency and also collaborates on intelligence gathering with the United States, the New York Times reported.

The Times in its report published Nov. 2, citing documents leaked by former NSA contractor Edward Snowden, said the NSA tracked "high-priority Israeli military targets," including drones and the Black Sparrow missile system. The report also shows that the United States has spied on world leaders, including Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Khamenei and UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon.

Modern Orthodox girls join protest

Hundreds gather at Wall for peaceful prayer

Times of Israel and JTA

The pluralistic prayer group Women of the Wall celebrated its 25th anniversary Monday, with hundreds of women praying at the Western Wall amid whistles and jeers, but no violence, to mark the start of the Jewish month of Kislev.

Some 700 women from throughout Israel participated in the special service on Monday morning, with hundreds of men surrounding them in solidarity.

Police were on hand to keep order for the monthly prayer meeting, which has been the source of tension, and sometimes violence in the past.

Girls affiliated with the modern Orthodox Bnei Akiva movement joined haredi girls at the Western Wall to protest the prayer service.

Women of the Wall arrive at the Western Wall to pray and read from the Torah at the beginning of each Jewish month, irking some worshippers with their prayer shawls and phylacteries, and tefillin, which most Orthodox rabbis maintain should only be donned by men.

Loud whistles and jeers rang out across the Western Wall plaza, centring on a packed women's section, and an observer said that a few small scuffles broke out, but were quickly broken up.

In recent months, leading haredi rabbis and activists have mobilized thousands of haredi girls to pray at the Wall during Women of the Wall's services, at times effectively blocking the group from reaching the Wall.

Monday marked the first time that modern Orthodox schools sent students to participate in the service by the haredi girls.

Women of the Wall spokesperson Shira Pruce told JTA that the move offended several of her group's members who are affiliated with Bnei Akiva.

"Many women are outraged that an organization that represents them would oppose Women of the Wall," Pruce said. "They're not saying the organization should take a side at all, but it's offensive to many that they would teach their children to protest a women's prayer at the Kotel."

Last month, the women's prayer service coincided with a special prayer session for the health of the ailing Rabbi Ovadia Yosef, the former chief rabbi and the late spiritual leader of the haredi Shas party. Rabbi Yosef died several days later.

Also last month, Women of the Wall agreed in principle to transfer its monthly prayer services to a newly built egalitarian plaza and withdraw its demand to hold services in the women's section of the Western Wall.

However, the group stated that it would only do so once all of its 16 conditions were met, among them for funding equal to the traditional prayer sites and the creation of a continuous plaza at the wall to connect them all.

In August, the government unveiled the new platform for egalitarian prayers, but the group's chair Anat Hoffman harshly criticized the plan at the time.

"The government of Israel decided as a 'gift' for Rosh Hashanah to solve the issue... by building this sunbathing deck," she accused then, charging that the site "is a way of building a second-rate wall for second-rate Jews. I refuse to accept it."

Rabbi Noam Marans, the American Jewish Committee's director of interreligious and intergroup relations, will address a commemoration organized by the Action Reconciliation Service for Peace.

In Weimar, American expatriate musician Alan Bern is co-ordinating a sound installation that will include the ringing of hand bells at former Jewish homes and businesses; citizens will then broadcast the music of once-banned composers from their doors and windows. Also, church bells will be rung across the city.

"The city should be flooded with the sounds of bells and once-forbidden music, bearing witness to what happened in 1938 but also celebrating the freedom we have today," Bern said.

U.S. Holocaust Museum to get war crimes archive

JTA

NEW YORK — The United Nations will give the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington, D.C., its archive documenting the actions of thousands of Nazi war criminals, the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations said.

Samantha Power told an Anti-Defamation League conference on Oct. 31 that the entire archive will benefit scholars "at a time when Holocaust denial is embraced by many who prefer diversionary fantasies to inconvenient facts."

The unrestricted records of the United Nations War Crimes Commission, relating to more than 10,000 cases in Europe and Asia, were put online in early July by the International Criminal Court after an agreement with the UN. However, thousands of files remained restricted.

The War Crimes Commission was established in 1943 by 17 allied nations to issue lists of alleged war criminals.

Defence Secretary Chuck Hagel, addressing the ADL conference later on Oct. 31, announced the sale to Israel of six V-22 Ospreys, a tilt-rotor aircraft he said would "greatly enhance the range and effectiveness of Israeli special forces."

Hagel also said it was critical to explore all peaceful options in resolving tensions with Iran over its nuclear program, a note sounded repeatedly in recent weeks in Obama administration meetings with Jewish leaders.

"As we engage Iran along with our partners, we are very clear eyed about the reality in the Middle East," Hagel said.

"Iran is a state sponsor of terror, responsible for spreading hatred and extremism throughout the region. But foreign policy is not a zero-sum game. If we can find ways to resolve disputes peacefully, we are wise to explore them."

Differences between Israel and the United States have emerged over the last week over whether Iran should be allowed to maintain any uranium enrichment capacity as part of a deal to end the sanctions that have crippled its economy.

Hagel also announced that he would take action against a handful of states that are not abiding by federal directives to extend benefits to same-sex spouses of military personnel.

Neo-Nazi's appeal earns him extra year in jail

JTA

A Frenchman who helped desecrate 90 Jewish and Muslim graves had his jail term extended by one year following his failed appeal for a lighter sentence.

The Colmar court of appeals sentenced Nicolas Lecureur, 24, to a year in prison Oct. 30 for his actions, which he committed in eastern France in 2010 with two accomplices, Jonathan Husser and Matthias Leyer, according to L'Alsace.

All three men began serving an 18-month jail term in June 2012, but Lecureur appealed the sentence, claiming to have new evidence that proves his innocence.

But the court found the evidence – soundless footage of Lecureur speaking with an attorney of one of the other men – inadmissible and handed Lecureur another year in jail, L'Alsace reported.

The graves that the three men desecrated were in Strasbourg. The perpetrators painted swastikas on them and wrote "Juden Raus," German for "Jews out," on some graves, according to Le Figaro. They smashed other graves.

The court also learned that Lecureur was in the habit of punctuating text messages with the words "sieg" and "heil." Lecureur has at least one Nazi-themed tattoo and used to wear a Nazi Iron Cross pendant.

His father told the court Wednesday that the son's neo-Nazism was mostly a fashion statement. "He is not a political skinhead," the father was quoted as telling the court.

The judge also increased the $1,300 fine imposed on Lecureur last year to $6,400.

Caplans donate Ambulance to Magen David Adom

It may have been damp and cloudy but everyone was all smiles as family and friends gathered recently to help Marion and Lazarus Caplan celebrate the dedication of the Mobile Intensive Care Unit ambulance they have generously donated to Magen David Adom Israel in honor of their late parents on the occasion of their 50th Wedding Anniversary.

Discovery Channel head started at the bottom

Paul Lewis

Rosalin Krieger
Special to The CJN

"I always had the need to tell stories," Paul Lewis confides.

The British-born, married, father of two girls and self-confessed "total nerd" is the president and general manager of Discovery Channel Canada. He is an affable but unassuming risk-taker with a distinguished Canadian media career that stretches back to 1979 with the CBC, where he spent 14 years as a journalist on Sunday Report.

In 1534, he jumped over to cable's fledgling Discovery Channel to launch television's first science magazine show, now called Daily Planet.

"My parents knew I was a creative person" who needed an outlet, he explained. But he rejected a "painful and solitary writer's life." He enrolled in Ryerson University's journalism program and paid his dues "right at the bottom" as a copy clerk, an entry-level position in Saskatoon, which he made the most of.

"I realized," Lewis said, "that you could just take the job at face value, do what you're supposed to do and do it probably for the rest of your life or you could seize the opportunity, make connections, offer to do more... be proactive, and that was a great strategy. I always gave them more than what they expected. 'Can I give you two more than that?' I would ask. 'Can I interview this person? Can I write this news story?'"

Lewis made a point of cultivating relationships, anywhere and everywhere.

"You'd bump into somebody in a bathroom and you start up a conversation and all of a sudden you're friends. It's like, 'Hey, can I help you out in some way?' You had to grab opportunities and I think that's even more so now, because broadcasting is shrinking."

So much work is contract based, he said, that you need to position yourself as a content provider.

Being the only Jew in a Saskatoon newsroom in 1979 was interesting.

"People didn't even know what a bagel was," Lewis joked. "I'd get them shipped to me and people were looking at them."

And they would tell him, "I've never met a Jewish person before." It was a great opportunity to educate, Lewis recalled with a smile.

Being Jewish is "part of my thinking, the way I approach things, my sense of humour, the way you relate to people, it's different. I've tried to take the values that I've learned at home and apply them in the work environment, the way I relate to people, the way I approach everything...things have changed now. At the beginning it was constantly explaining what I was doing, who I am," and that being Jewish is "such a broad definition, there's many different types of Jews."

Lewis said aspiring media-content producers should have a sense of humour. "It is so important, absolutely critical," he said Also understand that nobody's going to get it right all the time, so keep trying. You're "constantly reacting...its 24/7 on shpilkes."

It's not for the "faint of heart or people who don't like change."

Discovery channel is producing The History of the Jewish Canadians to air in September 2014. Based on the PBS series Jews in America, the two-hour program will cover the first arrival of Jews to Canada, and Lewis promises "lots of untold stories."

Salient offers solutions in the healthcare realm

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In business, it's not always best to take the acquisition of a new piece of equipment personally.

It is, after all, a vocation. But when your business is distributing and servicing medical technology, the kind that can change people's lives, sometimes it's hard to keep your personal feelings out of it, especially when the medical device can help restore eyesight to your mom.

Jay Herman is president of Salient Medical Solutions, a Toronto-area company that distributes some of the most innovative and up-to-date medical devices anywhere on the planet. One device distributed by the firm is designed to help people suffering from macular degeneration, a loss of vision in the centre of the visual field due to damage to the retina.

The disease is debilitating no matter the background of the person afflicted. But for his mother, Zina Perleroizen Herman, it presents a particularly cruel blow. Perleroizen Herman, 92, is an artist of some renown who still lives on her own in Chomedey, a Montreal neighbourhood. Her eyesight began to deteriorate 20 years ago.

With his mother's condition in mind, Herman had been making the rounds at trade shows and medical conferences, searching for something that could be of help. About seven years ago, he heard about a device that could one day do the trick. It took years for it to be developed, built and receive governmental approval.

Today, the Visioncare CentraSight treatment program uses a tiny telescope developed in Israel by Isaac Lipshitz, an ophthalmologist with 30 years experience, that is implanted inside the eye. It works by magnifying light on a healthy part of the retina.

It's something, Herman believes, that could benefit his mother as well as thousands of other Canadian patients.

The solutions Salient provides come in the form of surgical laser and diagnostic equipment, with applications in ophthalmology, dermatology, otolaryngology, gynecology, phlebology and urology.

Innovations are constantly being introduced to the marketplace. Salient has positioned itself to acquire the best of the lot, whether or not its product name is familiar to medical practitioners.

"What we wanted to do is get people back to real medicine and properly evaluate the products [so that] doctors aren't swayed by a product name, but by what it does," Herman said.

"The biggest hurdle to sales is that [clinics and hospitals] have bought so much equipment over the years that doesn't do what it's supposed to do."

With laser equipment selling in the $250,000 range and even more, it's important for Salient's clients to trust they're getting the best tool for the job.

Salient does the research, acquires the best equipment, provides training and maintenance. "We look for the best of brand product. We are your global research centre," Herman said.

Generally, the best new technology is sourced in Germany, California and Israel.

Israelis develop their products quickly, perhaps as a result of the "sense of urgency" in the country, he said.

They just need a little help marketing it, he added.

When performing his due diligence, scouting out new products, Herman likes to visit manufacturers' workplaces, looking for seemingly minor clues as to the corporate culture.

"I'll walk through the halls of a company and try to judge the personalities of the people," whether they're energetic or angry. "All that matters," he said.

Servicing the equipment accounts for a big chunk of Salient's income. Herman projects that half of the company's revenues will come from that aspect of the business. "We call it an annuity, recurring revenues," he said.

Salient is a continuation of Sigmacon Medical (Canada), which Herman joined nearly 14 years ago after a chance meeting with the former owner of the company at a martial arts club.

Herman had a background in the sciences and was working for a company in emerging health technologies. After some persuasion, Herman joined Sigmacon as vice-president of business development.

The company's business at the time included a lucrative aesthetic component – wrinkle removal, hair restoration and the like – but Herman was eager to advance its surgical side.

He attended medical conferences and devoured medical literature: "You're always up to 2 a.m. reading medical studies," he said.

He became an expert in medical technologies, even authoring a white paper distributed to eye doctors giving them the ammunition to dispel media-generated reports that greatly exaggerated the pitfalls of laser eye surgery.

The extent of his knowledge gives him credibility both with purchasers and manufacturers. He knows when he's being given a sales pitch: "I tell them, don't exaggerate. Stick to what it does well," he said. Medical practitioners can be confident he understands that the solution he's offering deals with the problem they're addressing.

Earlier this year, Herman joined with two partners to take over Sigmacon and rename it.

"We decided on a management buyout. We wanted to create a certain type of company, and we put together a group of investors and took over from the prior owners," he said. "It was the three amigos saying, 'One day we should do it' and we finally did it."

Herman was joined by Howard Miller, Salient's COO, who specializes in sales and marketing, along with a silent third partner.

Salient's financials are private, but Herman is happy to discuss the non-monetary aspect of the business – the helping side. He recounts a story in which a device supplied by the company was used to burn away a patient's tumor, while leaving healthy tissue unaffected.

"You just bought the guy five years," he was told by a doctor.

It's that kind of feedback that gives Herman lots of satisfaction. It's not something you can readily get in other lines of work.

"Medicine is a good field," he said. "You get those feel-good moments."

Bonert's Lion Seeker up for Governor General Award

Bill Gladstone
Special to The CJN

The Lion Seeker
Kenneth Bonert
Random House Canada

The Governor General's Literary Awards will be announced on Nov. 13 and among the candidates in the English-language fiction category is The Lion Seeker, a debut novel from 41-year-old Toronto novelist Kenneth Bonert about a young Jewish man who immigrates from Lithuania to South Africa before the Second World War.

Bonert was born in South Africa and raised in Johannesburg; he came to Toronto with his parents in 1989. The author of several previously published short stories and a novella, he has said that much in his first novel originated with the stories his Yiddish-speaking grandmother used to tell him about her childhood in Lithuania.

The Lion Seeker is set in the tough streets of Doornfontein, a section of Johannesburg. It tells the coming-of-age story of Isaac Helger, the son of Jewish immigrants. From his mother Isaac attains an overpowering sense of his mission: to obtain a "house of our own" for the family and to remember always the family members left behind in their ancestral village of Dusat, Lithuania.

But terrible unspoken family secrets from the past haunt him and he faces a stark moral choice as war clouds darken the horizon and threaten the Jews of Europe.

Bonert's prose rings with a robust and raw energy; it seems he has invented a rich and colourful language all his own, with many Yiddish streaks. The Lion Seekers has been compared with J. M. Coetzee's Disgrace for its ability to render the South African experience universal.

Still, it faces stiff competition in the awards: Joseph Boyden's The Orenda, Eleanor Catton's The Luminaries, Colin McAdam's A Beautiful Truth and Shyam Selvadurai's The Hungry Ghosts. No matter which book wins, one thing is clear: Bonert has made a remarkable literary debut and seems likely to reach a great many readers.

The Newcomers
Lily Poritz Miller
Sumach/ Three O'clock Press

Very few novels have been written about the Jewish experience in South Africa – and yet, astonishingly, only four years ago another Canadian novelist produced a novel that delved into the same setting and milieu and featured South African Jewish characters originally from Lithuania.

Toronto-based writer Poritz Miller's debut novel In A Pale Blue Light, focuses on Libka Hoffman, a Cape Town-born daughter of Lithuanian immigrants who finds herself, in the 1940s, at odds with South African society. Libka cannot accept South Africa's racial laws and her innocent friendships mark her as a social outcast.

Poritz Miller has followed up with a second novel, The Newcomers. The book again focuses on Libka after she and her family relocate to a small American town in New England. The family saga now treads into the postwar era, after the devastation of their loved ones back in Lithuania.

Although not nearly as daring stylistically as Bonert, Poritz Miller creates realistic and memorable characters, and weaves a gripping tale that ultimately focuses on Libka's romantic and life choices: will she settle for a dull, traditional life partner whom she doesn't love or perhaps escape to some unknown future that seems impossible to envision?

Poritz Miller reads from The Newcomers at the Barbara Frum Library, 20 Covington Rd., Toronto on Nov. 13, 7 to 8:15 p.m. She will also be interviewed by author Ayelet Tsabari at a book launch at Ben McNally Books, 366 Bay St., Nov. 28, 6 to 8 p.m.

I Kept My Promise
Gerda Frieberg
Malcolm Lester

Toronto Holocaust survivor Gerda Frieberg has written this memoir about her experiences as a Jewish child in a small town in Upper Silesia in the prewar years, then as a concentration camp inmate "behind barbed wire, forgotten by an indifferent world" for three years.

In 1940, Gerda escaped from the Jaworzno ghetto and travelled through Germany on a dangerous mission back to her hometown to retrieve an essential document for her father. Removing the Jewish star from her clothes, she donned a German pin and boarded a train. "With the pin on my lapel, and speaking fluent German, I carried on a conversation with [some German] soldiers, pretending I was one of them," she writes.

Although she attained the document and made it back to the camp, ultimately it didn't help because her father was eventually sent away to his death. "Take care of Mother till I return," were his last words to her.

Gerda spent the remainder of the war in Sosnowiec. She knew it was nearly over when an SS commander who had long tormented her suddenly became kind: he brought her some extra soup and asked her to remember that he had helped her.

The night before the Nazi commandants vacated, they told the inmates their barracks would be dynamited while they slept. Instead, the next day they were liberated.

This "legacy book" provides a succinct account of the author's story, beautifully illustrated with many photographs and documents.

Passages: Joe King, award-winning journalist, broadcaster and author of a host of books on Jewish Montreal and other subjects, died last week in Montreal at the age of 90.

Born in Toronto in 1923, King got his first job as a copy boy at the Canadian Press New Agency and worked in radio for several years before joining the RCAF in the Second World War. Afterwards he helped establish CTV's television station in Halifax where he hosted and produced many television news programs.

He also served as director of marketing and communications for Montreal's Federation CJA for 20 years, during which he met most of Israel's political leaders including David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir, Moshe Dayan and Ariel Sharon. An untiring champion of Israel, he visited the Jewish state perhaps 20 times and edited and distributed a pro-Israel geopolitical e-newsletter almost daily until several days before he died.

He once was invited into an "off-the-record" cabinet meeting headed by Meir, who noticed that he was taking notes and told him: "Young man, this is an off-the-record occasion." "I'm aware of that, I'm only taking notes with love," King replied, and Meir never said another word.

King loved Canadian Jewish history and made many intriguing discoveries about the Jews of Montreal. In his book Fabled City, he identified three villains – prime minister Mackenzie King, his justice minister Ernest Lapointe, and British high commissioner Vincent Massey – for failing to respond to the destruction of European Jews in the Nazi era.

His books include From the Ghetto to the Main (2000), The Case for Israel (2002), The Jewish Contribution to the Modern World (2004), Baron Byng to Bagels (2006), Rekindling the Torch: the Story of Canadian Zionism (2008) and Fabled City: the Jews of Montreal (2009).

The Valley explores painful subjects

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

The Valley, Joan MacLeod's latest play, explores the unexpected shared lives of strangers.

The play revolves around Connor, a troubled 18-year-old, who moves in with his mother. One day he is arrested on Vancouver's SkyTrain by a police officer who is also dealing with the effects of mental health issues within his own home.

Directed by Tarragon Theatre's artistic director Richard Rose, the Toronto premiere of The Valley runs from Nov. 6 until Dec. 15 at Tarragon's Mainspace.

"Ultimately the play is about healing, about the difficulty in healing and the different stages of healing," explains Stratford Festival veteran Ian Lake, who plays the 30-year-old officer, Dan Mulano.

"He's got a wife and a five-month-old baby at home. He's trying to be a good man, father, cop and husband and it's hard. He has a wife who is suffering from depression and he doesn't quite fathom the depths that it exists at and thinks its post-partum, hormones from pregnancy, having just had a baby or just being tired from not sleeping," Lake, who prepared for the role by spending time with Stratford police officers, says.

"He just tries to fix things as any good man will want to do. What he learns as the play progresses is that the problem goes deeper than that and it is not just offering a solution... and that it is more of a disease than just a choice."

Lake says the play explores how humanity exists in all of us and how we all need people to understand our pain and not try to fix it.

"I think this is a subject that has a stigma about it, that people don't want to acknowledge when depression really exists in their life or household and I would hope that we can take that stigma down a little bit and just tell the story on a very common, human level and have people connect to that."

"When I come to work I feel like we have an embarrassment of riches in this play – the actors, the director Richard Rose and our writer Joan MacLeod who has written such a wonderful piece that I find very real," says Lake. "It is a nice experience to be working in a room full of such gifted people."

Many of Lake's first performances were on stage at the Peretz Centre, a Jewish community centre in Vancouver where he grew up in a secular home.

"I did my Birthright a few years ago and the thing I really connected to was there's real performance energy in our culture, and I mean that in a very positive way. There's a real vitality that I think is very infectious and I'm very proud to try and connect to that side of my Jewish self in my adult life. I think there is that fire in the blood that exists in my family; a feistiness which I think has really translated into who I am as a performer."

His extensive theatre training includes the Birmingham Conservatory for Classical Theatre and the University of Victoria BFA Theatre Program.

Lake just wrapped up his sixth season at the Stratford Festival—performing in Mary Stuart, Measure for Measure, and Othello. In 2009, Lake garnered Stratford Festival's Michael Mawson Award, awarded annually to a graduate of the festival's training program.

Lake also appeared on stage in This is War, For This Moment Alone, Amadeus, Schoolhouse, Lost Heir and Much Ado About Nothing. On film and TV, he was seen in Bomb Girls, Pulling Rank, Flashpoint, Caesar and Cleopatra, SPIT, and He Was Perfectly Fine.

Chosen actor wants to transport audiences to 1944 Brooklyn

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

Toronto actor Sam Rosenthal will play the role of Reuven in Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre's adaptation of Chaim Potok's bestselling novel The Chosen starting Nov. 13.

The story is about two young boys living in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1944 who first meet each other at a baseball game where their two schools are competing. Reuven gets hit in the face by a line drive thrown mistakenly by Danny. They become unlikely friends.

"One boy is a chassidic Jew and the other is a boy is growing up as a practising Jew, but he's not chassidic," explains Rosenthal.

"It's the story of the two of them growing up together trying to understand that both their fathers have very strong points of view in the community. I play Reuven, the narrator... the older Reuven looking back on his life, who guides the audience through the show."

The play takes place around the time of the creation of the State of Israel. Danny and his father, Reb Saunders, a chassidic leader, are both against the Zionists, while Reuven's father, David Malter, an Orthodox humanist professor, is a passionate Zionist driven to take action because of the Holocaust.

Top pianist to play Brahms with Toronto Symphony

Marvin Glassman
Special To The CJN

Classical musical pianist Emanuel Ax will showcase Brahms Concerto No. 2 as the feature attraction of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra program this week at Roy Thomson Hall.

Earning his reputation as one of the top classical pianists in the world, Ax has chosen a Brahms piece to perform with the TSO that has four movements instead of the traditional three in the concerto.

"Brahms Concerto No. 2 has much depth and has to be played with integrity and imagination as if it were a symphony. The audience will immediately hear and feel Manny's enthusiasm and be treated to an extraordinary performance," said Peter Oundjian, conductor of the Toronto Symphony Orchestra for the 10th season, who has performed multiple times with Ax.

Ax's reputation has him performing with the leading philharmonic orchestras in the world for over 30 years, excelling not only on the works of Brahms, Beethoven, Chopin, but also in chamber music.

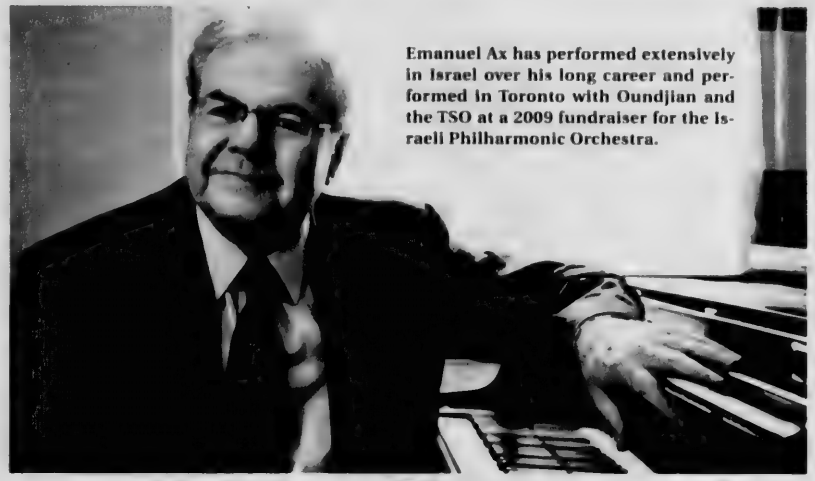
He has won seven Grammy Awards, two for solo performances and five collaborating with cellist Yo-Yo Ma in chamber music. Ax has also teamed with violinists Itzhak Perlman and Isaac Stern among other marquee musicians.

Earning a scholarship at the famed Julliard School in New York at age 12, Ax is now on the faculty of Julliard and has earned honorary doctorates in music from both Columbia and Yale universities.

"Even with all the awards and fame, I never stop rehearsing and working to be the best artist possible. The quest for quality never stops and I feel blessed to have a deep passion for music," said Ax.

Born in Lvov, Poland, the 64-year-old pianist's mother and father both were Holocaust survivors. His parents both saw their spouses murdered in the concentration camps and when Emanuel, their only child, was born they gave him the gift of a music education.

"I gave my parents their life. My father especially loved music and he was my first piano teacher. Music to a large degree kept my parents going through their tragedies, more than anything else and they were so pleased that I took so quickly to music."



Emanuel Ax has performed extensively in Israel over his long career and performed in Toronto with Oundjian and the TSO at a 2009 fundraiser for the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra.

Ax was a quick study- playing the piano like a master at age six. The family moved over the next six years from Poland to Winnipeg and eventually to New York, where Ax still resides.

His first taste of world success came in Tel Aviv in 1974 when he won the prestigious Arthur Rubinstein international piano master competition.

Ax has performed extensively in Israel over his long career and performed in Toronto with Oundjian and the TSO at a 2009 fundraiser for the Israeli Philharmonic Orchestra.

He has been married to chamber music pianist Yoko Nozaki, whom he met at Julliard as a teen, for 47 years. They have two children, neither are musicians.

Classical pianist Emanuel Ax performs Brahms Concerto No. 2 with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra Nov. 6 and 7 at 8 p.m. at Roy Thomson Hall, 60 Simcoe St., Toronto. Also on the program are Haydn's Symphony No. 96 and Kulesha's Third Symphony. Tickets are $33-145. For tickets, call 416-593-4828 or go to www.tso.ca

Play is a window into Jewish passions

Rosenthal says it's the story of Zionism versus deeply religious Jews, who couldn't imagine the State of Israel being created by non-chassidic Jews.

"As a Jewish kid who grew up in Forest Hill, who went to synagogue three times a year, I have a great love for our religion and its traditions although I am not a practising Jew," Rosenthal said. "I am learning so much about our culture and heritage. I really didn't know much about chassidic Jews and this play is giving me a wonderful insight into what is Chassidism and the study of the Talmud and what is important about that."

Rosenthal says theatregoers are in for a real treat. "I want the audience to experience a night of great storytelling. If you come from the Jewish faith, then you are going to get a piece of our history and to be well-informed if you aren't already. And if you don't come from the Jewish faith, you get a look into this religion and to see some real passionate ideals from where these people are coming from. It's really fascinating.

"I want the audience to be transported to 1944 Brooklyn and get a sense of what it was like to grow up as a chassidic and non-chassidic Jewish kid in this culture... It is a window into this incredible world."

Rosenthal is married to former actress Michelle Suzanne, who now works as an astrologer. His list of theatre credits includes Too Many Cooks, Hilda's Yard, When the Reaper Calls, Cherry Docs, and Same Time Next Year. In January, he'll be acting in The Other Side of the World, at the Next Stage Festival, which also deals with Jews who fled Germany before the Holocaust.

He has also appeared in several television shows and movies. He was the artistic director for Tribal Productions for 10 years, followed by a two-year stint as the artistic director of the City Playhouse Theatre in Vaughan. This is his debut for Teatron Toronto Jewish Theatre.

The production's cast also includes Howard Jerome, Michael Lebovic, Tal Shulman and Hershel Blatt.

The show runs at the Toronto Centre for the Arts Studio Theatre Nov. 13 to 22. For tickets to The Chosen, call Ticketmaster, 1-855-985-2787, or visit www.teatrontheatre.com

Versatile voice is key to success

With at least 28 credits in 2013 alone, Tara Strong is one of the most prolific voice actors

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

You may not have heard of Tara Strong, but if you've watched any cartoons over the past 20 years, you've almost certainly heard her voice.

It's hard to pinpoint which of her roles is the most famous. Many would recognize her as Bubbles from the Powerpuff Girls, while others might first think of Batgirl from the New Adventures of Batman and Robin, or maybe Timmy Turner from The Fairly OddParents.

Her highly versatile voice has helped her land roles in some of the most popular shows in the last decade or two.

Strong's career in voice acting began when she was just 13 years old, when she landed her first starring role in Hello Kitty's Furry Tale Theater. But she began practising years before then.

"I remember at [the Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto] at four or five years old singing in my classes," the 40-year-old voice actress said, adding that she liked animation, but her dream was to perform in general, not specifically to do voice acting.

But she was always good with voices.

"I always did funny voices with my mom. I'd say, 'Lets pretend we're from England' when we go into a store, and every stuffed animal had a funny voice."

By the time Strong had moved to Los Angeles when she was 20, she had more than 100 animated series on her resume. Although she said she sometimes misses members of her family who still live in Toronto, she really hasn't looked back.

"I just don't miss the cold. The weather in L.A. is so incredible," she said.

This year, she headed back to her hometown for the first time in five years, this time as a guest at Fan Expo, the Toronto fan convention that drew more than 100,000 people in August.

Among the crowds at the convention were a number of men dressed as unicorns or sporting shirts with Strong's My Little Pony character, Twilight Sparkle. These fans are known as "bronies" and there are a ton of them.

Although many would expect My Little Pony to target mostly young girls, Strong said it's not completely shocking that so many men are interested in the show.

"The creator who built this world also worked a great deal on Powerpuff Girls, which you could also say looked like a girl's show, but appealed to all ages and sexualities," she said, adding that she's never seen a fan base quite like the Pony fans. "They are the loveliest people watching a show that makes them laugh."

It was mostly thanks to these fans that Strong was able to raise more than $100,000 for a family whose child, known as Kiki, was diagnosed with a brain tumour.

Her son met Kiki in kindergarten, and the two families became very close. Strong said Kiki and her family would attend all of Strong's Chanukah and Passover dinners. She described Kiki as the cutest, fun ball of energy.

But one day, she completely shut down, Strong said.

"It sent a shockwave through the school," she said. The family had to pay for expensive treatment, so Strong took to Twitter to ask for help.

"Literally from all over the world, donations poured in for this little girl," she said.

Unfortunately, Kiki passed away this year at seven years old.

But Strong is continuing her involvement with charities, one of them being Bronies for Good, a group of fans inspired by the altruistic messages of My Little Pony, trying to have a positive impact on the world. Last month, the group held a fundraiser with Strong on what would have been Kiki's eighth birthday.

Strong said her Judaism is a big part of her identity – she loves the traditions, such as lighting the candles every Shabbat. It's also helped her with tweaking some of the Yiddishisms or Israeli accents in some of the scripts.

She also spent time as a teenager performing Yiddish theatre in Toronto, even though she doesn't actually speak Yiddish. She would memorize the lines phonetically, and was so good that sometimes, after the shows, audience members would come up to her and speak to her in Yiddish, expecting her to understand.

Although Strong has an incredibly successful career, she warned that voice acting isn't a particularly open-arms industry. Anybody thinking of a career in it should remember that it's a tough business, Strong said. People often tell her that they have a funny voice, so they are thinking of become a voice actor, but it's not about that.

"It's about bringing these characters to life," she said.

Married With Kids
Lauren Kramer

As my twin daughters' bodies start to show the first signs of womanly development, I can't help but think back to my own experiences.

My first trip bra shopping was a department store nightmare. It felt embarrassing enough just needing this extra piece of delicate clothing to hold my body parts in place, but to have a nosey salesperson in the change room with me, adjusting, inspecting and viewing the goods was way too much.

In those days the 13-year-old version of me suffered the indignity silently, returning home with a hideous bra that spoke nothing of the sensuality of growing into a woman. I'm determined that my daughters' experiences will be completely different.

I'm imagining a celebratory mom-daughter shopping trip for that first bra, of scouting out the cutest, perkiest options online and finding bra-panty sets that are chic and make the girls feel good about their changing bodies.

My first bra looked comparable to the ones my mother and grandmother were wearing – that dull, flesh-coloured piece of apparel with no lace, ribbon or anything remotely pretty in sight.

My daughters' bras are going to be colourful, cutesy and practical. Sexy I don't need – hopefully it will be many years before a boy's fumbling fingers reach to undo those back clips. But the bra does have a significant dual function: it needs to hold "the girls" in place, and it needs to make my daughters feel good about the fact that their breasts are growing – not embarrassed, annoyed or self-conscious.

The onset of their first period is another milestone I want to be prepared for – with a planned celebration for that, too.

"We're going on a special mom-daughter experience when it comes," I announced to my girls today.

I'm thinking some cute, new underwear will fit the occasion, along with a nice dinner out at their favourite restaurant and a mani-pedi to festivize this bloody occasion.

There's nothing fun about the tampons and sanitary towels they'll learn to use, nor the stomach cramps that often accompany "that time of the month." So we have two choices: a morose acceptance of the implications of the first period, or a celebration of healthy, changing bodies. The latter sounds way more fun.

Every woman remembers the arrival of her first period, and when those stories are divulged the word "celebration" isn't commonly used as a descriptive adjective.

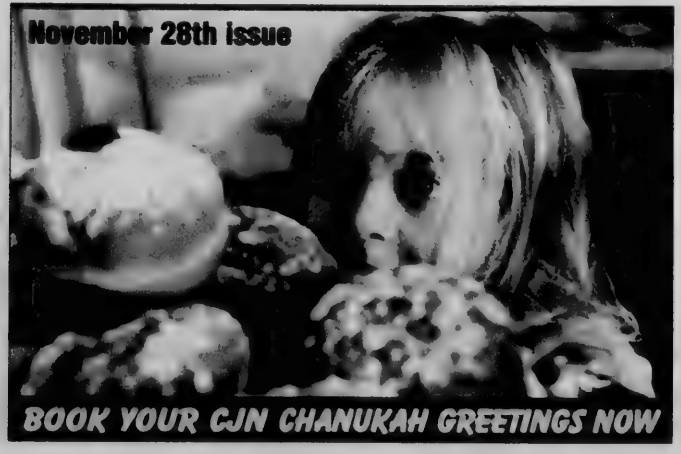
Mine – in a restaurant washroom while I was on vacation, far from home – stained my memory with disgust, embarrassment and annoyance at the sheer inconvenience. I'd known it would come sooner or later, but, I remember wondering, did my body really have to surprise me right then and there?

At the time it was a big, ugly pubescent secret and with it came excruciating cramps that forced me to learn how to swallow pills for the first time. Now that's a skill I can say I've mastered. But that stain of embarrassment is hard to erase.

I don't want my girls to feel that way. It's why I'm going to find bright toiletry bags to keep in the car, stocked with new underwear, hygiene items necessary to take care of the details, and a little gift that somehow says mazal tov!

If nothing else, I'm going to be prepared on their behalf, ready with solutions, a big smile and a willingness to celebrate their entry into womanhood.

It's going to be a rocky road, so we might as well make it a fun one!



A rice dish par excellence

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

A small, but long-grained, aromatic rice with a nutlike flavour and aroma, basmati rice is of Southeast Asian origin, and has been cultivated for thousands of years. It has an earthy, perfumed fragrance all its own. It's a very light, delicate rice and is perfect with curries and for pilafs.

CRISPY BOTTOMED BASMATI RICE WITH LENTILS

The first time I ate this was at the home of Iranian Jews. I would have happily passed up everything else on the table in favour of this dish. It is time consuming, but not difficult to make, and it's memorable. The crusty part on the bottom is the best part.

3 cups basmati rice
2 tbsp. plus 1 tsp. salt
4 tbsp. olive oil
1 large onion, finely diced
2 cups brown lentils, washed and dried
4 cloves garlic, minced
1/2 tsp. black pepper
1 tsp. paprika
1 bunch fresh basil leaves, cut julienne

Wash the rice in several changes of warm water until the water runs clear. Soak the rice for 6 to 8 hours, or overnight, in cold water to cover, with 1 tbsp. of the salt. Alternatively, to save time, soak the rice in lukewarm water with the salt for 30 to 45 minutes.

Heat a large, heavy-bottomed skillet over medium heat. Add 2 tbsp. of the olive oil and the onion. Cook until the onion becomes translucent, about 10 minutes. Add the lentils, garlic, pepper and paprika. Continue cooking 2 minutes. Add 2 cups of water, cover, and cook until tender, about 45 minutes.

Season with the 1 tsp. salt, or to taste. Stir in the basil. In a large saucepan over medium high heat, bring about eight cups of water to a boil with the remaining 1 tbsp. of salt. Drain the rice from the soaking liquid and add it to the boiling water. Return to a boil and cook for 10 to 12 minutes, uncovered, stirring occasionally. Test a grain of rice for doneness; it should be cooked entirely except for a small part in the centre. Strain the rice in a colander and rinse with warm water. Drain well.

Heat the remaining 2 tbsp. of olive oil in a large, well-seasoned or nonstick stock pot with a tight fitting lid, over medium heat. Add about 2 tbsp. water and sprinkle the cooked rice evenly onto the bottom of the pot a spoonful at a time until two thirds of the rice has been distributed.

Spread the lentil mixture evenly over the rice. Cover the lentils with the remaining rice, mounding it slightly in the centre. Use the handle of a wooden spoon to poke about 5 deep holes in the rice from the surface of the rice to the bottom of the pot to allow steam to escape. Cover the pot with a thick cotton dish towel and place the lid on tightly. Reduce the heat to medium low and cook for 35 to 40 minutes, turning the pot occasionally.

Fill the sink with cold water 1 or 2 in. deep. Remove the cover from the rice and have a large, round platter ready. Place the pot in the sink for 1 minute, watching so that no water enters the pot. Remove the pot and dry off the bottom, then invert the rice cake onto the platter. It should unmould itself in one piece and be golden brown. Bring the platter to the table and serve family style. Cut individual wedges from the rice cake, similar to cutting a pie. Makes 6 servings.

CHANUKAH COOKING TIPS

(A) If chopping onions for latkes irritates your eyes, place onion in the freezer for a few minutes before cutting. This will make the liquid in the onions slightly frozen, and less likely to splash as you cut.

(B) To keep latkes from getting soggy, remove from frying pan while still crisp; place on a cooling rack (set inside a pan, so the dripping oil will not go on your counter) while you refill the frying pan with raw latkes to cook. Transfer cooked latkes to a tray lined with paper towels.

(C) If you are watching fat intake spray a light coat of olive oil on a cookie sheet. Form latke batter into small round portions on cookie sheet. Spray top of each portion with a very light coat of oil. Bake at 450°F until golden brown, 15-20 min.

(D) Half-cooked latke/beaten egg/fried onion latke batter can be frozen ahead of time and finished up before ready to serve.

Clementines make cake sweet and light

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

I am often asked if it's really necessary to grease and flour cake pans when baking. There are a few answers to that question.

If you are making a layer cake that you'll frost and want it to look smooth, definitely grease and flour your pans. If it's a chocolate cake, use cocoa instead of flour for the pan.

If it's a sheet-type pan (brownies or squares) that you will be serving from the pan, you can just grease the pan or line it with parchment paper.

For gluten-free cakes, line the pan with parchment paper. Gluten-free flour is very gritty and if you substitute cornstarch for the flour in "grease and flour" you may not like the taste.

If you are using a bundt pan it's very necessary to grease and flour the pan very well, even if it's a non-stick bundt pan; they are not 100 per cent non-stick. Don't use butter or margarine to grease them either, and don't use non-stick sprays such as Pam, unless it's the new ones on the market that also contain flour. It accumulates each time you bake and eventually you'll have a scummy coating on the pan that will be almost impossible to get out.

CLEMENTINE CAKE

This is a delicious light cake to make. It is moist, creamy and is like a pound cake but with more texture.

3 medium clementines, unpeeled
1-1/2 cups sugar
¾ cup softened butter or margarine
3 eggs
2 cups all-purpose flour
2 tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. vanilla extract

Icing:
1 medium clementine
2 tbsp. softened butter or margarine
1-1/3 cup powdered sugar
1 tbsp. orange liqueur

Grease and flour an 8-cup bundt pan. Wash and remove stems of clementines, cut into quarters and remove pits. Process unpeeled clementines with sugar in a food processor until smooth. Add butter or margarine, then eggs, processing after each addition until smooth. Add flour, baking powder, and process until combined. Spoon into pan and bake 50 minutes or until golden and top springs back when touched. Cool on a rack for 10 minutes. Remove cake from pan and cool on rack. Drizzle icing over cake.

For the icing, grate the rind and squeeze juice from one clementine. In a food processor, measure 2 tsp. rind and 2 tbsp. juice, add butter or margarine, powdered sugar, liqueur and process until smooth.

ACADEMIC SKILLS AND CHARACTER AT THE SAME TIME

"Talent, knowledge, success are important to human existence. Yet talent without dedication, knowledge without reverence, success without humility may end in futility."

A.J. Heschel

A.J. Heschel's statement nicely summarizes the challenge that good educators face. The best educational strategy will deliver academic skills and build character at the same time. In this issue, we explore these layers. We look at specific educational practices that advance child development even as they expand the students' academic reach. Our writers say that good education happens when children look inward to improve themselves and look outward to understand the world at large.

At think our priority is thoughtful education, especially thoughtful Jewish education. In a two-part feature, Greg Beiles looks at how collections of ideas and traditions coalesce into "schools of thought." He then considers what constitutes a "thoughtful school," where thinking through a particular vision and practice creates an intentionally unique school experience.

Gail Baker uses role play to embed an understanding of social action in her students; creative drama flexes their imaginations and engenders empathy which is valuable to students' interpersonal relationships as well as to their social conscience and appreciation of civil rights. Lesley Cohen advances junior high writing skills through a process of peer editing among her students that motivates self-improvement; her technique demands that students develop their composure and critical integrity which also serve to strengthen friendships and class community. Brandeis University researchers Orit Kent and Allison Cook find that when learning Judaic texts in junior high is carefully structured using the age-old Jewish modality of chevrutah (two students working together on one text), textual knowledge arrives with an emergent ethical and spiritual sensibility in each preteen.

Daniel Abramson reflects on his observations of scientists at the McEwen Centre for Regenerative Medicine who are combining efforts of leading-edge research and discovery: as a teacher Daniel explains how he structures classroom collaboration for discovery, while remembering that good teaching and successful teamwork hinge on respect for the individual. As Heidi Friedman and Talya Metz introduce five-year-olds to self-reflection, the children's personal victories become common cause in Senior Kindergarten; the youngsters learn to address their personal challenges over time as skills to be mastered. Lisa Richler highlights the insight and self-confidence garnered by sixth graders who experience what elderly and junior collaborators can offer to each other in an intergenerational program. Toronto's literary rabbi, Joe Kanofsky, discusses theatre and emotional well-being with Dr. David Goldbloom. Thankfully, learning through the arts is a lifelong activity and one that we all can enjoy!

This year is The Toronto Heschel School's 18th anniversary. Michelle Shulman shares why the school means so much to her.

PEOPLE OF THE BODY: EMBODIED JEWISH ETHICS

The Forum will explore the relationship between Judaism and the human body. In every faith and age, the body has been the locus of tension, conflict, and concern, often a platform for cultural symbolism, meaning, and values. With society so preoccupied with physical strength, beauty, and health, how can Jewish views of the body inform our sense of self and self-worth? What can Jewish ethics teach about the Jewish approach to human life?

We will ask: Is the body "holy" or a source of sin and temptation? What do Jewish approaches to sexuality teach about body and gender? What do Jewish ethics teach about our responsibilities for our bodies and health? How has Jewish history in the Diaspora and State of Israel affected Jewish attitudes towards the physical body?

SCHOOL OF THOUGHT

PART ONE: WHAT MAKES A SCHOOL JEWISH?

Scholars have long debated whether Judaism is a religion, ethnicity, or civilization. I wonder if it is more apt to describe Judaism as a "school of thought." Without question, we should consider schools of thought when we think about Jewish education.

The term "school of thought" refers to more than a collection of "thoughts" or "ideas." In philosophy, art, architecture, or politics, a school of thought denotes interrelated elements such as values, beliefs, practices, communal forms, even political and economic systems. Judaism does this; it integrates a value system based on a theology, daily practices and rituals, strong communal forms, a prophetic politic that demands justice, and an economic system based on the principle of tzedakah (fairness). Judaism is an example par excellence of the confluence of ideas and practices that characterizes a school of thought.

A school of thought also involves a group of people engaged in dynamic productive conversation. Nowhere is this more evident than in the rabbinic tradition where sages ardently debate all matters of law and diverse interpretations rule the day. Sometimes Talmudic debates ensue between smaller "houses" within the larger school of Jewish thought. Long before the Hogwarts School of Witchcraft and Wizardry gave us the Houses of Gryffindor and Slytherin, the School of Judaism gave us Beit Hillel – the House of Hillel, and Beit Shammai – the House of Shammai.

Beit Hillel and Beit Shammai represent two, typically opposing, schools of thought that trace back to the scholars named Hillel and Shammai of the first century BCE. While later rabbis generally adopted the rulings of Beit Hillel for their practicality and compassion over the stricter decisions of Beit Shammai, the views of both houses were regarded as valid – or, in the words of the Talmud, both espoused "the words of the living God."

When we ask what it means today for our Jewish schools to be Jewish schools of thought, the question helps us consider the kinds of Jewish schools we desire. The Jewish school must ask, "What is Jewish about the way we teach and learn here?" It's not enough to name the school after a great rabbi, thinker, or leader, a Jewish school of thought must teach and learn Jewishly; its Jewish connection must live and breathe in daily practices and community spirit.

Jewish ways of learning can inform teaching and learning at all levels. PaRDeS is an acronym for a rabbinic technique that calls for multiple approaches to reading a text:

P for peshat means considering the "simple, plain meaning."
R for remez means looking for "clues" or "inferences."
D for drash means engaging in "interpretation."
S for sod means "secret" and refers to exploring deeper meanings.

Although PaRDeS was developed for reading Jewish texts, it applies widely to reading in any language, solving mathematical problems, interpreting science experiments, and even addressing interpersonal conflicts such as bullying. It is a Jewish method of analysis with value across the curriculum; it offers students a Jewish lens.

Of course, the key to teaching "Jewishly" is to have Jewish teachers whose own Jewish learning continues. Several years ago when I ran a middle school, our biweekly staff meetings began with a devar Torah that connected the weekly parshah (Torah reading) to our craft of teaching and learning. One week we studied Moshe's encounter with the burning bush and saw him pass through several important stages of learning: he consciously turned his attention from a previous task to the task at hand; he examined the strange phenomenon closely; he wondered, posed a question – and, only then, did the voice within the burning bush speak to him.

Great schools of thought glean new ideas from ways of thinking, that are beyond their comfort zones. Judaism has engaged with many diverse schools of thought over the centuries – Babylonian, Greek, Roman, European, and, most recently, North American. As the Jewish philosopher Franz Rosenzweig evocatively writes, Judaism "continuously assimilates itself outwardly in order again and again to set itself apart inwardly."[1]

Just as Judaism enriches its identity through interaction with other cultures, so a Jewish school polishes its pedagogy by studying other schools of educational thought. A few years ago my colleagues and I took a strong interest in the framework of Teaching for Understanding, as developed by Howard Gardner and his associates at the Harvard Graduate School of Education. Gardner was integrating his theory of multiple intelligences with new research showing the cognitive efficacy of learning through the arts and teaching particular "Habits of Mind."

As we investigated Teaching for Understanding as a foundational educational approach, we explored how Gardner's insights meshed with Jewish thought. We asked what was, or might be, "Jewish" about Teaching for Understanding? Were Gardner's notions of experiential education reflected in the signature Jewish idea of na'aseh venishmah (first do, then understand)? How did the Habits of Mind articulated in Teaching for Understanding relate to the components of artisanship described in the Torah – chacham lev (the skilled heart) and nadiv lev (the generous heart)? Are there certain Jewish habits of mind that can be nurtured through particularly Jewish practices such as tefillah (prayer) or chevruta (studying in pairs)?

A school of thought focuses its internal conversation on how to implement its core vision and practices. Working to improve the "how" is the most challenging school ethic: How do we implement a dynamic Torah program that is based on chevruta? How do we teach second-language fluency (whether French or Hebrew) through drama? How do we embed performance of middot (Jewish virtues) as Habits of Mind? As one teacher at The Toronto Heschel School said recently, "These days, we aren't talking so much about 'what' to do but about 'how' to do it."

The key to being a school of thought (and, especially, a Jewish day school of thought) is to determine a set of practices, optimize them, and implement them with consistency and discipline. Here again, Judaism gives guidance. Two thousand years ago, the rabbis canonized the Hebrew Bible; they included some books and excluded others. The idea to consciously delimit boundaries models educational practice for a Jewish school.

By "drawing a circle around the text," the rabbis established a remarkably rich tradition of interpretation. They forced a custom of self-assessment and a wealth of literature on standards for the canon that we call the Torah. The practice reaches into what we define as our domain as Jews and searches its depths – a tradition that continues to this day. Likewise, schools need a clear definition of their vision and mission for their school standards, accountability, and creativity to be effectively measured.

Also like Judaism, a Jewish school of thought is distinguished by committed participants and a living culture. Its students love to learn and, one day, they will build their own schools of thought.

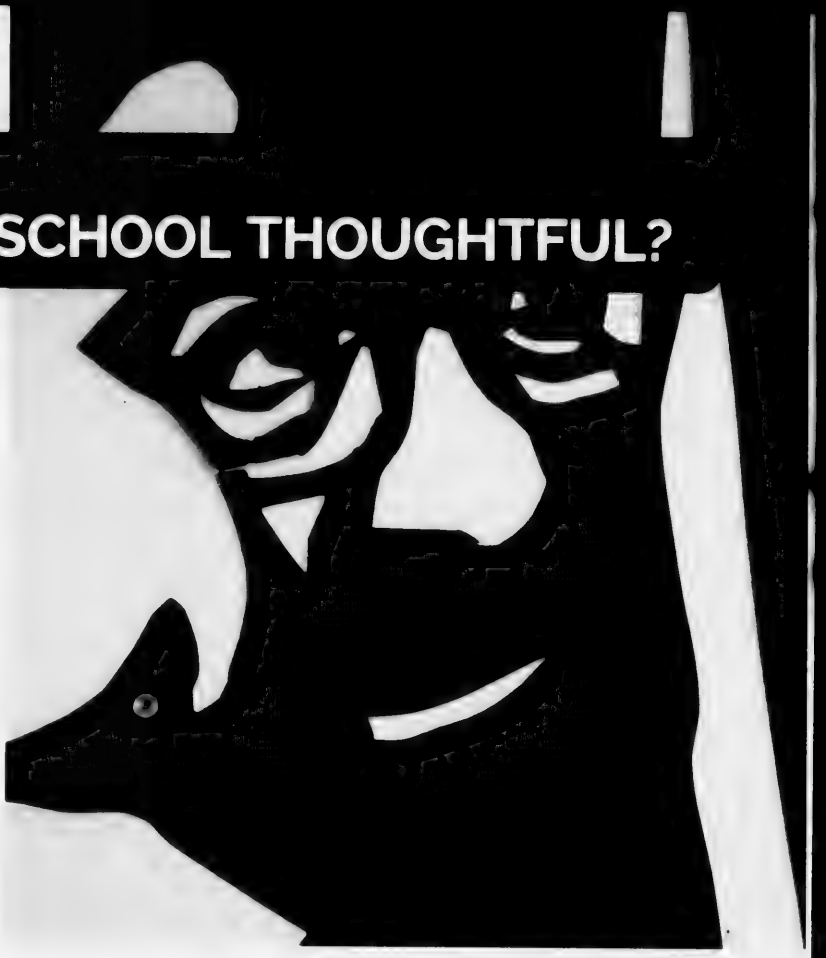
PART TWO: WHAT MAKES A JEWISH SCHOOL THOUGHTFUL?



BY GREG BEILES

For the past 17 years I have had the privilege to be associated with a thoughtful Jewish school. I could also describe this school as dynamic, innovative, progressive, caring, and mention other positive attributes; yet, when it comes down to it, I prefer to call it a "thoughtful" school and this is what I mean:

A "thoughtful" school is intentional and considers all aspects of its students' educational experience. A thoughtful school is based on a well-honed educational philosophy which permeates everything from the choice of curriculum and teaching methods to the design of its classrooms and timetable, from the way it nurtures a sense of community among its teachers, parents, and students to how it guides individual students to comport themselves in class and on school excursions.

Examples of thoughtful schools with embedded philosophies of learning include the Waldorf, Montessori, and Reggio Emilia schools. Each has a distinct educational philosophy that pervades the school's environment. Whether it is the use of natural materials and craft in a Waldorf school, independent learning centres in a Montessori school, or the atelier – the school studio and laboratory – in a Reggio school. Each draws its inspiration from specific sources: German Romanticism and the thought of Rudolf Steiner in the case of Waldorf, and the community-centred ideas of Loris Malaguzzi for Reggio Emilia. For a Jewish school to be a thoughtful Jewish school it must root its educational approach in Jewish thought and historical context.

The thoughtful Jewish school, with which I am most familiar, sources its educational philosophy in the ideas and life work of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel. Born in Poland to a Hasidic dynasty, A.J. Heschel was educated in modern philosophy at the University of Berlin where he also attended a non-denominational rabbinical seminary. He escaped Europe for the United States in 1938, where he first taught at the Hebrew Union College (HUC), the main seminary of Reform Judaism, and then, for most of his career, at the Jewish Theological Seminary of America (JTS), the main seminary of Conservative Judaism. All the while, Heschel remained dedicated to his own practice of traditional halakhic Judaism.

Heschel is best known for combining three essential ingredients: a deep sense of Jewish spirituality (what he called "awe and wonder"), a respect for the dignity of every person "born in the image of God," and civil activism inspired by the prophetic tradition of the Bible. He strongly supported the American Civil Rights movement and openly opposed the Vietnam War.

Heschel's relationship to diverse articulations of Judaism, and his animation of Jewish spirituality through ethical activism, made him a unique figure for his time. It also made him an ideal representative for a school in Toronto that wished to grow from a deeply rooted, authentically Jewish, yet modern educational philosophy. Each aspect of The Toronto Heschel School connects back to Heschel's ideas about Judaism and the purpose of human existence. The ideas were not his alone; they derive, as he would readily agree, from ancient Jewish thought and tradition. Heschel lived and taught these ideas in practice as a modern Jewish citizen.

The school's pluralistic philosophy emerges from Heschel's experience across the denominations. His thinking echoes the phrase "We were all at Sinai," the traditional Jewish notion that each Jew was present to hear the revelation of the Torah, and therefore, each has something authentic to contribute to its understanding and fulfilment. Heschel recognized that each stream of Judaism has something to offer.

Inspired by Heschel's ideas, each child at The Toronto Heschel School is recognized as a legitimate and valued contributor to classroom discourse. Classrooms are arranged in a circle or small groupings; children face one another and not each other's backs. Practices of respect for the learner nurture children who sense their legitimacy as participants. This results in students who have reputations for asking the best questions when they go on field trips, as well as graduates who are identifiable by the questions they ask when they sit in high school classes with students from other schools. It begins with respect.

Heschel wrote, "Wonder, not doubt, is the beginning of knowledge."[1] He regarded radical amazement at all of God's creation to be essential for learning; he called for "awe and wonder." The Toronto Heschel School classroom is designed to inspire wonder and is filled with objects, texts, and images that spark curiosity, questions, and discussion. Teachers display remarkable examples of nature – a beehive, a conch shell, a magnificently curled shofar – to evoke each child's natural sense of wonder and to inspire investigation. The school's full commitment to environmental stewardship is grounded in Heschel's deep respect for creation and his view that the natural world is our "sibling," co-created with us,[2] and deserving of our care and concern. It begins with wonder.

When The Toronto Heschel School founders investigated Howard Gardener's work on multiple intelligences, they were attracted not only by its pedagogical efficacy but also by its reflection of Heschel's respect for each human being as a unique learner. Likewise, the school's arts-based approach is developed from the recognition that the arts can inspire awe and wonder and offer opportunities for exploration and interpretation – Jewish and universal alike.

Heschel was a rigorous thinker who demanded the highest standards from himself and his students. He placed tremendous emphasis on study, and stated that "the role of learning is decisive" for human living. He saw learning as "the greatest adventure" and as "a source of joy." He believed that the highest purpose of learning was to discover "the importance of self-discipline; that a life without self-discipline is not worth living."[3]

The Toronto Heschel School has made Heschel's three purposes of learning the pillars of its educational philosophy: joy, adventure, and self-discipline. Contemporary educational research, including the discoveries of neuroscience, correlates remarkably with these principles. Mihaly Csikszentmihalyi's well-known concept of "flow"[4] tells us that learning occurs best in the engaged state of mind and correlates with Heschel's notion of "joy." Recent research that one of the most important determinants of academic success is the strength of "executive function" or "self-regulation" echoes Heschel's view that self-discipline is the "decisive" outcome of learning. The same principles apply whether children are learning a text from Torah, engaging in a difficult math question, or learning to pace themselves as they run laps around the school's outdoor field.

For Heschel, personal dignity, discovered through learning prayer and mitzvot, was the preparation for an even higher form of Jewish activity, namely, civic activism. Heschel's writings accentuate the prophetic tradition in Judaism that holds redress of inequity and injustice as the core teaching of Torah. The Toronto Heschel School integrates tzedakah (fairness) projects into its academic curriculum with programs such as Jewish civics and the requirement for each graduating student to prepare and deliver a speech about human rights. Practices such as "Weekly Middot" and "Derekh Eretz" (ethical actions) develop students' respect for one another on a daily basis. Social action and community participation are standard school fare in the tradition of A.J. Heschel.

Not surprisingly, the Heschel-inspired Jewish education attracts thoughtful teachers and thoughtful parents. Toronto Heschel teachers are those who aspire to a higher standard of Jewish teaching and learning and who want to enhance their professional growth. The school is disciplined in its support for educators; teachers are afforded professional development, ongoing mentorship and guidance, as well as specialty courses. Likewise, it is no surprise that the Heschel-inspired school sees the evolution of a school community of families who share an interest in learning for their children's sake and their own, who support the ethos of community action and want their children to become responsible participants in society.

Thoughtful education doesn't happen by accident; it takes the discipline of deliberate, painstaking, and rigorous foresight. Following in the footsteps of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel, the thoughtful school walks the talk.

IMAGINE & UNDERSTAND

CREATIVE DRAMA IN THE CLASSROOM

We want complex thinkers. We want our children to be ready when complications arise. Creative drama offers students a truly dynamic opportunity to explore the clash of values and "real life" dilemmas through their imaginations. When they attempt to solve problems wearing someone else's shoes, they are trying on different points of view and considering what various opinions may or may not mean. Creative drama sets up the kind of reflective practice that expands a student's understanding of human nature and fosters the development of empathy.

We developed one particular creative drama project for a Grade 8 course studying the respective roles of Rabbi A.J. Heschel and Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. during the civil rights struggle. The course encompassed the tension between the individual and social responsibility, something very much on the minds of emerging adolescents.

The imaginary context of the project placed the students in a southern U.S. town in the 1960s: civil rights workers from the North were coming to demonstrate and were asking members of the local synagogue for housing during their stay. Local residents were up in arms. As their teacher I was not looking for a "right" answer. I wanted them to experience that dilemmas can be complex and to see that the capacity to carry on an emotionally charged dialogue is a critical skill when important decisions need to be made.

To carry on an emotionally charged dialogue is a critical skill when important decisions need to be made.

Initially the students agreed that the synagogue should billet the civil rights workers because it was such an important cause and certainly the right thing to do. Then we gave each student a specific personality to role-play: each student was to be a member of the synagogue's board of directors charged with deciding whether or not to billet the demonstrators. One was a shopkeeper who feared how he would support his family if his store was fire bombed by the town folk who were against civil rights. Another was disinclined to support the demonstration because her sister in Chicago told her that forced integration didn't work. Several members out and out demanded that hospitality be offered. We asked the students to argue the differing points of view as if they were sitting around a boardroom table. They found the experience challenging, and I believe this was due to the power of creative drama.

Reflecting later, the students made comments such as:

"Learning this way really helped me to understand the situation."

"Because of the role play, I had to rethink my original opinion and think of different perspectives."

Creative drama is just as valuable in the younger years. For a Grade 2 science class, where students were studying water, its properties and importance to survival, we created a drama based on the work of drama educator David Booth. In his work, he uses The King's Fountain by Lloyd Alexander. So we decided to incorporate this story into our project.

We could see the political action wheels beginning to turn.

One morning I entered the Grade 2 classroom in the role of queen. I gathered the children and told them that they were my villagers and that I was going to build a beautiful fountain to the glory of my kingdom. I described it to them in evocative detail and they were mesmerized. I did mention that the fountain would mean a loss of water for them but that I didn't care. Then I left the room.

The classroom teacher, my partner in the program, suggested to the class that as villagers they should protest. What the queen had announced had dire consequences for them and their families. The children wrote out their concerns to present to the queen the next day. As the queen, I engaged the villagers in an energetic dialogue: I challenged their assumptions to the right to have water and they answered back why it was my duty to let them have water and why they felt that way.

One of our goals was to have the children experience how decisions can be made through a Jewish lens; they knew from Chumash class that God had created the world and that it was up to each of them to partner with God as co-creators who are responsible for the goings-on around them. This imaginary scenario let them feel the social action impetus that is part of the Jewish tradition.

Our discussions were very animated with the children fully immersed in the discussion. Because I was participating in character with them, the students felt respected, entitled to play act to the hilt, and willing to take risks with their communications and sensibilities in this monitored yet open environment. We could see the political action wheels beginning to turn as social justice and B'zelem Elokim – in the image of God – motivated our seven-year-old villagers to stand up for what they felt was right.

At all ages, our students are called upon to make decisions. Creative drama is an exercise in improvisation, a life skill that is essential to have as children mature. It involves making decisions in real time, taking risks with opinions, actively listening; practising improvisation trains students to remain mindful in the moment. In creative drama, as in daily life, we cannot control what another person is going to say or do, but we can control our own responses. Developing this control empowers students to assume roles and elicit reactions that are more thoughtful and perhaps not as impulsive.

When my students engage in dramatic play, their learning is visible. As they act out their roles in the various scenarios, I observe their thought processes. This "window" into their thinking allows me to know whether or not they've understood the issues at hand and whether or not their thoughts on these issues are clear and sensible.

Critical and creative thinking, collaboration and communication, innovation, tolerance, and understanding are descriptors of core competencies for the 21st century learner. Creative drama enhances these standards and offers students a dynamic way to explore social justice.

STRENGTHS & STRUGGLES IN SENIOR KINDERGARTEN

BY HEIDI FIEDERMAN AND TALYA METZ

In 1995, Daniel Goleman published his groundbreaking book Emotional Intelligence and prompted the academic community to rethink definitions that traditionally framed intelligence. It used to be that intelligence was defined as "a set of cognitive abilities, which allows us to acquire knowledge, to learn and to solve problems."[1] Goleman defined emotional intelligence as:

> ... a different way of being smart. It includes knowing your feelings and using them to make good decisions; managing your feelings well; motivating yourself with zeal and persistence; maintaining hope in the face of frustration; exhibiting empathy and compassion; interacting smoothly; and managing your relationships effectively.[2]

Goleman's work engendered the practice of social and emotional learning (SEL) in schools. With renowned educator Linda Lantieri and other leaders, Goleman founded the Collaborative for Academic, Social, and Emotional Learning. CASEL defines social and emotional learning as

> ...the processes of developing social and emotional competencies in children. SEL programming is based on the understanding that the best learning emerges in the context of supportive relationships that make learning challenging, engaging, and meaningful; social and emotional skills are critical to being a good student, citizen, and worker. Effective SEL programming begins in preschool and continues through high school.[3]

To incorporate SEL in a focused manner into our classrooms, The Toronto Heschel School developed the Strengths and Struggles Program. It is now an integral component of the Senior Kindergarten curriculum and encompasses the five skill sets that comprise emotional intelligence:

> Self-awareness: Identifying your thoughts, feelings, strengths, and limitations.
> Social Awareness: Identifying and understanding the thoughts and feelings of others; developing empathy.
> Self-management: Handling emotions; setting long- and short-term goals; dealing with obstacles that may come your way.
> Responsible Decision Making: Generating, implementing, and evaluating positive and informed solutions to problems.
> Relationship Skills: Avoiding negative peer pressure and working to resolve conflicts.[4]

The Strengths and Struggles Program is based on two kinds of self-reflection: understanding one's own behaviour and navigating social interactions. Children contemplate their individual strengths and personal struggles. (What are you good at now and what are you working to improve?) They also assess how their classroom community fares as a whole. (Do we all help tidy up? Are we listening attentively to our friends when they speak?)

Preparation for the Strengths and Struggles Program begins with the school year; the teacher establishes a classroom environment that makes the room an emotionally safe place to work and play, a haven where children and teachers feel comfortable to communicate thoughts and feelings with each other and the group. Preparation includes ongoing informal non-judgmental observation as the teacher discerns and records patterns in each child's behaviour. For example, Jerry has trouble sharing toys and this creates conflict in his social interactions. The teacher chats with him about this from time to time and during one conversation he acknowledges that he does not like to share but prefers to build structures alone using all the toys at hand. Jerry identifies that he has a struggle with sharing.

Once the teacher has collected enough information and the class has had time to experience itself as a community, the Strengths and Struggles Program is ready to be launched. The program is introduced openly to the whole class together as a forum for self-reflection and self-improvement. The stated goal is to encourage the children to work together to turn individual struggles into personal strengths.

Sitting in a circle, the children and teacher share a strength and/or struggle which is noted on a card and placed in the Strengths and Struggles Book (or kept private if preferred). Including the teacher in the conversation highlights that social and emotional learning is a lifelong journey; the fact that the teacher shares his/her struggles as well has a strong positive affect on the children.

The Strengths and Struggles Book is an interactive visual representation that charts each student's progress. Each student's card is moveable, and as a struggle becomes a strength, the card is repositioned in the book to show the achievement. The children find it highly motivational to watch their struggles become strengths. They feel proud and are excited that they'll have a new opportunity for further self-reflection when the process is repeated.

To help turn their struggles into strengths the children are offered specific strategies. For example, Jerry learns techniques that develop sharing skills. This might involve asking a classmate whose strength is sharing toys to support Jerry's struggle.

The collaboration between the two children helps in two ways: one child's personal struggles are addressed and two children have the chance to practise social awareness, relationship, and empathy. This simple collaboration has a long-term advantage as the children begin to learn how to work openly and confidently in a group.

A class is a microcosm of society; understanding social dynamics this early and this thoughtfully is an invaluable foundation. The children identify their classroom community's challenges and achievements and place them on cards in a separate section of the Strengths and Struggles Book. They are very happy to watch their collective accomplishments develop and grow.

The hidden gem of the Strengths and Struggles Program is that it introduces children to the possibility that their own successes lie within their reach. Even at the young age of five years they can become conscious of the role that emotions and feelings play in their capacity to transform struggles into strengths. This fundamental awareness is an important understanding that can help children develop a healthy sense of well-being.

Linda Lantieri writes: "When social and emotional skills are taught and mastered, they help children succeed not just in school, but in all avenues of life. Social and emotional learning is like an insurance policy for a healthy, positive, successful life."[5] In the Senior Kindergarten class at The Toronto Heschel School, the dream is that each student passing through the doors will be equipped with the inner strength and resilience to approach the challenges of life.

CRITICAL FRIENDS MAKE GOOD WRITERS & STRONG COMMUNITY

BY LESLEY COHEN

The development of trust is essential to the growth of young students. At The Toronto Heschel School, we foster collaborative learning as a key step in anchoring the student experience and building a sense of community, each of which is of immeasurable value to all of our students. Working closely with peers can offer our students much-needed academic support as they push through challenging curricula, and it fosters the all-important dynamic of mutual engagement and respect.

Students challenge themselves and their classmates personally and academically.

While trust is instrumental for a team to successfully reach a common academic goal, it is even more critical when the target of that success has a personal meaning to one individual in the group. An example of this is the practice of peer editing, in which a small group of students reviews another student's writing. Peer editing requires students to challenge themselves and their classmates personally and academically: it assigns them the roles of both the "editor" and the "edited."

As the editors, the students delve into another person's work. They examine it closely, attempt to understand it, and suggest improvements. In turn, when others edit their writing, the students must hear and accept comments from their peers, shedding feelings of vulnerability and insecurity along the way. For many students, this is a daunting task, but with preparation and attentive teacher support, peer editing can become a revolutionary strategy for building community and deepening the bonds of trust within the classroom walls.

At the junior high level, "Heschel-style" chevrutah rarely pairs students with the same partners repeatedly; the students come to know that on any given task, they may be working with any of their classmates, or perhaps in a group of three. They learn not to rely on a consistent buddy or partner, but understand their class as a jigsaw puzzle of shifting pairs or trios that is continually rearranged. Students come to trust that each classmate has something to offer in this collaborative process; each can enrich the learning in new and different ways.

At Heschel, peer editing is embedded throughout our entire Grade 6 language arts curriculum. We begin in the fall with a poetry unit, where students use peer editing to strengthen one another's poems. They next peer edit each other's formal artist statements during the winter preparation for their Eco-Seder, and in the spring, they apply the peer-editing process to their creative short stories in the unit that explores life before the Second World War. Different thematic questions guide the students through these three editing experiences, but a few key elements remain consistent.

The first of these elements is to improve students' writing skills. Knowing that changes will inevitably be made to their words, our young writers learn not to "fall in love" with their first drafts. This openness to change is foundational to students actively improving their writing; it orients them to key habits of mind as they acclimatize to thinking flexibly and meta-cognitively about the writing process.

The second element is to teach students the difference between critique and criticism, between providing feedback and exacting judgment. The ability to wonder is essential to peer editing; editors learn to give thoughtful consideration to the writing and the writer's ideas. According to A.J. Heschel, wonder lies at the root of all knowledge. To encourage wonder, we ensure that students know they are not being asked to evaluate their peers' work but to engage in the work – to ask questions, to probe, and to thoughtfully consider what they are reading.

A third critical element is to understand the common purpose of helping the writer accomplish his/her objective, which might be to complete a strong final draft of a poem or an essay. A student editor does not work independently through a classmate's writing and then return a heavily marked-up assignment without questions or discussion. Instead, students work in groups of two or three, posing questions to the one being edited as they read their peer's writing. The editors can offer suggestions only when they understand the writer's topic, thought process, and intention.

Through this process, the students begin to see themselves as critical friends – which is defined by educational consultants Arthur Costa and Bena Kallick as "a trusted person who asks provocative questions, provides data to be examined through another lens, and offers critique of a person's work as a friend." Costa and Kallick emphasize that this individual "takes the time to fully understand the context of the work presented and the outcomes that the person or group is working toward. The friend is an advocate for the success of that work."[1]

Another benefit of peer editing is developing compassion in students. Each student knows that he/she will be reading and editing another student's work and that his/her own work will undergo the same rigorous treatment. This reciprocal interaction creates and establishes empathy. Our student editors must proffer a piece of positive feedback before a critical one, and pose questions before suggesting improvements. These guidelines develop a level of respect among peers that is not cultivated on the playground or in the traditional classroom setting.

Motivating the desire for self and peer improvement is fundamental to helping students become better writers. Students are very interested in what their peers produce, and even feel pride in each other's finished products. The peer-editing process develops a vested interest in each other's success and the class begins to demonstrate a key characteristic of a community that is engaged and that shares a sense of communal accomplishment.

When the school year begins, students might be reluctant to change their own way of writing, but as the months roll by they become enthusiastic about opening up to peer scrutiny and become more willing to make changes that are needed. Often in my class when a student has been absent on a peer-editing day, and has missed the group interaction, other students volunteer to go through the process with him/her during free time. Students want the critique and their peers want to give it.

One of the objectives of education is to inspire young people to maintain a thirst for learning. As such, it is incumbent upon us as educators to equip our students with the skills to persevere, the confidence to ask questions, and the strength to reflect and revise. One path to this overarching goal is to guide students as they examine their own efforts through the eyes of a trusted, critical friend. In doing so, we not only inspire our students to become better learners but also encourage them to become better people.

COLLABORATION IN SCIENCE AND THE SCIENCE IN COLLABORATION

BY DANIEL ABRAMSON

Last year, I had the pleasure to bring my Grade 8 class to the McEwen Centre for Regenerative Medicine. It was an amazing opportunity for students to see scientists at the cutting edge of their fields working to solve real problems in a first-class laboratory. Under the microscope we saw beating heart cells that were grown from stem cells in a Petri dish, and bone marrow that was engineered from a patient's own cells. The Centre has assembled a world-class team to pursue research here in Toronto and to translate their discoveries into cures for diseases today. Even in our short time there, we came to see that collaboration is a cornerstone of the McEwen Centre's philosophy; it is a foundational belief that they will achieve their goals faster if they work together as a team and collaborate with other institutions worldwide.

I was very inspired, not only by the scientific accomplishments of the McEwen Centre but also by how it fosters an environment that supports collaborative work at its best. They make cooperative, interactive, integrated teamwork look easy, even seamless, but anyone who has worked as part of a successful crew knows that real collaboration is far from easy. It requires very specific skills that, like all competencies, need to be fostered and practised. I believe it behooves all teachers to help students learn these skills.

For example, I could ask a student to move a heavy load from one place to another. If the load were weighty enough, logically the task could require the efforts of multiple students. The students could work in concert, with a shared goal. They could each contribute the same skill in the same way and achieve something together that could not be accomplished by one of them alone. While there is some value in this cooperation, I don't think it's enough.

I would rather ask our group of students to lift a load that they could never budge, even if trying it together. This would force the group to devise a strategy that addresses the problem in a new way, beyond combined muscle power to collective invention. I would ask each member to consider what the group could do differently and to offer suggestions that the team could consider and try. Eventually, when members of the team develop a successful strategy, they will walk away from the collaboration with knowledge that they did not have before. This is the kind of inventive collaboration that science teachers should target.

To stimulate this level of cooperation, a learning environment needs two key features: classroom culture that encourages individuals to create and share ideas, and tasks that are real, complex and in need of inventive thinking. The best collaborative teams, such as the scientists at the McEwen Centre, create an atmosphere where team members feel confident that their ideas will be heard. McEwen scientists meet weekly over lunch to share their progress and reflections; they call their lunches "Working in Progress." Hard challenges, like curing deadly disease, build great resolve and long-lasting professional satisfaction. We also want our students to understand how empowering real success can be.

In Grade 7, we ask students to create functional wind turbines that generate enough power to light a small bulb. The task is daunting, but when the light goes on, the students' gratification glows with it. Students use their knowledge of energy and integrate independent research with models of wind technology observed on field trips. When each student has developed an idea to offer, we assemble collaborative teams to evaluate, build, and test an initial design. Each team assesses its own success and that of the others and then revises its first design based on its observations. The exercise creates a model for high-quality collaboration: the students bring their individual expertise to the team and the team builds on this collected knowledge to create an idea that did not exist before the team convened. In this carefully supervised and structured way, teaching collaboration fosters a core value of our school's science curriculum: innovation.

The approach also builds resilience in learners. When we set out to accomplish a task that is too difficult without the creation of new knowledge, we must expect trial and error, i.e., initial failures. In class, I describe how scientists fail in their experiments and use failure to learn. I remind my class that no one has yet fully discovered how to cure all cancers, yet scientists persist in their investigation and learn from each task they target. As individuals and team players, we want students to learn persistence and perseverance, and to appreciate the value of both unsuccessful and successful efforts.

Currently, in education, business, science, and society at large, the trend seems to be valuing the skill to work as a team player. My job is to prepare my students for their world, and in doing so I am cognizant that collaborative work is not antithetical to individual work, that it is not one way or the other. To teach our students collaborative skills, we teachers should take care in how we frame tasks and define teams. We must provide adequate time and space for students on teams to develop their individual thinking. Otherwise we risk overlooking the preconditions that allow innovation and creativity to flourish.

Collaboration skills need to be fostered and practised. Scientists use failure to learn.

In a recent interview on CBC Radio, Canadian astronaut Julie Payette beautifully presented the delicate balance between the individual and the team. She described how in her interview for the Canadian Space Program she was asked to talk about a time when she had worked as a team player. She answered that she had sung in choirs for 20 years. To sing in harmony and in tempo to create beautiful music, she explained that you need to be able to listen to others and to adjust your own performance accordingly.

In the end, there is an art to the science of collaboration.

HAPPY 18TH BIRTHDAY TORONTO HESCHEL & THANK YOU!

BY MICHELLE SHULMAN

As we meet in the halls, on the field, or socially, I find myself frequently talking with other Heschel moms and dads about how grateful we are for The Toronto Heschel School. It is a wonderful feeling to be so confident in your choice of school for your children and to have your decision validated so often. This fall, as Toronto Heschel turns 18 years old, I have been reflecting on why I feel so grateful.

Our teachers travel to Harvard to study, lead seminars at international math conferences, and engage in serious Jewish learning with the Shalom Hartman Institute.

Some days, I think I am most appreciative of Heschel simply because of the intellectual training that my children are receiving. The questions that they discuss at home and in the car, the topics that they raise, and the debates that they pursue all show me that my children are becoming thinkers. Daily they receive encouragement to be curious and are challenged to ask questions. I can hear for myself that they are learning the art of thoughtful conversation.

Other days I am grateful that their teachers understand that a joyful nurturing environment offers children the best advantage to reach their full potential. In this age of emotional intelligence and neuropsychological discovery, it feels good to know that my family is at a school that keeps itself at the forefront of educational research. Whether it's how to advance reading, writing, or math skills, or how to establish a class environment where students are empowered so they can stretch to reach their potential, the school continually re-evaluates its techniques and practices. I see our teachers travel to Harvard to study, lead seminars at international math conferences, and engage in serious Jewish learning with the Shalom Hartman Institute. As a parent I feel secure knowing that my children's teachers take their own continuing education seriously.

I am very glad that academic skills go hand in hand with contemplation at Toronto Heschel. The school's firm expectation of academic mastery exists within a culture of deeper thinking. My children are being introduced early in their lives to big questions; they are seeing how academic disciplines intertwine and what universal themes look like when observed through a Jewish lens; they are learning that human rights are Jewish ethics and that conservation shows respect for creation. We are not just preparing our children for high school; we are preparing them to participate successfully as citizens in a new world. I am so grateful for the foundational learning they are receiving now.

We are not just preparing our children for high school; we are preparing them to participate successfully as citizens in a new world.

I want my children to have a meaningful Jewish identity, yet I often wonder exactly what this means. Of course, I want them to love Shabbat and appreciate the holidays, to respect the mitzvot and traditions. I want them to be able to pick up a Siddur anywhere in the world and feel comfortable to lead or join a service, and I profoundly want my children to be emotionally and spiritually attached to Israel. But I want more.

For me Judaism is not only for Pesach or Sukkot. Jewish history is not simply for Yom HaShoah or Tisha b'Av. I want my children to cherish Judaism as a living and breathing ethical blueprint that will accompany them on their journey through life. Deep in their hearts and souls I want them to know that our Judaism is one of the great, moral traditions and philosophies of the world.

Amazing as it sounds, I see this all supported by a day school curriculum at Toronto Heschel which seamlessly integrates Jewish and secular subjects. All day long Jewish values, texts, and ideas are interwoven with science, writing, reading, mathematics, history, and geography. The integration is invaluable to the students' understanding of Judaism and compatible with the blended identity of the North American Jewish child in 2013. I am truly thankful for the beautiful and pervasive Jewish sensibility that The Toronto Heschel School engenders in my children.

But often, I think that I am most grateful to be at Toronto Heschel because of the way I see the children in the school behave towards one another, to guests in the school, and to others when they are out in the broader community. I know this is the result of an intentional philosophy that seeps into all parts of our children's education. There is a sense of community that is carefully nurtured from the moment a child walks into Junior Kindergarten. I remember thinking 10 years ago that this was sweet and lovely, but now as my children have grown, I see clearly that this ethic of mutual respect and dignity has helped to shape my children and their peers into confident, empathetic, and responsible individuals.

Heschel is a destination school for families from all over Toronto, from all the Jewish affiliations and backgrounds.

I am overwhelmed this birthday year by the enthusiasm and appreciation we are receiving from current families, alumni, and alumni families. Those of us who have been around the school for many years know what we have. The buzzwords featured on advertisements for schools around town today reflect ideas that have been mainstream at Heschel since 1996 when the doors first opened – the whole child, learning through the arts, environmental programming, critical thinking, creativity, character development, experiential learning, ethics. This year we celebrate 18 years of leadership in these areas.

I am very grateful for the Heschel school community. Heschel is a destination school for families from all over Toronto, from all Jewish affiliations and backgrounds. The result is a warm and special collection of families who want their children in a nurturing and educationally advanced Jewish environment. Everyone is so happy about the 18th birthday and the milestone that it is. We are families who have a school we call home, and I am thankful for it all.

Michelle Shulman has been a Toronto Heschel School parent for 10 years and will be there for six more. She is Vice Chair of The Lola Stein Institute.

AWE AND ENGAGEMENT: A PSYCHIATRIST AND A RABBI TALK THEATRE

A THINK INTERVIEW WITH DR. DAVID GOLDBLOOM BY RABBI JOE KANOFSKY

"Though this be madness, yet there is method in't," says Polonius in Shakespeare's Hamlet (act 2, scene 2).

While there's no guarantee that theatregoing will improve your mental health, there is a lot to be said for theatre attendance. I can recall the experience some 20 years ago of sitting in a theatre with tears welling up in my eyes during the climactic scene of Arthur Miller's All My Sons. I had already read the play several times and even memorized some scenes, yet seeing it presented on stage affected me in a way it never had before.

What made an even greater impression on me was what I saw and heard when the house lights came up and the audience stood and made its way to the exits. I was truly stunned by the amount of sniffles that I suddenly became aware of, and of the Kleenex and handkerchiefs that appeared in my fellow audience members' hands. So many of us were moved to tears by a script, a 50-year-old text that we probably already knew well. The audience experience had touched something inside us deeply and profoundly; we felt something at the core of our beings.

It's quite well known that acting in various forms has a significant place in several forms of psychotherapy, be it role playing, the empty-chair technique, or psychodrama. But what can be said about the experience of the observer of drama, the theatregoer? Of what benefit is it to be part of an audience watching a play unfold on stage, to be witness to a performance as opposed to taking part in it? There must be something to it. After all, theatre is one of the enduring literary and artistic forms of Western civilization, a spectrum from classical Greek drama to the Shakespearean tradition to the contemporary Purimshpiel.

I deepened my insight and appreciation of theatregoing in a recent conversation with Dr. David Goldbloom. Not only is he the Senior Medical Advisor of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (CAMH) and a professor of psychiatry at the University of Toronto, he is also the chair of the Board of Governors of the Stratford Shakespeare Festival of Canada, and he has been an actor and theatregoer most of his life.

We first discussed a few very practical elements in the theatre experience that distinguish it from other forms of entertainment in our world, from cinema to home DVD viewing to TiVo to YouTube.

"A theatregoer is having an experience in real time, with real people," Dr. Goldbloom noted. "This makes it different from the experience of watching a television show or a movie, for several reasons ... Sitting in a theatre, you are in a darkened room with your cellphone off. Distractions are minimized, and for some of us, going to theatre may provide some of our closest experiences with focused, sustained attention In our hyper-connected world, it may be one of the only times in our lives when we are awake without our cellphones threatening to divide our attention at any moment."

I agreed that this kind of intense focus is increasingly rare in our world. We continue to deceive ourselves that we can "multi-task" efficiently as we busily pay partial attention to two, three, or four directions at once.

The theatre experience is immediate, whole, and complex. A film or a TV show is likely filmed out of sequence, and the pieces later edited together. As Dr. Goldbloom pointed out, "There's no way to know in which order the scenes were shot; or whether you are watching the third take or the thirty-seventh." This gap admits distance between the observer and the drama.

Further comparing the screen to stage, Dr. Goldbloom added, "You also have no certainty as to voice dubbing or other mixing effects that go into film production ... Sitting in a theatre you are almost near enough to touch the actors.

You can see the fullness of their movements, positioning, and body language." Watching theatre differs even from reading a script or listening to the live reading of a play. A reader has only one voice, but when a play is acted out on stage, the range and combination of interpretive possibilities is really endless.

Theatre is a living performance, which, Dr. Goldbloom emphasized, distinguishes it from any other kind of audience experience, "There is a certain peril in live performance which underscores and magnifies the achievement. It adds a sense of infectious excitement and expectation to watching a performance on the stage that we will never experience with recorded media ... Once a film has been released, we know that the filmmaker believes it to be a finished product. This is never the case on the stage even though the play has been well rehearsed, directed, and stage-managed. The audience literally watches the action unfold. Human frailty being what it is, anything can happen." It can be an outstanding performance, or a dud. It can scale the heights, or an actor can drop a line or miss a cue.

When I asked Dr. Goldbloom to recall a theatre highlight, a memorable or transformative moment in his theatregoing experience, he recalled an opening a few years ago of Stratford's production of Samuel Beckett's Krapp's Last Tape. The lead and lone actor on stage, Brian Dennehy, opened the play with an approximately two-minute long silent look of awe and wonder.

"It allowed everyone to empathize, to project their own thoughts onto the character," Dr. Goldbloom said. "In our world, it is noteworthy that moments of silence still have power. The moment allowed each audience member to embroider onto the actor's silent awe whatever he or she was thinking and feeling."

Dr. Goldbloom cited the work of Dr. Vivian Rakoff, a psychiatrist who writes about the psychological aspects of theatre and describes theatre as a safe venue to explore our most horrible emotions such as hatred, murder, lust, jealousy. When I asked why someone playing an interactive video game couldn't explore the same emotions, Dr. Goldbloom explained that the video game experience doesn't force the player to think in a deep and sustained way about the questions. Nor does it offer any sense of objectivity or transcendence to the player's experiences of violence or other strong emotions as he plays.

In one of this season's repertory plays at the Stratford Shakespeare Festival, Mary Stuart, the storyline involves murder as well as politics. Elizabeth I of England holds her cousin, Mary Queen of Scots, prisoner and deliberates whether to execute her. Elizabeth's anxiety over her course of action introduces the notion of "plausible deniability," a watchword coined during the Kennedy Administration and commonly connected to Watergate in late 20th-century politics. It's quite interesting that the play is over 200 years old. It was written by Friedrich Schiller, and debuted on the German stage in the year 1800.

"In our world, it is noteworthy that moments of silence still have power."

In another Stratford production this year, The Merchant of Venice is set in a different Italy than the Italy that Shakespeare imagined; Stratford sets the play in 1938 under a fascist regime. The staging of the end of the play connects it to the actuality of the Holocaust, underscoring the questions and conflicts that Shakespeare raises about identities, both of Shylock and of the other characters in the play.

The two plays demonstrate the enduring capacity of theatre to touch on universal, even transcendent themes. The engaged and attentive audience member has the latitude to be removed and objective while at the same time intensely engaged with nuances of character and plot. Seeing ever-present human tensions presented on stage allows us to observe conflicts and interactions that are difficult, even tragic. We can either digest them or let them continue to bother and trouble us long after we've walked out of the theatre.

"I don't go to the theatre to improve my mental health. However, as a story unfolds over two hours on stage, I'm surprised by the awe and engagement that I feel by the end of the production," says Dr. Goldbloom.

Seeing live theatre lets us develop an increasingly rare and challenging skill; we practise our capacity to minimize distraction and focus on a matter at hand. Theatre allows us the intimacy to experience the story line of a play for a brief finite period and to willingly suspend our disbelief, in Coleridge's terms. We can find ourselves being quite amused, deeply enraged, genuinely fearful, or absolutely mesmerized by a scenario as we are drawn in to its real-time and real-life tension. The theatre's ability to develop in its audience the capacity to focus, reflect, empathize, and even experience catharsis remains unique among the performing arts.

INTENTIONAL CHEVRUTA LEARNING

CULTIVATING ETHICAL AND SPIRITUAL GROWTH IN LEARNERS

BY ALISON COOK AND ORIT KENT

Jewish educators are drawn to using chevruta learning in their classrooms for many satisfying reasons. As a traditional mode of Jewish study, simply studying text in pairs lets students experience a valued Jewish way of learning.[1] Educators and students alike get excited about the intellectual possibilities – picture images of lively pairs fulfilling the Talmudic adage of "iron sharpening iron."

As talk of twenty-first-century learning enlivens educators' professional discourse, the intellectual and social potential of chevruta learning heeds the call for critical thinking, communication, and collaboration. Chevruta learning also provides a fertile laboratory for social skills. It is compelling to see how the pedagogical structure of chevruta, when thoughtfully designed and supported, meets today's educational ideals and indeed surpasses them with intriguing potential as an ethical and spiritual practice. There is a lot that Jewish educators can do to deepen their use of this learning structure and become designers of an intentional chevruta learning practice that will nurture their students intellectually, socially, ethically, and spiritually.

Consider this component of a beit midrash (house of study) exercise designed to induct students into what we call "intentional chevruta learning."

> Take a few minutes to write about a time when you felt that someone else really understood you. Then write about a time when you felt misjudged or misunderstood. What happened there? What did the other person do or not do to make you feel understood or misunderstood? Share your stories with your chevruta.

For the seventh graders who participated in this exercise, vivid and heartfelt memories of being understood – or not – emerged easily. Stories of teachers, parents, friends, and peers who demonstrated understanding or misunderstanding contributed to a list of attitudes and actions that students' characterized as leading to understanding on the one hand or to misjudgment on the other. Students explored the idea that their study in a chevruta partnership was not only about decoding a text or taking turns talking, but also about "seeking to understand" and "being understood." Throughout the chevruta learning, exploration of the intent "to seek understanding" remains a focal point alongside the teaching of standard text study skills. Through the thoughtful use of intentional chevruta learning, learners develop ethical and spiritual, intellectual and social capacities in tandem.

We use two main research-based frameworks that help students grow in multiple dimensions. The first framework is "the chevruta triangle,"[2] which opens discussion and builds imagery for an ideal chevruta partnership. This is not a partnership of two, but a partnership of three: two people and the text. "The chevruta triangle" can be drawn as an equilateral triangle with one partner at each corner. We "seek to understand" not only that our partner has her/his own ideas, thoughts, and voice, but also that the text has its own "voice" and multiple meanings. Each partner works to demonstrate his/her openness to listen, understand, and respond to the other's ideas and to achieve new understandings and interpretations.

The shared imagery of the chevruta triangle lets students monitor their own activity within the partnership; they can assess how well they hold open the triangle and whether all three partners have a presence and a voice. Here are some reflections from seventh graders on what they learned through their chevruta partnerships after a few sessions:

> "I need to take a breath and tune in to what I am doing and be more conscious of my partner and myself."
> "I need to analyze [the text] more than once and leave my mind open to other views. I also learned not to judge it [the text]."
> "It's hard to share power but I must."

The students express an unprompted "I need to" or "I must" message about being a chevruta partner to both the text and their peer, implying that their chevruta partnership obligates them to behave in certain ways for themselves and their partners. This sense of obligation and responsibility to the other taps into an essential and ethical underpinning of the chevruta relationship: we are responsible to and for one another and through this mini-universe of obligation we gain new knowledge, interpretations, and insights.

In the student reflections we also hear overtones of a spiritual vitality that allude to attunement, wonder, and a sense of connection. A student reminds herself to "take a breath," "tune in," and "become more conscious," there is a sense of needing to slow down and pay attention. Another student seeks "remaining open," a stance towards sustaining wonder.

It is one thing to identify the importance of becoming more attuned to one's partners or to remain open to different ideas; it is another thing to know how to do it. The "how" is where our second major framework comes in: "the six practices of chevruta."[3] This framework builds the skills needed to establish the relationship and realize the learning possibilities of studying texts closely with others.

Through lessons, tools, exercises, and feedback, we work with students to enact and enhance "the six practices of chevruta" – listening and articulating, wondering and focusing, and challenging and supporting. Each set can entail intellectual, social, ethical, and spiritual engagement, particularly when applied to all three chevruta partners. Notice how a chevruta student refers to his own experience of "listening and articulating":

> I think that the text is telling you something that makes it a partner but you have to listen to what it is telling you... you can't do that with the text...just by scanning it...the same with any person. You really have to get to know them... (Our emphasis.)

What begins as an intellectual exercise in closely reading a Jewish text becomes reframed as a practice of "listening" to a text that has something to "articulate" to readers. Even the text engages in listening and articulating and through our own use of these practices we can "really get to know" and connect with the text and with people. The student's reflection shows both ethical and spiritual reverberations: an ethical responsibility to seek textual understanding – beyond a cursory look – and the spiritual understanding that the text will speak to us if we listen.

We hear similar reflections from students using the "challenging and supporting" set of practices. These require critical thinking and introduce the idea of "evidence" to build and evaluate ideas together. Students embrace these practices not only as the tools of intellectual creativity and refinement, but also as the means to develop the ethic of intellectual honesty. When students describe the "voice" of the text as "challenging" or "supporting" their ideas, again we see the spiritual significance of chevruta practice.

To design and participate in intentional chevruta learning requires time and energy. In the words of one pair of seventh graders looking back over their beit midrash program: "We worked hard!" For these students and for many others, the pedagogy of intentional chevruta learning opens possibilities for growing in multiple ways, a reward that is well worth the effort.

TAKING TANENBAUMCHAT TO THE NEXT LEVEL: MEET THE NEW HEAD OF SCHOOL

A think INTERVIEW WITH RABBI LEE BUCKMAN

BY BRYAN BORZYKOWSKI

Rabbi Lee Buckman always knew that he wanted to be a Jewish educator. He was drawn to Torah when he was a child and was a regular tutor during his university years. But, it was in 1999, after spending nearly a decade as a congregational rabbi in Milwaukee, that he got his chance to combine his two passions of Torah and teaching in a school setting: he founded The Frankel Jewish Academy of Metro Detroit and developed new curriculum for it.

Ten years later in 2009, Rabbi Buckman became the head of school at the struggling Greenfield Hebrew Academy in Atlanta. He turned the school around by instituting a culture of philanthropy and setting higher board expectations and fiscal standards. As a respected educator, he has consulted across North America on ways to improve Jewish education. Last spring, Rabbi Buckman was appointed the head of school of TanenbaumCHAT in Toronto. think spoke with him to find out more about his educational philosophy and what he plans to do at his new school.

What attracted you to Jewish education?

I love children and teaching, and I love Torah. Teaching combines all three passions. I initially worked as a congregational rabbi where I focused a lot on family education. After a decade of doing that, I wanted to narrow the focus of my rabbinical work on education at school.

What's your approach to Jewish education?

My goal is to instill a love of Yiddishkeit in our children in a school setting, so that they're living, loving, and breathing Judaism. I want them to find it so meaningful and compelling that they want to continue deepening their Jewish learning and living. It's my mission statement wherever I go.

How do you do that?

There are three components to it. In a formal school setting, it's about getting the absolute best teachers that a school can recruit, teachers who will inspire children and challenge them. I mean teachers who are not only experts in subject matter but also character educators, people who are good role models and who see that it's not just about imparting information but helping to transform lives.

The second component is breaking down the silos among different Jewish institutions that have a similar mission. To the extent a school can partner with Jewish camps or synagogues or Jewish youth movements, the school will achieve its mission more readily.

The third is strong partnerships with parents, because ultimately a school can teach material, but it's the parents who teach meaning.

What are some of the challenges that Jewish educators face today?

The challenges relate to my three components. Recruiting excellent teachers is hard; recruiting excellent teachers in Judaics is even more difficult. They are often not as valued as other professionals in terms of being appreciated both financially and emotionally. The profession lacks a sense of security and so it's a less appealing profession to go into. Teaching is a difficult skill to master: Judaics teachers do need to be experts in their subject matter, but they also need to know pedagogy.

Many institutions think they can do it alone. It takes a great degree of humility to say we have a mission, but here's something we don't do well and we need to do it in collaboration with others.

Finally, we're all a part of a world where there are things that compete with Judaism in the market place, and so we need constantly to make the case for what the school is trying to accomplish. We have to articulate a vision and present a case to move kids and families into the system and through the system. And we need to stay with them well after they graduate.

How has Jewish education changed over the years?
People argue that certain things have changed, but really a lot hasn't changed at all. We hear a lot about the affordability crisis in Jewish day school education today. I believe the issues of affordability, not just in Jewish day school but in Jewish life, have been around for decades: synagogue dues, camp tuition, the cost of Kosher. True, the costs may have gone up, but proportionally the issues are the same.

One significant positive change in Jewish day school education has been that it's become much more professionalized over the past 15 years. That's because of foundations and organizations like the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education or the AVI CHAI Foundation in New York. We've taken the best practices in private school education and brought them into Jewish education.

Do Jewish people still value Jewish education?
It's one of those things people say, that, in the good old days, Jewish education was of top importance. Even though I didn't live in the good old days, I know that 50 years ago there were other things that competed.

When Jewish immigrants first came to America they wanted to fit into the culture and one gateway to that was the public school system. That's where they learned English and math, but they also learned baseball and apple pie. So American culture was competing with sacred traditional values and Jews were abandoning Judaism in search of how to be a better American.

Now the question is no longer how do I become a good American, but how do I become a good Jew. People are trying to understand how to be a more committed and passionate Jew and how that makes you a better citizen of the world around you.

We still need administrators and leaders and board members to continue making the case of why Jewish education is important, but that is something that people have needed to do throughout Jewish history.

What do you plan to do at TanenbaumCHAT?
My challenge for the next six months is to really get to know the TanenbaumCHAT family and learn, through their eyes, about norms and culture and the history of CHAT. I have to learn its strengths and challenges. With what I learn from people's hopes and dreams, I'll be able to formulate some shared goals and shared plans; that will really be the way I can take CHAT to the next level

THE BENEFITS OF INTERGENERATIONAL LEARNING

BY LISA RICHLER

When a group of Baycrest residents entered the halls of The Toronto Heschel School last fall, one might have guessed they had come to watch a play, hear the choir, or see an art exhibit. The truth is that the group of seniors, ranging in age from 86 to 99, had come to school to be students. The visit was part of an Intergenerational Learning Project that was piloted throughout the year by Heschel and Baycrest.

Members of the Baycrest team first approached Heschel because they were interested in the school's expertise in learning through the arts. Baycrest scientists like Dr. Sylvain Moreno, who are leaders in cognitive neuroscience research, have been investigating the brain's plasticity and how arts-based contexts can improve brain function. According to Bianca Stern, Baycrest's Director of Arts, Culture, and Innovation, "what Toronto Heschel was doing with kids, we wanted to push forward with the elders."

Gail Baker, Head and Co-Founder of Toronto Heschel, explains her interest in the partnership, "We are always looking for new ways to meaningfully enhance students cognitive and social growth; to challenge our students with unfamiliar activities that will increase their ability to sustain attention and persevere through a task." The Heschel team developed a pilot project in which a group of Baycrest seniors would pair up with Grade 6 students, and over the course of the year they would work together on three separate units of study: Poetry, the Eco-Seder, and Life Before the War.

Intergenerational learning takes some getting used to. When the sixth graders and seniors met for the first time last fall, Heschel teacher Lesley Cohen recalls that "the kids were a bit awkward, and the seniors were a bit nervous." Everyone was coming to lessons "from different entry points." The seniors obviously had vast life experience to draw upon, but it had been a long time since any of them had been asked to complete a school assignment. At the outset, many felt they were in over their heads. That initial meeting took place at the greenhouse in the Baycrest Terraces, where Cohen led a poetry lesson. Each sixth grader was paired up with a Baycrest resident, and the partners were instructed to choose a plant in the greenhouse, study its properties, and compose a poem about it. Despite the participants' initial discomfort, Cohen believes that writing poetry "really broke the ice" between the students and their Baycrest partners. "Poetry is such a great place to start, because it's so free. You don't feel constricted by various grammatical structures and punctuation … There are so few rules."

The students returned to Baycrest several times to revise, edit, and extend their work with their partners. The unit culminated in a Poetry Café at the school, where both generations of students recited their poems and socialized over hot chocolate, tea, and cookies. A few Baycrest residents read poems that they had written as early as their own adolescence.

Baker remembers, "I don't think there was a person watching who was not profoundly moved by the interactions." Both Baycrest and Heschel staff participants could see that the experience was drawing the children and the seniors closer, allowing them to understand one another.

Cohen points out, "We often acknowledge seniors' ability to recall their own youth when interacting with young people. However, we don't often think about how children can see that same thing – they now saw an 85-year-old woman as a 13-year-old girl, and developed more empathy for the senior in the process. They didn't just see them as a Bubbie or Zaida but as a young girl or boy much like themselves." Baker adds that, for the Grade 6 students, "working with elders was a means to develop respect for them. Our students could see the insights they can offer. This breaks down stereotypes that distance the generations from each other."

In the winter, the Baycrest residents came to Heschel to create ceramic Seder plates for the Eco-Seder, an integrated Grade 6 program that combines Passover themes with studies in environmental issues, math, science, and the arts. Judith Leitner, Director of Arts and Co-Founder of Heschel, recalls that a few Baycrest residents were insecure about connecting themes and ideas across different disciplines. "Our kids are hip to integration," explains Leitner. "They are used to making connections and thinking through various layers of art – the math, the science. The challenge was teaching people in their 80s and 90s how to think this way."

What was interesting, is that sometimes the children would mentor the seniors, and sometimes the seniors would mentor the children; but the switch happened naturally.

Leitner believes that one of the greatest benefits for the children was that they had the chance to play the role of teacher for their partners. "The kids had to reach inside themselves and explain a concept, and they gained a much deeper understanding of what they were learning by having to teach it."

"What was interesting," says Baker, "is that sometimes the children would mentor the seniors and sometimes the seniors would mentor the children; but the switch happened naturally. All participants, young and elder, would teach what they knew and learn from their partners. The result was visible cooperation and partnership. For the children, it was an awakening to new avenues for gathering information."

The intergenerational classroom levelled the playing field. Sure, some students were older and some were younger, but everyone saw themselves and the others as able and intelligent participants in a lifelong learning continuum. As Baker suggests, "Sometimes, younger people are afraid of elders, particularly in our society that doesn't always allow for natural interactions. The intergenerational classroom allows for a more normative relationship."

The Intergenerational Learning Project ended with the unit Life Before the War, an inquiry into the Jewish experience before the Second World War. The sixth graders and seniors studied the work and lives of artists Marc Chagall and Mayer Kirshenblatt and explored what life was like for European Jews before the Holocaust. The seniors had personal stories to tell: some shared memories of growing up in shtetls in Poland; others, born in North America, remembered their families' experiences in Europe and the "transplanted shtetls" in which they had grown up in Toronto, Montreal, and New York. The seniors' personal stories stuck with the sixth graders, and often surfaced in later class discussions. According to Cohen, the seniors' remembrances colourfully supplemented her students' "academic knowledge" and rendered the learning of history relevant and real.

Baker is pleased with the benefits that intergenerational learning brought to her students:

The pilot project was experiential, which is the most authentic way to learn; all of the modules had a hands-on and face-to-face component. It fostered students' interpersonal skills as they interacted in new ways with new people on new topics; to understand one another the seniors and youngsters had to talk to one another and then talk more. The inevitable awkwardness of new relationships and the struggling through to make their ideas understood was great both for (the students') social and academic skills. They had to produce high-quality work in a new environment.

The project proved to the students that in life the learning process never ends and that all ages can anticipate trying new things and absorbing new knowledge. Leitner describes the atmosphere during the collaboration as "joyful and optimistic ... the sky is the limit." Toronto Heschel and Baycrest are pursuing a second Intergenerational Learning Project this year.

Lisa Richler, M.A., earned a Master of Arts in Humanities at the University of Chicago and worked as a writer and teacher before having kids. She now volunteers in various roles at The Toronto Heschel School and The Lola Stein Institute.

Jewish Federations General Assembly convenes in Israel

Netanyahu rails against 'bad deal' on Iran

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu once again took a hard line against Iran's nuclear program in an address to the Jewish Federations of North America General Assembly (GA) in Jerusalem.

Speaking Sunday on the opening night of the GA, Netanyahu also repeated his demand that, in order for Israel to reach a peace deal with the Palestinians, Palestinian leadership must recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

He finished by calling for a continued strong bond between Israel and the North American Jewish community.

On Iran, Netanyahu criticized the compromise proposed in recent multilateral negotiations over its nuclear program, several times calling it a "bad deal."

"What is being proposed now is a deal in which Iran retains all of that capacity" to build a nuclear weapon, Netanyahu told representatives of Jewish communities across the United States and Canada. "Not one centrifuge is dismantled – not one. Iran gets to keep tons of low enriched uranium."

Western powers and Iran failed to reach agreement in negotiations last week on easing sanctions against Iran in return for the Islamic Republic freezing its nuclear program for six months. The sides are expected to meet again in 10 days.

Netanyahu said he would continue to criticize such an agreement and called on his audience to join him in advocating against it. Later he suggested that Iran has plans to attack the United States.

"When it comes to Jewish survival and the survival of the Jewish state, I will not be silenced, ever," he said to loud cheers from the crowd, "We are the Jewish state. We are charged with defending ourselves and speaking up. All of us, all of us, have to stand up and speak up."

Quebec secularism bill tougher than expected

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups denounce Bill 60 for violating minority rights

MONTREAL — After two months of leaks and preliminary guidelines, the Parti Québécois government on Nov. 7 tabled a bill for the "Charter of State Secularism" that is even more far-reaching and restrictive than the proposed charter of Quebec values.

Bill 60 was vigorously denounced by Jewish groups, which say it violates fundamental rights.

Both the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and B'nai Brith Canada say they will take legal action, if necessary, should the bill become law.

"We are disappointed that, rather than heeding the advice of a cross-section of Quebecers, including Quebec's human rights commission, health institutions and teachers' unions, the government has hardened its position by introducing even more stringent measures," Eric Maldoff and Luciano Del Negro, respectively CIJA chair and vice-president for Quebec, said in a statement.

This "intransigent government is sending the message to Quebec minorities that our rights are dependent on the majority, rather than being protected and guaranteed as they should be under the rule of law," they stated.

The organization is particularly disturbed by Section 38 of the bill, which it says opens up the possibility of preventing elected officials from sitting in the National Assembly because of their outward religious identity.

Extradition Appealed

OTTAWA — An Ottawa professor accused of a deadly 1980 shul bombing in Paris was in court last week appealing his 2011 extradition order for the crime. Crown lawyers defended handwriting evidence linking Hassan Diab, 59, to the bombing, which killed four and injured dozens. Diab, a Canadian of Lebanese descent who was arrested for the crime in 2008, maintains his innocence and has produced expert opinions disputing a French expert's claim his handwriting and the presumed bomber's signature on a hotel slip are the same. The Crown supports an earlier ruling that French courts must weigh the evidence, even if it doesn't meet Canadian standards.

Fraudster Sentenced

NEW YORK — Semen Domnitser, the Claims Conference employee who was found guilty of leading a $57-million fraud scheme at the Holocaust restitution organization, was sentenced to eight years in jail last week. Domnitser, 55, was also ordered to pay $57.3 million in restitution. Since 2010, 31 people have been charged with taking part in the scheme to defraud the Article 2 Fund and Hardship Fund programs directed by Domnitser. Twenty-eight pleaded guilty, and three – Domnitser, Torontonian Luba Kramrish and Oksana Romalis – were convicted in May. Kramrish was sentenced Sept. 20 to 37 months in jail. Romalis is scheduled to be sentenced Nov. 26. The fraud, discovered in 2009, dated to 1993.

Jews Urged To Act

NEW YORK — The Oneida Nation is calling on Jewish communities to heed the call of two Washington-area rabbis and boycott the Washington Redskins name. "I believe our cause will resonate through the Jewish community," Ray Halbritter, head of the New York-based Oneida Indian Nation, told JTA. "We hope that rabbis will stand by these rabbis to be on the right side of history." The Oneida Nation has been a leader among Native American groups urging the NFL franchise to change its name. The rabbis, Aaron Frank and Shmuel Herzfeld, urged other rabbis to support them. The Anti-Defamation League also backs the call.

Ausmus Picked To Manage Detroit Tigers

DETROIT — Brad Ausmus, who managed the Israeli national team's bid for the World Baseball Classic, is the new manager of the Detroit Tigers.

Brad Ausmus

Ausmus, 44, was a three-time Gold Glove catcher for four teams in his playing days. His Israeli team failed to qualify for the World Baseball Classic in 2012, losing to Spain, 9-7, in 10 innings in the final game of the qualifying tournament.

A Connecticut native who was educated at Dartmouth, he has never served as a manager or coach in Major League Baseball. He has been a special assistant in the San Diego Padres' front office since 2010, the year he retired as a player.

Ausmus joins a short roster of Jews who have managed major league teams, including current Oakland A's manager Bob Melvin – both have Jewish mothers and non-Jewish fathers. The first was one of the earliest Jewish players, Lipman Pike, an outfielder-infielder who managed the Cincinnati Red Stockings in 1877.

Ausmus had two stints playing with the Tigers and last played with the Los Angeles Dodgers. He spent most of his career, which started in 1993, with the Houston Astros. He succeeds Jim Leyland, who stepped down following Detroit's loss to the eventual world champion Boston Red Sox in the AL Championship Series.

Business mogul finds long-lost WWII letter

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

James (Jimmy) Kay, is a man well-known in Canada for his monumental success with Dylex Ltd., – the now-defunct billion-dollar clothing consortium – as well as his Jewish philanthropic endeavours.

But a recent discovery by Elaine Kay, Jimmy's wife of 50 years, prompted her to tell a different, less-known story about her 91-year-old husband – one that paints him as a decorated World War II hero.

The story begins when Elaine, 75, invited a relative of hers, a war veteran, to dinner at the Kays' opulent Yorkville home months ago.

"He said, 'Wasn't Jimmy a captain? He was very famous in the war. He got a million medals.'"

At his urging, Elaine called Veterans Affairs Canada in Ottawa for a package containing his medals, information about where and when he served, and a copy of his attestation papers, all of which arrived last summer.

According to his attestation papers, Winnipeg-born Jimmy was 18 years old and a slight 143 pounds when he enlisted with the Canadian Forces in September 1939.

By 1942, Jimmy was serving as a lieutenant in the Royal Canadian Army Service Corps (RCASC). He later became a captain and saw active service in Britain and northwest Europe until he returned home in 1946.

In recognition of his service, Jimmy was awarded a number of medals, including the 1939-45 Star, the France and Germany Star, the Defence Medal, the Canadian Volunteer Service Medal, the War Medal 1939-1945, and the General Service Badge.

But it is a letter from Jimmy's troops –which had been filed away for decades until it was stumbled upon a few weeks ago – that has become the Kays' most prized possession.

"We had an office on Bloor [Street], and we dismantled it a few weeks ago. There was this portfolio that had a few things from the war, and in it was this letter that he was talking about all these years," said Elaine, speaking for Jimmy, who suffers from dementia.

Will 'hydro-relations' bring Israel peace – and praise?

It was just a few years ago that, with increasing frequency, Israeli officials were issuing dire warnings about a pending drought in Israel. Given the perilously low level of water in Lake Kinneret, the country's main source of fresh water, numerous measures were put in place to try to reduce per capita water consumption. Rainwater that fell in the precious few winter months, if it fell at all, was measured by the millimetre as a much-needed source of water replenishment.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

It was, therefore, surprising earlier this year to learn from Times of Israel editor David Horovitz that, according to Alexander Kushnir, head of Israel's Water Authority, Israel's water crisis is, for the foreseeable future, over. Horovitz wrote (Feb. 26) that "as of early 2013... the Water Authority feels it can say with confidence that Israel has beaten the drought."

This outcome was the culmination of two factors in Israeli planning: large-scale water recycling and the construction of major desalination plants.

That was a stunning and unexpected announcement, but it came as a most welcome piece of good news.

It is one thing for Israel to declare an end to drought, especially in an area of the world almost always on the brink of one, but quite another to be able to reveal, just a few months later, that Israel has a surplus.

That additionally stunning news was the focus of a cover story by Judith Sudilovsky in the Oct. 21 issue of Jerusalem Report magazine.

Citing the work of Prof. Eilon Adar, director of the Zuckerberg Institute for Water Research at Ben-Gurion University, whose team is in the forefront of developing Israel's high-tech water innovations, Sudilovsky wrote that "this desert nation now has water to spare, thanks to technologies ranging from water purification and desalination to improved water infrastructure that leaves Israel with the lowest municipal leakage rate in the world of about 15 per cent."

She quoted Adar: "In Israel, there is more water being produced than God has provided. We are doing it through desalinating seawater and brackish groundwater and cleaning effluents. Since we already need to bridge demand and supply with artificial water, we need to keep producing more and more efficient ways to create water." According to Adar, Israel's water supply is secure for the next 20 years.

Sudilovsky also interviewed Abraham Tenne, head of the desalination division of the Israel Water Authority, who spoke about how Israel's innovations in water technology have important implications for peace: "Historically, water has always been a reason for war or fights. We think that water is a bridge to peace, and this is why we need to deal with water to try to build up confidence between us and our neighbours, to let them share in what we have already succeeded in doing, and let them step ahead with this water sector."

Tenne includes the Palestinians, Jordan, and the Gulf states among those who can benefit from Israel's expertise.

Israel's know-how – something Shlomi Dinar, an expert in environmental politics at Florida International University, calls its "hydro-relations" – is being picked up around the world: in Latin America, Africa, Central Asia and even Europe.

The Oct. 31 Times of India reported about a talk Brett Jonathan Miller, Israel's consul general in Mumbai, gave at Goa University. Incorporating lessons from Israel about water and agricultural management, Miller said, India can feed the world in the future. Miller pointed out "while more than 50 per cent of water in areas like Mumbai is wasted even before it reaches homes due to poor pipelines, Israel recycles 70 per cent of its water for use."

Israeli high-tech water firms are also taking their innovations to Europe. As the Nov. 6 Times of Israel reported, Netavim, a leading Israeli company in irrigation management technology, is applying its expertise to improve agricultural yields at nine European sites.

Israel's central role in helping to improve water management and food production around the globe is a story just beginning to be told.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Let's set a new tone

Guest Editorial

Last month, I had a fabulous evening in Toronto. A former student and his wife – who have become good friends – hosted a book party and fundraiser at their home for 25 of their friends. We donated the proceeds to Birthright Israel, given our shared passions for Israel, Jewish education and Jewish identity-building. More important than the money raised that night, however, was the consciousness raised by the great discussion.

The participants were successful Toronto Jews in their 30s and 40s, building their careers and their lives."There must have been 50 [academic] degrees in that room," my host said. Even more impressive than their career credentials were their smarts and their passion. These were thoughtful, interested people, trying to navigate in a complex world and wondering where their Jewish identity fit into it all.

These are the people who will build our community's future. My short introduction noted that we are all traumatized by living in this age of Israel-bashing, and I challenged them to develop a modern, positive Zionist vision that takes Jewish peoplehood and Israel personally.

Participants then asked about Zionism and anti-Zionism. They asked about Israel and the recent Pew study showing U.S. Jewish secularization. They asked about Jewish educational dilemmas and parenting challenges. I expected us to end after an hour, but – only because it was "a school night" – we finished after two hours of intense discussion.

One of the exciting things about visiting Toronto is that it is a flourishing Jewish community. What most struck me, however, was how welcoming the reaction was when I criticized certain aspects of Jewish life we often take for granted, from the big, cathedral-style Judaism that has most Jews entering synagogue three times a year and focusing more on the fashion show in the pews than the needs of their souls, to the rampant careerism that emphasizes good grades over good values in most Jewish schools.

Of course, we emphasized the positives, too – that's why we all showed up and stayed. But the evening confirmed my sense that most Jewish discussions today – except about Israel – are too polite. Young Jews, in particular, need to hear older, more established Jews being critical, candid and controversial. Too many leaders prefer the two "Ds" of defensiveness and denial to these three essentials "Cs." They heard my frustrations, but saw that I'm still engaged, still showing up, still fighting. Too often, Jewish critics are dismissed as disgruntled dissidents, not loving liberators.

I left Toronto convinced that, for the Jewish community to grow, we should set a new tone of constructive criticism and self-criticism. We should start convening more such evenings, not as gripe sessions but as true encounters. Let's engage Jewish texts as a way of engaging Jewish issues. And let's remind ourselves – and teach others – that engaging seriously involves recognizing the good and the bad, sifting, assessing, and judging – without delegitimizing but with a view to relegitimizing and reviving.

The renewed Canadian Jewish News should facilitate this debate. It should use these pages as a platform for the open, rollicking debate this community needs. The CJN should also convene various community forums, from informal living room salons to formal synagogue evenings to book clubs, to push the community to stretch, grow, and thrive.

Israel must halt settlements in capital

I am writing as a member of JSpace Canada, a progressive Zionist organization that is committed to a democratic Jewish state alongside a viable Palestinian state.

We are dismayed by the recent announcement by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to greatly accelerate settlement expansion in east Jerusalem. This exacerbates the occupation and undermines the creation of a Palestinian state. Settlement expansion is an act of provocation and bad faith during peace talks.

If a peace treaty is not achieved soon, Israel risks losing its status as a democracy, and with that, the support of progressive Jews who cherish the values in Israel's Declaration of Independence. It also risks leaving a legacy of war and insecurity for future generations of both Israelis and Palestinians.

We call on Israel to halt settlement construction and make a good-faith effort to achieve a just peace. We urge world leaders to take a strong position condemning actions by both Israelis and Palestinians that may undermine the success of these historic talks.

Intermarriage's root cause is lack of relevance

While Rabbi Reuven Bulka utilizes the Pew Report statistics to make his point about abuse in Jewish homes, which does of course exist, he is not, I hope, suggesting that abuse is a root cause of the rising rate of intermarriage ("The elephant in the Jewish room," The CJN, Nov. 7).

A root cause that we should be examining is the seeming lack of relevance of religion itself in our daily lives. After all, if intermarriage has risen, non-Jews as well are complicit. Religion preaches exclusivity, but fewer people are listening.

If we are concerned about a Jewish continuity that includes adherence to our religious traditions, when are our religious leaders going to recognize that what they are preaching and how they are preaching it is failing in today's society? This, I respectfully suggest, is the real elephant in the room.

Action is needed to stop intermarriage

The high intermarriage rate is threatening Jewish survival. Respectfully, I take issue with Rabbi Dow Marmur's recommendation to "not preach against it, but do God's will as best we can – and leave the rest to God." ("What should we do about intermarriage?" The CJN, Oct. 31).

Taking the proactive approach, as suggested by Prof. Jack Wertheimer (whom Rabbi Marmur quotes), to have communities do a better job at organizing opportunities for socializing and by making greater efforts to encourage non-Jewish marriage partners to embrace Judaism, is at least a step toward ensuring our survival. Can we brainstorm as a community to figure out why so many Jews are opting to intermarry?

Does Rabbi Marmur have any suggestions as to how we can help people see that Judaism is a religion rich in joy, beauty and wisdom, and that maintaining Jewish continuity should be considered a top priority in our values?

U.S. must not reduce sanctions

There is understandable fear in Israel and by Jews around the world that Iranian President Hassan Rouhani, with his words of peace and reconciliation at the United Nations, has seduced U.S. President Barack Obama into thinking that a reasonable settlement of Iran's nuclear ambitions is possible ("Rouhani declaration of openness to nuclear talks met with skepticism," cjnews.com, Sept. 25).

Obama has a bad track record in his dealings with Arab and Muslim leaders. His love affair with Egypt's Muslim Brotherhood turned out to be a disaster and made it necessary for the Egyptian military to move in and remove president Mohammed Morsi.

Forcing Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to apologize to Turkey's president over the attempt to breach the Gaza blockade was again a terrible miscalculation on the part of Obama. Israel must persuade American congressional leaders not to reduce the sanctions imposed on Iran until, as a positive first step, Iran ends – subject to independent confirmation – its pursuit of atomic weapons.

Peace would unleash huge economic potential

Arie Raif

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry spent a good part of last week shuttling between Israeli and Palestinian leaders trying to salvage the peace talks.

On Nov. 6, he pledged an additional $75 million (all figures US) in aid for the Palestinians for infrastructure and educational programs. The funds, The Times of Israel reported, were designed to show the Palestinians a tangible result from the peace process.

Opinion

Israel also stands to benefit. As Ehud Olmert, Israel's former prime minister, put it starkly: "Without a Palestinian state, the State of Israel is finished."

The price of the conflict for Israel – holding the territories and protecting the settlers – is astronomical. The Israeli government spends more on building Jewish settlements in the occupied territories than it does on housing, education and health combined.

Israel's social fabric has been destroyed since the Six Day War, as governments, left and right, have obfuscated as to how much they were really spending on the settlements.

Since 1967, when Jewish settlement began in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the expenditure has risen to more than 110 billion shekels ($31 billion).

It costs Israel 1.5 billion shekels annually to protect the settlers. The country's defence budget is one of the highest in the world and constitutes about 17 per cent of state spending.

At the same time, the government feeds public fears about "the security threats" that would result if Israel gave up the West Bank, at a time when the government's real priority is how to stay in power by preserving the ruling coalition cobbled together after each election.

Of course, the price paid to keep these improbable coalitions intact translates into billions of shekels to buy the co-operation of coalition members.

Palestinian-Israeli business and economic relations could serve as an anchor of stability and prosperity, which are key factors in achieving peaceful relations in this region. Economic relations can greatly impact both economies, promoting win-win outcomes for Palestinians and Israelis in the long term.

Palestinians demonstrate against the high cost of living in September, 2012. Their economic situation is well below that of Israelis and Europeans, Arie Raif writes.

Israeli President Shimon Peres' vision of a New Middle East is relevant today more than ever: "Peace would yield a tourism momentum, the opening of modern factories, joint projects relating to energy, water, preserving the environment, free trade. Virtually in every field, the new generations will use iPhones instead of stones."

The economic situation of Palestinians is well below the standard of living of Israelis and Europeans. Their per capita income is $2,900 per year, while the per capita income of Israelis is $32,000 per year, according to the International Monetary Fund.

Israel, for many years a country under siege, is now strong and confident, and has much to offer the region. As Peres observed, "Our main effort until now was to defend Zion. Our main effort now is to convey a message that Israel is powerful and strong and has something to offer."

Peres' New Middle East peace plan is based on market liberalization and regional economic co-operation. The idea is embedded in the globalization process, which can bring an end to regional conflicts and replace national interests with multinational interests.

HAVE YOUR SAY:

Will economic development in the PA promote peace? Are Israel and the Palestinians missing out on a peace dividend?

Write to: cjninfo@gmail.com

The idea is rather simple: globalization calls for market liberalization and a more powerful role for business. Economic prosperity would create incentives for people to act peacefully, because they'll want to participate in and gain from the economic growth.

The economic benefits for the Palestinian side are clear.

Palestinian exports could cumulatively rise to some $11 billion per annum (compared to $500 million in the last few years). Palestinian employment would similarly benefit through the creation of more than 500,000 new Palestinian jobs, nearly doubling the number of jobs that were on the market six years ago, from 600,000 to more than 1.1 million.

The cumulative contribution to Palestinian GDP (in value added terms) would amount to approximately $8 billion, thereby tripling it from some $4 billion in 2005 to approximately $12 billion.

The economic benefits for Israel are even greater.

If one looks at the value of Israeli exports alone, one can see that exports cumulatively could rise by more than $17 billion through the creation and development of two new major export-oriented growth-engines: the Arab Free Trade Area bloc (AFTA) and the Palestinian Authority market will give Israeli exports a potential market of $12 billion, while Holy Land tourism has the potential to transform Israel and the PA into important players in the global tourist market.

But before the two sides can reap these benefits, they must make a strategic decision to live side-by-side under a two-state solution, which would be conducive to stability, security and an improved economy. Economic co-operation is the only avenue that promises strong and immediate benefits.

The Palestinians can take advantage of the size of the Israeli economy and their geographic proximity to Israel, which can absorb a large volume of Palestinian exports and give the PA access to Israel's technological know-how and advanced industrial infrastructure and products. These are important advantages for Palestinian producers, who can gain access to western markets via the use of Israeli marketing platforms.

Moshe Dayan, the former Israeli defence minister, was right when he declared, "If you want to make peace, you don't talk to your friends, you talk to your enemies."

Arie Raif is an Israeli political activist and a former Israeli diplomat in Canada. He's currently vice-chairman and CEO of the Canadian Peres Center For Peace.

Reality contrasts sharply with anti-Israel propaganda

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In Syria, the inhuman violence of an ongoing civil war has taken at least 100,000 lives, including more than 1,000 victims of chemical weapon attacks.

In the sharpest contrast imaginable, in an Israeli hospital in Safed – less than 100 kilometres away from this carnage – Jewish and Arab doctors are saving the lives of hundreds of Syrian civilian victims, and in early November, a baby was born to a young refugee mother. The delivery room nurse, Mira Eli, told reporters, "We gave her a hug, a shower and food... She's a very young woman who came without her husband or anyone else... and it was her first delivery... Our job is to ensure that every new mother remembers her delivery as an unforgettable, positive experience, whatever her ethnic, national or religious background."

While this might seem entirely unexceptional, history has hardly been conducive to such aid. For more than six decades, Syria has been at war with Israel, and before 1967, Syrian artillery on the Golan Heights regularly pounded the Jewish towns below, near the Sea of Galilee. Some of the harshest treatment of Israeli prisoners of war took place at the hands of the Syrians, including frequent torture.

Nevertheless, Israelis have opened their arms and treated hundreds of wounded Syrian civilians, including many children and the elderly, some with horrendous injuries, providing them with the best possible medical care. The IDF has been centrally involved in evacuating and safely transporting these unlikely patients from the war zone into Israel, under difficult conditions. No one has been asked to cover the costs of this treatment, and no payments are expected. In addition, and with no publicity, Israeli aid agencies are helping hundreds of thousands of Syrians now living in Jordanian refugee camps.

However, none of this has blunted the propaganda campaigns and political warfare that falsely accuse Israelis, including the IDF, of "war crimes" and wholesale violations of human rights. On university campuses in Europe and North America, ritual chants of "Israel apartheid" and immoral boycott, divestment and sanctions activities continue. In some churches, groups such as Sabeel are given platforms to promote hatred under the facade of peace and human rights, and in the United Kingdom, the Methodist church is currently conducting another round of anti-Israel activity, again exploiting moral language. The same is true for some labour unions that have been captured by the anti-Israel warriors, particularly in Canada.

As part of this attack, a tiny group of Israeli and Jewish zealots are often trotted out to validate this modern blood libel. For example, a fringe group known as Breaking the Silence is currently doing a world tour spreading false "war crimes" allegations, including a recent appearance on CBC Radio. This organization was quoted as a source 27 times in the discredited Goldstone report published in 2009, but the CBC neglected to inform its listeners of this salient fact, as well the other evidence contradicting their ideologically motivated "testimony."

Breaking the Silence is supported by generous funding from political groups such as the New Israel Fund, as well as anti-Israel organizations in Europe and biased aid groups such as World Vision. This money promotes anti-Israel campaigns around the world instead of aiding Syrian war victims, for example.

While the zealots are beyond reason, journalists (including at the CBC), academics, government officials and members of organizations seeking to promote human rights and humanitarian aid might be able to recognize the contrast between the propaganda and the reality. For this group, the story of a 20-year-old Syrian living on the Syrian side of the Golan Heights who was evacuated by the IDF from the war zone in order to give birth safely at Ziv Hospital in Safed should at least raise some questions about the narrative they've been peddling for many years.

The young mother's words might also give them pause: "I don't feel like I am in an 'enemy' country. The staff are all helping me and worrying about me... My baby too is getting wonderful, devoted care."

Such behaviour reflects the Israeli reality, far from the propaganda campaigns that have done so much damage.

Righteous Gentiles and their righteous progeny

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Several years ago, I used this space to describe the excitement I experienced helping my then-seventh-grade daughter with her school roots assignment.

My dad was born in Holland, and I grew up knowing that he and his nuclear family, and one second cousin, were the only Lootsteens to survive the Holocaust. Through my daughter's project, I learned the names of almost 100 Lootsteens sent to their deaths by the Nazis. I also discovered one Lootsteen, a woman we previously knew nothing about, who had spent her 70-plus years till then certain she was the only Lootsteen to have survived the war. I can't describe how special it was when, several months later, my sister, my father and I travelled to the Netherlands to meet our new cousin and her family.

I grew up feeling the Shoah was a uniquely Jewish story, that only we could truly understand the depths of the atrocities and the scope of the numbers. And while the more universal aspects of the genocide did not escape me, it was clear that gentiles could neither properly fathom the enormity of our collective loss nor grasp the individual suffering.

Recently, just days apart, I was privileged to meet two unrelated grandchildren of Righteous Gentiles, each with her and his reasons for exploring their grandparents' past. These almost chance encounters have left their marks on me, allowing me to better understand that the Holocaust has not only profoundly, personally affected Jews.

Olivia, from Amsterdam, is in her early 30s. She's been to Israel a couple of times to get to know the country better and to spend time with Israeli friends she met while travelling the world some years ago, one of whom is my wife's niece. She stayed with us when in Jerusalem, visiting the Old City, the Israel Museum, the Machane Yehuda market, Yad Vashem and other sites.

At Yad Vashem, she decided to delve into her paternal grandfather's past. She didn't know him well. He died years ago, and her father doesn't speak about him much. But she did remember hearing something about him saving Jews during the war. She went to the research department and soon discovered that both her grandparents had helped save several Jews in the small town of Eibergen in eastern Holland. As well, they had both been recognized as Righteous Gentiles, they both had the honour bestowed upon them by Israel's ambassador to the Netherlands, and they had both even visited Israel a couple of times.

After returning home, Olivia continued her search with family members, eventually finding a photo of her grandparents receiving their honour from the Israeli ambassador. She emailed me about the experience being very special to her.

Not 10 days later I met Richard at my parents' home in Rishon Lezion. He was visiting them together with Danny, one of my dad's childhood friends, and with Danny's wife, Ora. It turns out that Richard was born in Holland and had immigrated with his parents to Australia when he was two, to somewhere not far from Brisbane. In his mid-40s today, he has four kids and works as a journalist.

He'd decided to take an almost three-week vacation to travel all the way to Israel and stay with Danny and Ora in their home in Netanya. Although he'd never met Danny before, he'd heard his grandfather had saved Danny's life during the war and wanted to get the story down in writing to memorialize it.

Danny and Ora showed Richard quite a bit of Israel. But more than anything else, Richard spent hours sitting patiently with Danny. He learned how Danny, who was less than 10 when his parents and only brother were taken away from Amsterdam, eventually made his way to Richard's grandparents' farm in the tiny hamlet of Abbega, in Holland's northern province of Friesland, living with them until the end of the war. Danny was in touch with the farmer till the latter passed away. He made certain he, too, was recognized as a Righteous Gentile and still keeps in touch with the farmer's family.

Yad Vashem rightfully memorializes many Righteous Gentiles. It was an honour for me to spend time with the progeny of two such tzadikkim, to understand just a bit about how their grandparents' heroic acts have affected their lives and how these acts should also impact ours.

May the memory of their deeds be eternal.

Past UJA Campaign Chair Ed Sonshine named Canada's Outstanding CEO of the Year

By Daniel Horowitz

Early last month, Ed Sonshine, Chief Executive Officer of RioCan Real Estate Investment Trust and a renowned leader of Toronto's Jewish community, got an unexpected phone call.

On the other end of the line was the voice of Gord Nixon, President and CEO, Royal Bank of Canada, informing Mr. Sonshine that he had just been named Canada's Outstanding CEO of the Year.

"I knew that I had been nominated by somebody, but I quite frankly paid no further attention to it, because this award usually goes to some giant company," says Mr. Sonshine.

Some would argue that RioCan REIT, which, under Mr. Sonshine's consummate leadership owns and manages Canada's largest collection of shopping centres and has evolved into the country's largest real estate investment trust with an enterprise value of approximately $14 billion, qualifies as "giant".

"I didn't take it seriously that I had a chance; I just thought it was nice to have been nominated," he says. "And then, after I forgot about it, Gord called me with the news and there I was, sitting in my office, quickly going into shock."

Unlike Mr. Sonshine, Fred Waks, RioCan's President and Chief Operating Officer, was not surprised by the honour bestowed on his friend and partner.

"Ed is a great mentor who leads by example; and everything he does, I, and others at RioCan aspire to do," says Mr. Waks. "Being Eddie's wingman for 18 years, I can say that this honour is well deserved. Think about it; Ed's in the real estate business, he's Jewish, he's an immigrant, yet, in the entire country, he's the number one guy right now. Sometimes people don't get what they deserve, but in this case, nobody deserves it more than Ed."

For those counting, Mr. Sonshine is the second Jewish CEO to be awarded with this prestigious honour, following in the footsteps of The Four Seasons Founder, Isadore "Issy" Sharp, who was named in 1992.

Ed and Fran Sonshine

"Ed was chosen because he has done a remarkable job building, growing and leading one of Canada's largest and most successful real estate companies and because he is universally admired and respected as an individual and community builder," says Mr. Nixon. "The fact that he is so well liked by everyone is just icing on the cake."

And despite the acclaim, Sonshine is quick to point out that he is only as good as his employees.

"This is very much a team award," says Mr. Sonshine. "You can be the greatest leader you want, if I didn't have the right people getting the job done, it's not going to work. So, to me, the award is about recognition of our whole team. And, the fact that I'm being recognized as the outstanding CEO is a validation of something I started 20 years ago."

Despite his success, as a Jew born to Holocaust survivors in a Displaced Persons Camp in Bergen Belsen, Mr. Sonshine often felt like an outsider in the business world.

"I just felt like I didn't really belong," he says. "Part of it was being a Jew in Toronto; part of it was being a child of survivors. My background has affected me over the years in many, many ways, some good, some bad, but my experiences growing up have certainly had a strong impact."

And Mr. Sonshine has also had a strong impact, not only in business, but on Toronto's Jewish community. He, like wife Fran, is a Past Chair of UJA of Greater Toronto's Annual Campaign, and he continues to play a vital role with UJA and other important Jewish charities across the GTA as a generous philanthropist and volunteer.

"There are a lot of important Jewish organizations in this community, but there is only one that encompasses 100 partner agencies, and that is UJA," says Mr. Sonshine. "It is the only one that can galvanize the entire community in the case of extraordinary events. Whether it was the Yom Kippur War in 1973, when I made my first donation to UJA, or the Lebanon war in 2006, it's UJA Federation that the community gathers around. It's the only organization that can truly take on a leadership role. It's also UJA Federation that takes on the responsibility of maintaining, improving and operating the infrastructure of the Jewish community."

"Ed's leadership inside and outside the Boardroom has inspired a new generation of community builders to dream more and do more," says Ted Sokolsky, President & CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

And, yes, as the old adage proclaims, behind every great man there is a great woman. "Fran has been the perfect mate in every way," says Sonshine. "People see us the way we are today, with me as the CEO of a $14 billion operation, but for the first 25 years of our marriage, I was just a hard working Jewish guy like everybody else, trying to provide for my family. Also, Fran is a much nicer person than me. I tend to be a little focused, aggressive, and blunt. She's made me a much better person, not just publically, but as a CEO. She's the best."

Siblings honours Father's memory with fund supporting Holocaust education

By Jody Kamen

It was a no-brainer. When Holocaust survivor Nathan Peck passed away in 2012 at the age of 87, his 3 children quickly decided to honour their late father in a manner he would have approved; by supporting Holocaust education.

After investigating the various philanthropic options available to them through the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto – UJA Federation's planned giving and endowment arm - siblings Isaac, Ron and Rachelle, and wife, Freda made their decision, and the Nathan Peck Memorial Fund for UJA Federation's Sarah & Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre was born.

"Being the children of Holocaust survivors was always a very important part of our lives," says Ron. "It was a different feeling, a different upbringing than some of our peers had. Although the Holocaust was an important part of his life, he wasn't consumed by it. He told us stories about what happened, but to us kids they seemed more like adventures."

Nathan Peck was born in Poland, moving to Russia before the war started where he survived in work camps. He fell in love with Freda and they had their first child, Isaac, in Austria, before immigrating to Canada. Nathan and Freda were married for 66 years when he passed away.

Here in Toronto, the hard-working family man who always had a smile on his face, a wink in his eye, and a joke at the ready, made a comfortable life for himself, Freda and their children. During the war, the multi-faceted man worked as an engineer, an ambulance driver, and a chauffeur.

Nathan z"l and Freda Peck

"Then, Dad started selling produce from a truck before he eventually bought the Quality Bakery on College Street, which supplied other bakeries and restaurants," says Rachelle. "It was open 24 hours, so it became a popular haunt for police and the staff of local hospitals. He wasn't a baker, but he ran the business. He was always so proud of the fact that he came to Canada and was very successful."

The family belonged to Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, and maintained a strong Jewish identity as active members of the Wierzbniker Society.

As the number of living Holocaust survivors sadly starts to dwindle, it remains the responsibility of their children and grandchildren to carry on their stories and their legacies.

"We know it is up to us to promote the idea of Never Again as a basic human rights issue," asserts Isaac. "My father would be very proud that we chose to honour his legacy this way. The Holocaust was a major part of all of our lives as a family, and he would not want us to forget it. He would want future generations to be aware of it too."

The Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto is dedicated to creating long term resources to meet the challenges and needs of Toronto's flourishing Jewish community by working in partnership with individuals, families and private foundations to enhance Jewish community life and connecting them to the programmes and projects they feel passionate about.

One million Canadians go hungry, executive director says

Mazon Canada prepares for annual fundraiser

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A recent report by Food Banks Canada showed that the number of Canadians visiting food banks is higher than it was before the recession, but that only tells part of the story of hunger in Canada, said Ida McLaughlin, national executive direction for Mazon Canada

"Food Banks Canada only interviews and surveys food banks themselves, and that is a really small picture of what hunger is Canada is like," she said. "Think of all the other organizations that feed the hungry that aren't food banks."

While the report said more than 800,000 Canadians visit food banks monthly, McLaughlin estimated the number of Canadians going hungry is more than one million.

On Nov. 19, Mazon, which gives grants to organizations that feed the hungry, will be holding its annual Kosherlicious fundraiser in Toronto, with the Montreal version, La Soiree, to take place on Nov. 25.

The events are focused on kosher food, and although there are some differences in the entertainment – Toronto will feature musicians, including local a cappella group Varsity Jews, while Montreal showcases two Cirque du Soleil-esque performers – both will be exciting and enjoyable evenings, McLaughlin said.

Kosherlicious and La Soiree are Mazon's most important events of the year. McLaughlin said they bring in a huge portion of the funds Mazon is able to allocate to organizations helping the hungry around the country.

Last year's fundraisers raised more than $325,000 combined, but it's not enough, McLaughlin said. Although Mazon was able to allocate grants to around 110 organizations last year, it had to turn down 42 applicants.

McLaughlin said she's proud of the fact that although Mazon fundraises mostly in the Jewish communities, it donates its money on a non-denominational basis.

"Everyone who comes to us is considered for a grant," she said. "We support small organizations that are trying to make a difference, like Out of the Cold programs or shelters that have women who are running from abuse."

It's particularly important to help people access fresh foods, like produce. A carton of eggs, for example, is often considered a luxury many cannot afford.

"You think about how far an egg can go with a family versus a box of cereal or a bag of rice, so most people would choose the cereal or rice," McLaughlin said.

This year, Mazon is hoping to raise $170,000 at each city's event, for a total of $340,000.

Started by son of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg

Fund for kids of social activists relaunched

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The United Jewish People's Order and the Winchevsky Centre relaunched the Mary Pitawanakwat Fund for Children at a recent fundraiser held at the centre.

The fund awards grants to children and youths whose families are negatively affected as a result of their parents' social and political activism.

Pitawanakwat, an Ojibwa, died in 1995, and had worked for seven years in Regina with the federal government. She was fired after lodging complaints of sexual harassment and racial discrimination in 1984.

She eventually won a 10-year legal battle, but died of breast cancer before the fund, originally part of the Rosenberg Fund for Children (RFC), was initiated.

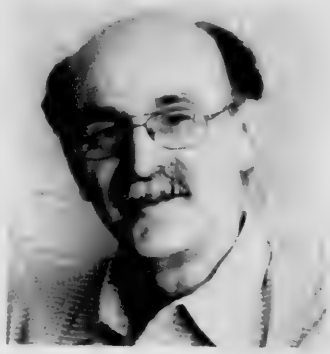
The RFC was founded by Robert Meeropol, the youngest son of Ethel and Julius Rosenberg, who were convicted of passing nuclear weapons secrets to the Soviet Union and, in 1953, were the first American civilians executed for espionage.

The Pitawanakwat fund became a separate entity co-ordinated by Pitawanakwat's daughter Robyn, and Naomi Binder Wall, until 2005, when they could no longer maintain it.

Speaking at the fundraiser, Meeropol, who has retired as executive director of the RFC – his daughter Jennifer has taken over, – but still works there, said he is "delighted that UJPO and the Winchevsky Centre has taken the fund under their wing. I see this match as a perfect one."

He said that Mary Pitawanakwat first contacted him in the early 1990s when she was looking for support for her teenage children.

'Rather than turn her down, we changed our guidelines'



Robert Meeropol

"We were limited to [funding people in] the United States, but rather than turn her down, we did something about our guidelines. One of our guiding principles is that if someone gets in trouble because they are pursuing social justice, we should support them."

He said that when Pitawanakwat won her suit, she came to his New York office and gave them $1,000. "That had never happened before."

Meeropol said that the RFC and the Mary Pitawanakwat Fund help "courageous people by helping their families. Those with children have a special stake in the future, and they do what they do to benefit their children, and so their children's future will be brighter."

Bob Hughes, president of the Saskatchewan Coalition Against Racism, and Pitawanakwat's partner, said that Meeropol came to Toronto in 1998 for a fundraiser for the RFC, with funds earmarked for the Pitawanakwat fund.

"We raised $4,000, and it was [Meeropol's] idea to keep the money in Canada and set up a separate fund in Mary's name," Hughes said.

"We couldn't maintain that fund, but we are relaunching with Winchevsky's support."

Binder Wall, who again will be co-ordinating the fund with Robyn Pitawanakwat, said that the Rosenberg case still has relevance today. "Their case still reverberates."

'He was always a great leader'

She said that although he never spoke in detail about his war service, he often talked about a letter he received from his troops when he served as captain of the 36 Canadian Army Troops Composite Company in Holland in 1946.

The letter, written on a card in calligraphy, said, "A small token of appreciation to the 'old man,' an officer, a gentleman and a regular guy. From his boys, 36 Cdn. Army Troops Comp. Coy R.C.A.S.C."

"When we found this note, it was so emotional… I was crying and crying," Elaine said.

Along with the letter, Jimmy was given a Dutch guilder note, signed by each member of his company.

"He was always for the people. He was not snobbish. Anyone could come to him. He was a regular guy. It's unreal, unbelievable that there would be this kind of history in our possession," she said.

Although she didn't know many details about Jimmy's war experience, the RCASC website indicates that Jimmy's unit was an administrative and transport corps that provided support to Canadian soldiers throughout their training. They moved supplies, including rations and ammunition, to the frontlines for the northwest European and Italian campaigns.

His group was one of a number of RCASC units that supplied ammunition for Operation Totalize, the offensive launched by Allied troops of the First Canadian Army during the later stages of the invasion of German-occupied Western Europe.

Throughout the interview, during which she leafed through pages of documents, photo albums and other memorabilia, Elaine displayed an admiration for her husband that was palpable.

It could be noted in the way her voice would rise when emphasizing his many accomplishments as an entrepreneur, a philanthropist, a community leader and a war hero; and more subtly when she lovingly brushed his hair to make sure he looked his best for a photo.

"He was always a great leader, which translated into the companies he ran," Elaine said. "He was outstanding."

Following the war, Jimmy established himself in the plastics business before moving to Toronto, marrying Elaine in 1963, and raising four children.

In 1964, he moved into the world of retail by purchasing small businesses, starting with Fairweather, a women's fashion retailer.

But it was a meeting in 1966 with clothing manufacturer Wilfred Posluns that propelled Jimmy into a decades-long partnership that made billions in profits.

In his prime, Jimmy also served a number of Jewish community organizations in various roles, including the Jewish National Fund of Canada, Baycrest Centre, the Canadian Council for Christians and Jews, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Weizmann Institute of Science in Israel.

At its peak in the 1980s, Dylex, an acronym for Damn Your Lousy Excuses, was a company that operated 2,700 stores in North America, including Fairweather, Tip Top Tailors, Big Steel and Suzy Shier.

By the early 1990s, the number of Dylex stores in North America had dwindled to about 1,000.

It was then that Kay walked away from the once-untouchable clothing empire. In 1997, he purchased Hudson Bay Wholesale and remained a successful businessman, a feted Jewish community leader and a philanthropist.

"He was a wheeler dealer. He was unbelievable. He was very handsome. He was everything," Elaine gushed.

But it is this most recent discovery of the letter and the guilder note that has her seeing her accomplished husband in a new light.

"Suddenly to realize… the significance of what he did… And to think Jimmy Kay was just a youngster… he was just a kid."

Child of survivors carries baton into the future

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Pearl Goodman has contributed to the growing corpus of books by children of Holocaust survivors with a hybrid effort. Her first published book, Peril – From Jackboots to Jack Benny (Bridgeross Communications), is part memoir because it is fact-based, and part novel because the characters' names are not real.

Released last year, Peril (a play on the Yiddish pronunciation of her name, with obvious war-era echoes) has won praise as an original, intensely personal work, but one leavened with humour, satire and plenty of the pop culture Goodman was exposed to as a youth growing up in Toronto.

The book examines three influences that shaped her life. Goodman, a high school English and drama teacher and a psychotherapist, told audiences during Holocaust Education Week.

The first was growing up in Toronto in the 1960s, which was "very white and Anglo-Saxon in its culture and mores. As a Jewish girl I felt different. Growing up, I was very aware of the unsettling message of feeling inadequate."

The second influence was the Holocaust, especially when her survivor parents' memories "broke through, which [they] did frequently and incisively, when present situations resembled the past."

And the third was television, which depicted a lifestyle "that seemed absolutely lovely to me, yet had no bearing or similarity whatsoever to the life I had."

Goodman, 59, said she wanted to express "in story form the complexity of the circumstances of my life growing up with two Holocaust survivors. The Holocaust lives on, but the sense of it changes as the information becomes assimilated by the children who are directly affected by the behaviours and views of the parents who originally suffered the trauma."

The author feels as though she has been passed a baton.

She doesn't pull her punches in her depiction of her Polish-born mother, for whom even her daughter's plans for a sleepover at a friend's house elicit "deep rumblings of anxiety and danger."

When Goodman wants to take in a stray cat, her mother recoils and wonders, "The Nazis killed six million Jews and you're worried about a cat?"

Goodman says it's a mistake to believe that when a traumatic incident ends, so does its residue.

"Nothing could be further from the truth. Traumatic events exert a huge pressure on the mind, and strain the heart and soul.

"That's where I come in. I see myself as a kind of conduit."

Through her book, which took four years to complete, Goodman tells her parents' stories intertwined with her own.

"I wanted, and perhaps even more than that, needed to make sense of how the two worked together," she explained. "It wasn't easy to talk about my troubles growing up because they paled in comparison to what my parents had endured."

She confesses to having harboured feelings of anger and guilt.

"I struggled with having the right to be angry and not have my voice stifled by their experience. As I wrote, I pushed myself to tell it like it was and leave it to the reader to apportion sympathy. In the end, I think I managed to give my own voice its due, my brother's and my parents'."

Ultimately, Goodman sought to impart a sense of hope "in a way that takes the intensity of the tragedy, tells it, accepts it as it is, works with it, and shapes it in order to make something sublime out of it."

She sees the post-Holocaust story as "a legacy passed down from generation to generation... as precious as any heirloom."

Asked in a brief CJN interview whether penning the book was cathartic, Goodman, normally a short story writer, said, "Writing is always cathartic for me. I wanted to tell a story. So if I succeeded, that would be really important for me."

Sharing stories of forgotten gay victims

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Ken Setterington decided he needed to write a book about the pink triangle when he realized so many people had never heard of it, or knew what it stood for.

The pink triangle badge was used to identify gay men in concentration camps during the Holocaust. After the war, it was reclaimed as a symbol of gay pride, although the rainbow flag eventually overshadowed it, he said.

"I thought there was no need [to write a book about it] until I went to talk to the young people I worked with," said Setterington, a children's author as well as a librarian with the Toronto Public Library.

He asked one young gay man what he knew about the pink triangle. He said nothing. Most of the staff gave similar responses, which made him realize there was, indeed, a need.

"Most people know about the millions of Jews who were murdered, but what about the other victims, including the gay victims?" he asked. "I felt, as a gay person, our history needed to be told, too."

The author of Branded by the Pink Triangle shared what he uncovered in his research for the book during a Holocaust Education Week lecture at the University of Toronto. He explained his book tells the stories of numerous gay men who were persecuted during the Holocaust.

He talked about the history of the gay community in Berlin, and how it was quite vibrant in the 1920s, despite homosexuality being illegal. He discussed how, after the Nazis came into power, they began to more actively persecute gay Aryan men, who they saw as lowering the Aryan birthrate.

Thousands of men were arrested for being gay and they were taken to Nazi concentration camps.

"They were being sent to work," Setterington said, but "the work they were sent to do would most likely kill them."

Men who were hurt or lost limbs were sent to the infirmary, where they almost certainly would die.

He described how gay men were disproportionately used for torturous Nazi medical experiments.

"The Nazis wanted to discover reasons for homosexuality and did tests on those men," he said.

The gay men's experiences were particularly brutal because even when they were being liberated, they were not treated well. Homosexuality was still illegal in Canada, the United States, the United Kingdom and most other major nations after the war, which is why many survivors never talked about their experiences.

"We don't have the same number of witnesses, and the people are now dead, so the stories are just being forgotten," Setterington told The CJN.

In 1970, a group of activists were arrested for trying to place a lavender wreath at the National War Memorial in Amsterdam in memory of the gay men who died in the Holocaust. It wasn't until 1987 that a memorial was unveiled there.

Nowadays, there are several memorials around the world dedicated to gay Holocaust victims, but not enough to help the world learn this history, Setterington said.

As Setterington spoke, he became emotional, explaining that it happens no matter how many times he shares these men's stories.

"It's just hard, because each one of those men deserves to be remembered, and we need to make sure those stories are kept alive," he said.

If there's one message he hopes people will take away from the book, it's about respect.

"Respect others no matter what their religion, their sexual orientation, or the colour of their skin," he said. "We need to respect diversity."

New group's advocacy methods ruffle feathers

Arno Rosenfeld
The Times of Israel

VANCOUVER — An advertising campaign countering anti-Israel ads on the Vancouver transit system is testing an American advocacy group as it extends its reach into Canada.

StandWithUs, a 12-year-old group based in southern California with branches across the United States and in Israel, opened its first Canadian office last December. But it was only recently that its presence was felt here. In mid-October the organization put up a series of pro-Israel advertisements on Vancouver transit after ads critical of Israel began running in September.

The full-throttle campaign ran counter to the approach taken by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which initially called for a muted communal response, arguing acknowledgment would only draw more publicity.

"These kind of anti-Israel initiatives mostly don't gain a whole lot of traction with the public and what we're trying to avoid is giving it oxygen that it wouldn't otherwise benefit from," said CIJA's CEO, Shimon Fogel.

While the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center in Toronto (FSWC) and the local Jewish federation in Vancouver both ignored CIJA's plea and spoke out forcefully in the media against the ads, when it came to the counter-ads, StandWithUs found scant support among the organized community.

"I honestly don't think it's a sufficient method," said Avi Benlolo, CEO of FSWC. "It's kind of a knee-jerk reaction, to get their name out there and to say, 'Look what we're doing.'"

For StandWithUs, the decision to run a counter ad campaign was a no-brainer.

"We put up the ads because that is what we do," said StandWithUs CEO Roz Rothstein. "We respond to misinformation about Israel, whether it's on campus or in billboards or in newspapers or in film – that's what we do."

Roz Rothstein

Rothstein said that in the United States synagogues and Jewish federations there often enlist her group to help counter negative ads, something it's been doing since 2007. In contrast, Rothstein said only individuals in Vancouver asked StandWithUs for help, not any community institutions.

Furthermore, Rothstein said that if the groups behind the anti-Israel ads know StandWithUs will respond, they'll be less likely to run their negative ads in the future.

That assertion is challenged by Marty Roth, a member of the seven-member Palestine Awareness Coalition (PAC), which sponsored the "Palestinian Loss of Land" ads that have been running on Vancouver buses and in a light-rail station. Roth said the Jewish community's outrage at the advertisements and StandWithUs's counter ads surprised and delighted the coalition.

"As a matter of fact that was what guaranteed the success of the campaign," Roth said. "This gave us the kind of publicity we never could have dreamed of otherwise."

But Meryle Kates, the Toronto-based executive director of StandWithUs-Canada, said the organization isn't worried about giving more publicity to the anti-Israel ads.

"That's not part of our thinking," Kates said. "We responded because we know thousands of riders were learning maybe the only facts in history that they would know about Israel… and that it was all lies."

"We're not of the opinion that it's OK to just ignore it — that's a problem, to ignore it, actually."

Fogel said that another problem with running counter ads is that it leads the general population to disengage and view both sides of the conflict poorly.

The dueling ads from PAC and StandWithUs depict "Palestinian Loss of Land" and "Jewish Loss of Land" respectively. The PAC ads show an area marked "Palestine" being reduced in size from 1946 until 2012 and the text, "5 million Palestinians are classified as refugees by the UN."

The counter ads depict the ancient Jewish kingdom dated 1,000 BCE, the "Jewish homeland" under the Balfour Declaration in 1920 and the modern state of Israel with the West Bank and Golan Heights marked as "disputed territory." (StandWithUs also ran a second ad with children waving Canadian and Israeli flags.)

The worry that the negative ads will bias Vancouver residents against Israel is part of what motivated StandWithUs to respond in kind. But other Israel advocates, like Fogel, suggest the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is too far removed from transit riders' lives for them to take heed of either side's messaging.

"Canadians tune out," Fogel said. "When they see these two different groups just duking it about a place in the world most haven't visited, people don't really have an understanding of why we would think that anything would resonate with them."

Despite the friction between StandWithUs-Canada and more established Canadian organizations, the fledging advocacy group isn't slowing down.

When Kates was hired last fall, she converted a spare room of her home into a StandWithUs office. Now she said it's common to find a cluster of interns there working on laptops to plan campus activities such as speaker series or movie screenings.

Currently the sole employee of StandWithUs-Canada, Kates said the goal is to grow the organization, which is currently active mostly in Ontario, move into real offices and start opening chapters in other Canadians cities.

Kates said while other Canadian groups had been doing some campus activism, none were as focused on the cause as StandWithUs.

"There was a hole here," Kates said. "Everybody did try to do something on campus, but there wasn't the really professional, effective kind of advocacy that StandWithUs is doing anywhere here."

But while Kates and StandWithUs CEO Rothstein point toward anti-Israel transit campaigns like the one in Vancouver and an uptick in divestment activities on campus, not everyone agrees SWU-Canada is especially needed.

Wiesenthal's Benlolo said the Jewish community in Toronto, where a pro-Palestinian group attempted to run ads before being rejected by the TTC, was able to take a StandWithUs-style approach to activism, but chose not to.

Likewise, while Fogel said he wholeheartedly believes in StandWithUs' sincerity, he said the current pro-Israel activism in Canada is achieving its goals. To continue that efficacy, Fogel said it's important to make sure passion doesn't throw that advocacy off course.

"The stakes are so high that we have a compelling obligation to undertake an approach focused entirely on achieving increased support for Israel, even if it doesn't provide the same emotional outlet for people to give expression to their frustrations about the activities of our adversaries."

Kates, rejected accusations StandWithUs might be overly brash and said she was proud of harnessing the passion Canadians have for Israel.

"I hope we're thought of as being front and centre. I really do," she said. "We're not the ones on campus talking about taking back land, or the history of Jerusalem 100 years ago – so if strident is the label people in other organizations want to give us, that's unfortunate. Nonetheless, we all do good work and we do it in different ways."

In the three short years since he and his family made aliyah, 12-year old Tzasfahon Aginahu has learned the fundamentals of Hebrew and mathematics, all without any previous formal education.

Currently attending elementary school, Tzasfahon is one of many Ethiopian-born students who benefit from participating in UJA Federation supported initiatives including a hot lunch program and the Moriah Literacy Program. Through Moriah, students in Israel, particularly new immigrants, gain strong Hebrew literacy.

"Through the literacy program, and the extra help and instruction it provides, Tzasfahon has learned necessary skills that will be useful to his future," says his teacher, Yehudit. "The program helps us keep kids motivated, and ensures that no student falls behind."

At home, Tzasfahon resides in a small 2-bedroom apartment with his parents and five siblings. As second eldest, he often helps his mother cook, clean, and prepare for Shabbat.

Tzasfahon represents the myriad of new immigrants arriving in Israel without any education, who, through UJA-funded programs like the Moriah Literacy Program, are able to close education gaps and prepare for a bright and successful future.

Beloved Winnipeg chazzan retires after 53 years

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After 53 years as a chazzan, Gerry Daien has decided it's time to retire.

He makes it quite clear that it wasn't impending surgery – which he has since undergone and from which he says he is recovering nicely – or the Chevra Mishnayes Synagogue's decision just before Yom Tov to introduce a fully egalitarian service that factored into his decision.

"Over the summer, I finally made my decision. At 85, I felt that it was time to walk away from the weekly responsibility and take it easier," he says.

""My family had been urging me for some time to step down."

He thinks that he went out on a high note.

"I promised the congregation that I would stay through Yom Tov and the Rosh Chodesh Shabbat soon after," he says. "I think I did a great Yom Tov service this year – my best in years."

Daien has been davening and singing since he was nine years old. "I have always loved being involved in synagogue," he says. "The synagogue is my second home."

His father, he notes, was a major influence in his decision to become a chazzan.

"My father would have been a terrific chazzan," Daien says. "But as the oldest of seven brothers and sisters, he had to go to work early in life to help support the family. Still, he was steeped in the Nusach Hatfillah. We often shared cantorial recordings."

In his youth, Daien was always singing in choirs and at Jewish functions. Winnipeg's Cantor Benjamin Brownstone was another early influence in his cantorial career.

"He was my teacher and mentor," Daien says.

"I had offers to go elsewhere in North America," Daien recalls. "I once asked Cantor Brownstone if I should accept a job offer in the United States. His advice was that it is better to stay in one place, build your reputation and use your ability in the community. It may not pay the best, but a good name is more important."

He adds that his wife, Peril, and their family also encouraged and supported his cantorial career through the years.

Originally an electrician by profession, Daien began his professional cantorial career at the Orthodox Herzlia Adas Yeshurun synagogue in south Winnipeg. After 18 years there, he moved to the Talmud Torah shul in north Winnipeg for a year, then farther north to Chevra Mishnayes, which was also an Orthodox shul at the time.

In 1975, the principal at the Talmud Torah School approached him to teach the students synagogue skills.

"I particularly loved organizing the Shabbatons," he says. "We would have 13 Shabbatons a year, with the high school students leading Shabbat services at different synagogues. We even used to have three women-led Shabbat services a year with the men on the other side of the mechitzah."

Daien retired from teaching at the school five years ago but continued teaching bar and bat mitzvah students.

"I have taught Maftirs to over 1,000 kids," he says.

He says that once he fully recovers from surgery, he may still attend and lead services at the Chevra Mishnayes – as well as other Winnipeg synagogues – from time to time.

"I will still be available for life cycle events, if requested," he says.

He adds that he and his wife are looking forward to the bat mitzvah of their granddaughter, Maya, in Toronto in a few months.

"Our son [David Daien] is teaching her the Torah and Haftorah readings," Daien says. "I hope to be able to daven with them on the bimah. All of the family will be participating.

"I thank God that I have enjoyed a wonderful career as a chazzan."

Firebombed school library rededicated

CJN Staff

MONTREAL — There is once again an Azrieli Library at Talmud Torah, replacing the one destroyed in 2004 by a hate-motivated arson. The original library was located at the school's St. Laurent campus, which was closed in 2011. The new Bibliothèque Azrieli Library is at Talmud Torah and Herzliah High School's sole remaining campus in Snowdon. Both libraries were named for philanthropist David Azrieli's wife, Stephanie Azrieli, a former Talmud Torah librarian.

Chassidic woman wins vote despite obstacles

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Mindy Pollak may have earned international acclaim for becoming the first chassidic woman elected to be a Montreal city councillor – or to any political office in Quebec – but not without arousing virulent resentment from some members of her own community.

Mindy Pollak

Pollak, 24, who has been active in trying to heal the rift between the Chassidim and their non-Jewish neighbours for the past two years, won the borough council seat in Outremont's Claude Ryan district in the Nov. 3 municipal election.

But her candidacy was not welcome by the anonymous author or authors of a Yiddish open letter circulated before the election admonishing that a woman's place is in the home.

The screed, signed by "Montreal Jewry," was reproduced with an English translation on the website FailedMessiah.com on Nov. 5.

"Are we already so close to the goy, that all concepts that the lowly goy has determined to be part of his worldview, we have to make peace with and accept?" it asks, referring to women participating in politics.

The writer also said the very sight of a woman's picture on campaign posters is immodest.

Pollak will sit on the borough council only, not at Montreal city hall. She is a member of the second-place Projet Montréal party, which is expected to form the opposition.

Pollak told The CJN, "I would rather not comment on the dirty side of the campaign. I won. Let's focus on the positive."

Pollak's victory was significant for other reasons.

Her nearest rival in the Claude Ryan district was independent Pierre Lacerte, who has been a harsh critic of the chassidic communities for years.

There was also another Jewish candidate, Sheldon (Shloime) Goldberg, who is strictly Orthodox, but not chassidic, who ran on the team of Denis Coderre, who was elected mayor.

Pollak, a member of the Vishnitzer community, took 35 per cent of the vote compared to Lacerte's 28 per cent, or 860 versus 692 votes.

Pollak, who is unmarried, appeared to be an early favourite from the time she declared her candidacy in July. She said she chose Projet Montréal because it was "the only clean party at the time – no corruption, no scandals" and had always been supportive of her bridge-building efforts.

The Claude Ryan race grew even more interesting with the entry in September of Goldberg, a volunteer with the Orthodox community's Hatzolah emergency service. He came in third.

At more than 61 per cent, the borough had one of the highest voter turnouts in the city. Right up until election day, the sizeable chassidic communities remained mum on which way they would vote, or even if they would act as a bloc.

Longtime chassidic community leader Alex Werzberger said several letters were distributed to homes and synagogues during the campaign objecting to electing a woman, but the one cited above was especially "vicious."

"There was a bit of a split in the community, because some rabbis and other people felt they would rather have a man, that it would be a breach in the wall, so to speak, or that they would just be uncomfortable going to a woman," Werzberger said.

"They were entitled to their opinion as much as anyone else. But that one was vicious, and represents only a small group. Naturally, there were other letters in favour of her" he added.

"But nobody wanted to see Lacerte elected, so, as can be seen, 70 to 75 per cent of the community voted for Pollak."

Pollak is one of five Outremont councillors, including re-elected borough mayor Marie Cinq-Mars, the only one who will sit on Montreal city council.

Waterloo Mitzvah Day to help feed kids

CJN Staff

WATERLOO — The Waterloo Region Jewish Community Council (WRJCC) is participating in Mitzvah Day International by donating breakfast cereals to Nutrition for Learning, an organization that provides breakfast for more than 13,000 students a day, or 171,000 students a year.

Fully 20 per cent of the children living in the Waterloo area live in poverty, and many go to school each day without having a good breakfast. When children don't eat breakfast, this negatively affects their ability to learn.

WRJCC is asking for packages of specific breakfast cereals (see below) that fulfil the nutritional requirements for a good breakfast. Cereals can be dropped off in bins marked Nutrition for Learning at the following locations: Beth Jacob Synagogue, Temple Shalom, the Rohr Chabad Centre; THEMUSEUM, as well as inside the department of business at Wilfred Laurier University and the chaplain's offices at both Waterloo universities.

The bins will be collected on Nov. 17. All donations at any location will receive a two-for-one pass to THEMUSEUM in downtown Kitchener.

"Mitzvah Day International is an ideal way for the WRJCC and the Jewish community to help with a great cause," said WRJCC co-chair Michael Bierstock.

"We are thrilled to have the WRJCC joining forces to help with cereal donations," said Saul Ross of Nutrition for Learning. "We encourage organizations to get involved as sponsors and participants."

Mitzvah Day International is a Jewish-led day of social action dedicated to tikkun olam (repairing the world), tzedek (righteousness) and gemilut chasadim (acts of kindness). Young children and adults in more than 18 countries participate in hands-on projects that better the community.

Acceptable cereals include the following: General Mills – Cheerios and Multigrain Cheerios; PC Blue Menu – Multigrain O's; and Post – Shreddies and Shredded Wheat.

Quebec must remain French, Trudeau says

But that doesn't mean trampling others' rights, Liberal Leader says

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Liberal Leader Justin Trudeau said Quebec must be French "first and foremost" and this can be achieved without diminishing anglophone rights.

Speaking at an appearance at Le Mood, The Festival of Unexpected Jewish Learning, Arts and Culture, held Nov. 3, Trudeau said his point of view differs from that of his late father, who envisioned a bilingual Canada from coast to coast.

"Like my father, I believe in a bilingual Canada, but over the years, after living in Quebec and being an MP... I've come to understand... that in order for Canada to be bilingual, Quebec has to be French first and foremost, and that doesn't mean taking away from many or any of the rights of English speakers," he said.

Trudeau said there is a "mainstream culture" in Quebec that has to be protected and can't be compared to the culture of English Canada, which he feels is too much under the sway of the United States.

Trudeau drew a standing-room-only audience at the day-long event, and he received repeated applause and shouts of approval from the mainly young crowd. Afterward, he was besieged for photographs.

Standup comic Joey Elias, who interviewed Trudeau onstage, asked what he thought of the growing number of anglophones thinking of leaving the province, fed up with the political situation. "People are asking me all the time, 'What are you still doing here?'" Elias said.

Trudeau slammed the Parti Québécois government's proposed charter of Quebec values as "dangerous politics... with a tinge of Islamophobia."

Elias said he calls it apartheid.

Much of the session was left for questions from the floor. Not one question about the Middle East was posed.

Trudeau said Premier Pauline Marois doesn't represent the views of most Quebecers, or even all sovereigntists.

"It's very clear the charter was brought forward for one reason, and one reason only: to bring the conversation onto identity grounds, rather than the economy, which Marois is failing in."

With the separatist movement faltering, the Parti Québécois is "desperate" and using Islamophobia to create "an us-and-them dynamic."

He accused the government of exploiting "a lack of knowledge among far too many Quebecers, especially in small towns," about minorities.

"It's a call back to that old fear of the other... A crass attempt to bring out the worst in people."

The real target is Islam, he believes, and the ban on kippot, turbans and crosses in the public service are "the chaff in that fight."

The PQ is appealing to "the meaner, baser instincts all human beings have. It's natural – as cavemen, our instinct was to close in and protect our tribe," said Trudeau.

He predicted that the charter will fail and that Marois will lose the next election.

"The best way to protect [Quebec culture] is to celebrate and share it, not build up walls... If you build walls, you close yourself off and condemn yourself to disappearance."

An elderly priest in the audience beckoned Trudeau over, placed a cross around his neck and said he prays that Trudeau will become prime minister.

Trudeau also accused Prime Minister Stephen Harper of practising divisive, wedge politics, which has made Canadians more cynical about public life than ever before.

On the Senate crisis, Trudeau boasted that he "beat the crap out of" one of the Harper-appointed disgraced senators, referring to Patrick Brazeau.

While the Senate needs reform, Trudeau said Canadians have no appetite to go through 10 years or more of constitutional wrangling between the federal and provincial governments.

He blamed the situation on Harper's choice of appointees (59 to date) and for allowing "a ruthless environment to flourish."

The Senate does serve as a check and balance on the prime minister, especially the head of a majority government, who has "more power than any other leader in the world," Trudeau believes.

Trudeau suggested that appointments be made on a less partisan basis. He has called on all Liberal senators to disclose their expenses on a quarterly basis.

Asked why he chose politics over show business like another famous prime ministerial son, Ben Mulroney, Trudeau replied: "I'm pretty, but I'm not that pretty."

Being the son of Pierre Trudeau, "who cast a giant shadow," has been tough all his life, he admitted. "I've been condemned just because I'm 'the son of.' It has given me a thick skin. I'm able to dismiss groundless attacks. But there's the flip side: am I being told I'm the greatest thing since sliced bread because of who my father was?" he asked.

"Am I getting compliments because I worked my ass off to win the riding [Papineau in 2008], or because my father let them into the country 30 years ago?"

Elias concluded, "If you don't vote for this party, you need to get your head examined. It's so refreshing to hear a politician who does not speak like a politician."

Jewish groups denounce secularism bill

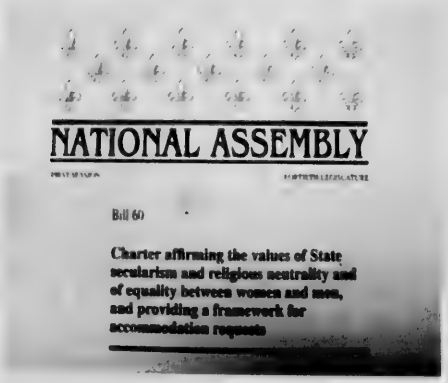
That section allows the legislature to establish rules "to govern the wearing of religious symbols by members," as well as to decide on the presence of other religious symbols, such as the crucifix over the Speaker's chair.

On the basis of "an alleged threat to state neutrality and the equality between men and women," the bill is marginalizing people and threatening social cohesion, CIJA charged.



NATIONAL ASSEMBLY
Bill 60
Charter affirming the values of State secularism and religious neutrality and of equality between women and men, and providing a framework for accommodation requests

The government is using this issue as a "political manoeuvre to the detriment of fundamental rights and freedoms..."

Noting that Jews have played a significant role in Quebec's public life since 1832, when they achieved full political rights, CIJA stated that "outward expressions of faith by the Jewish community... does not threaten the social cohesion of Quebec society, nor the religious neutrality of the state..."

B'nai Brith said the bill discriminates against persons of faith and makes them "second-class and, indeed, unwanted citizens.

"The government, by setting itself up as the arbiter of religious expression, is doing the exact opposite of its supposed goal of achieving a secular state," said Allan Adel, national chair of B'nai Brith's League for Human Rights.

"This contradiction and notion that state secularism forbids the acceptance of religious expression in the public realm is itself an example of the misguided nature of the bill."

Federal Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney said that if the bill passes, the government will challenge the law, if it is found to violate the Canadian constitution's guarantee of freedom of religion.

The bill amends the Quebec Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms to give primacy to the secularism charter.

As expected, the 19-page bill, introduced by Democratic Institutions Minister Bernard Drainville, prohibits all provincial and municipal public and para-public employees from wearing "religious objects that overtly indicate a religious affiliation" or otherwise express their beliefs.

The bill now extends that to government-appointed labour arbitrators and members of public inquiry commissions, and possibly anyone who enters into a service contract or subsidy agreement with a public body.

Physicians and pharmacists will be allowed to refrain from providing professional services contrary to their personal convictions.

The bill provides a framework for handling requests for accommodation on religious grounds. For example, if the request is for absence from work, public bodies must take into consideration the consequences to other personnel.

Instead of the five-year, renewable exemption that had been discussed for health and social services institutions, CEGEPs and universities and municipalities, the bill requires all public bodies to immediately undertake an implementation plan.

The only break these institutions and cities may receive is that their transition period toward compliance is five years maximum. An exception may be made to extend the transition period for institutions that have a historic "confessional dimension."

All other public bodies have one year to comply, although new employees will have to abide by the charter immediately.

The bill also sets out rules for subsidized daycare, including in-home services, that seek to "facilitate the integration of children without regard to social or ethnic origin or religious affiliation."

The teaching of religious dogma or practice is forbidden. Observing a diet stemming from a religious belief "must not be authorized if its aim, through words or actions, is to teach children that precept."

Premier Pauline Marois said: "This charter marks an important milestone in our history. It affirms what we are and defines a Quebec in which we want to live together, no matter our origin or our religion.

"Forty years ago, we consecrated the primacy of French as a common value of Quebecers. Today, we affirm the common values of secularism, the religious neutrality of the state, and the equality between women and men.

"These values are our cement; it's what brings us together, beyond our individual differences. The charter will be a source of harmony and cohesion for Quebec."

Renewal helps save lives...one kidney at a time

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The idea of elective surgery often conjures images of people with nose jobs, facelifts and implants.

But kidney donor John Anhang is hoping to recruit people to consider elective surgery for a totally different – and more rewarding – reason: to save a life.

Anhang, founder of the Toronto chapter of Renewal – a New York-based organization that works within the Jewish community to find kidney donors and facilitate transplants – spoke at the Village Shul last week to promote the organization, share his personal donation story, and to inspire others to follow in his footsteps.

"I've been blessed in life with excellent health… I wanted to thank the Almighty for good health… in a tangible way," he said.

If a person is wealthy, he donates money to charity, he explained.

"It occurred to me that if God has blessed me with good health, there is a physical way to share that health with someone else."

He explained that once someone is diagnosed with kidney disease, kidney failure is inevitable. While a patient is waiting for a possible match, a patient must go on dialysis, which can result in other complications, and is only a temporary solution to a terminal disease.

After deciding that he wanted to donate a kidney, Anhang came across a newspaper ad about a man in need of a transplant, and immediately contacted Renewal, which was handling the logistics of the case.

Anhang later learned that the man in need was Eitan Yefenof, a Hebrew University professor and cancer researcher, who was suffering from polycystic kidney disease.

After flying in and out of New York to complete a series of tests at the Mount Sinai Medical Center to ensure that he was in the peak of health, and after doctors were confident Yefenof did not have antibodies in his blood that would reject Anhang's kidney, the date was set for the transplant.

During one of Anhang's New York visits, he was asked by the Renewal liaison if he wanted to meet Yefenof.

Anhang agreed, but recalled that the meeting "was awkward, because what could he say to me? Thank you? You say thank you to someone who holds open the door for you or lends you $5."

Following months of flying back and forth from Toronto to New York, the day of the operation finally arrived.

Anhang and Yefenof, each accompanied by their wives, found themselves in yet another awkward meeting early that morning when they were shuttled from their hotel to the hospital.

"We were all nervous, I guess, and it was very tense. What do you say? I wanted to say something to break the ice, so I said, half to myself and half to Eitan, 'You know, I'm really glad I'm doing this, and I'm really glad I'm donating it to you.' At the time, he didn't say much, but evidently it made a big impact on him because he's quoted that sentence in a number of talks he's given since then," Anhang said.

When Anhang was brought to the pre-op room, which is essentially a waiting area for people in line for surgery, he "was probably the only healthy person sitting there. I had an amazing sense that I was there to do something," he said.

Addressing the common misconception that organ donation is forbidden by Jewish law, Anhang, an Orthodox Jew, said, "One of the 613 mitzvot is to save a life. Although Eitan wasn't dying right then and there… ultimately he would die from kidney disease. There is no cure for it."

Anhang's surgery, which was done laparoscopically – through small incisions in the abdomen – was a complete success.

When Anhang was discharged a mere 27 hours later, he popped in to Yefenof's room to check how he was recovering.

"It was incredible. He was sitting in his bed on his laptop, working, and he said he hadn't felt that good in years. The kidney was working at 100 per cent… That made me feel good," he said.

After about a month of soreness and fatigue, Anhang said he felt completely back to normal.

"If I have one regret, it's that I can only do this once. Every kidney donor I know is thrilled they did it, and they'll tell you that it was one of the most special events in their lives."

Although they live thousands of kilometres apart, the Yefenofs have stayed in touch with the Anhangs, sending them flowers every yom tov and exchanging emails.

In the months that followed the transplant, when Anhang weighed the positive experience of donating a kidney against the inconvenience of having to fly back and forth from Toronto to New York, it occurred to him that Renewal needed a presence in Toronto.

There are almost 200,000 Jews in the GTA, and of them, there are Jews who need a kidney and others who'd be willing to donate, he thought.

In the four years since Renewal Toronto was founded, there have been five successful donations, and there are three more cases that are underway.

"We're here to serve the recipients, but what we really want to do is support donors so that it is as easy and positive experience as possible. Our motto is the donor is king."

There are currently 20 people in Toronto's Jewish community who are desperately seeking a match.

Exhibition recreates prewar Polish Jewish life

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Toronto-native Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett was back in her hometown last week to talk about her latest accomplishment as the program director of the core exhibition for the Museum of the History of Polish Jews – the only museum of its kind in the world.

"Until now, it was only possible to honour those who died by remembering how they died… But now there is another way to honour those who died… by how they lived," said Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, who addressed hundreds of people, some spilling into Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue's balcony, for Holocaust Education Week's closing ceremony.

The museum, which stands on the site of the Warsaw Ghetto, opened in April on the 70th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. The museum presents temporary exhibitions, films, debates, workshops, performances, concerts, lectures and more. The opening of the core exhibition, developed by an international team of more than 120 scholars under Kirshenblatt-Gimblett's direction, is scheduled for early 2014.

Born in Canada in 1942 to Polish immigrants, the New York University professor said the interviews she conducted with her father since 1967 about his childhood in Poland contributed to her work on the exhibit.

"He had an extraordinary memory, and it is thanks to him that I really got a sense of not only what life was like before the Holocaust, but I also heard it from someone who had experienced the loss of his family but had not himself directly experienced the trauma [of the Holocaust]… That was a great gift that he gave me, and together we were able to give the world."

Kirshenblatt-Gimblett complemented her lecture, which coincided with the 75th anniversary of Kristallnacht, with a slideshow and a video that she narrated. It took viewers on a virtual tour of the 43,000-square-foot museum, highlighting its unique architecture and the core exhibition.

Barbara Kirshenblatt-Gimblett

She explained how they reconstructed the painted ceiling of a 17th-century wooden synagogue that once stood in Gwozdziec, before the Germans destroyed it.

"We took historical documentation from before World War I, photographs, renderings… and we proceeded to use traditional tools, materials and techniques… and through a series of painting workshops, [an international team of students, historians, architects and artists] painted all the panels of the wooden ceiling."

The result is a ceiling where every square inch is painted and is reminiscent of the Sistine Chapel.

Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, who urged her audience to come to Poland to experience the museum first hand, said, "Only in Poland could this museum have the power and impact that we hope it will have. We believe the void created by the Holocaust will be felt even more deeply [in Poland], the sense of the magnitude of what was lost, the lives that were lost, the world that was lost."

In spite of the tremendous loss of three million Polish Jews during the Holocaust, she insisted that Jews are still an integral part of Poland.

"They are not only in Poland, but of Poland. The history of Poland is not complete without a history of Polish Jews, and Polish Jews are not a footnote in Polish history."

Before Kirshenblatt-Gimblett took to the podium, five Holocaust survivors – Yael Spier Cohen, Martin Maxwell, Alexander Eisen, Miriam Rosenthal and Joseph Gottdenker – took part in a candlelighting ceremony. Peter Jassem, who only learned of his father's Jewish roots later in life and has since assumed a position as the Polish Jewish Heritage Foundation chair, also lit a candle in honour of the victims of the Holocaust.

Germany's consul general, Walter Stechel, addressed the gathering about the events leading up to Adolf Hitler's rise to power and the subsequent systematic persecution of Europe's Jewish population.

He said the anniversary of Kristallnacht is a reminder that Germany's history "carries the burden of guilt, but since [the fall of the Berlin Wall in] 1989, we can perhaps hope that this date might one day stand not only for guilt and atonement, but also for redemption, because how can we live without hope for redemption, and what would be the value of redemption without the weight of memory?"

Since the fall of communism, Kirshenblatt-Gimblett said, there has been a revival of Jewish life in Poland, and she hopes the museum will contribute to that renewal.

"Generally, Holocaust memorials begin with hate and end with genocide. But the Museum of the History of Polish Jews… begins with a revival of Jews coming from the West, settling in Poland, taking the history all the way to the present. There is a Jewish community in Poland. It is small, but there is a renewal of Jewish life on a small scale. I believe that the museum is going to play an important role in the renewal of Jewish life."

Movies provide a treat for all at Baycrest

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Baycrest and the Toronto Jewish Film Festival (TJFF) have partnered to bring films to residents, staff, caregivers and guests at Baycrest.

The films are being screened in a new in-house theatre donated by Ellis Jacob, CEO and president of Cineplex.

Jacob built the theatre at Baycrest as a tribute to his late mother, who was a Baycrest resident and loved going to movies.

Bianca Stern

The 130-seat theatre, located in the Posluns Building, is also being used for video conferencing and educational purposes.

Helen Zukerman, TJFF artistic director, said that the festival screened movies at Baycrest about 10 years ago "with a screen and projector, and hard metal seats, and it just wasn't comfortable enough for the guests."

The first TJFF film, When Comedians Went to School, a documentary that chronicles the history of Jewish comedians from the Catskills era, was screened Oct. 28.

Bedridden residents were also able to enjoy the film when it was shown through their in-room televisions later in the week.

"I am just so happy that everyone at Baycrest can enjoy movies free of charge, and the picture is magnificent. It is wonderful to see people coming in and enjoying themselves. Not only are they going to the theatre, they're getting some Jewish content," Zukerman said.

She is exploring more uses for the venue and is looking at the possibility of bringing in a TJFF film every month, she said.

Bianca Stern, executive director of the department of culture, arts and innovation at Baycrest, said the new theatre "is like any other theatre, except it can accommodate wheelchairs and walkers. Residents really feel that they have had an outing when they come to a movie."

She said Baycrest would like to screen family matinees, but it would have to ensure that enough staff are available to help residents who have cognitive issues.

Baycrest residents respond to TJFF movies, Stern said. "They can identify with a lot of the content. It is familiar to them."

She said Baycrest has a large catalogue of movies donated by Jacob, "and some are fairly recent. The screen is large, the seats are comfortable, and the sound is good. The whole experience is luxurious."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Is your iPhone sacred?

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

The questions range from technical to ethical to nonsensical. When it comes to the intersection of Halachah and mobile technology, some queries are quite serious. Others are posed with tongue planted firmly in one's cheek.

Q. Can I bring my iPhone into the bathroom?

A. This question was fielded by Rabbi Adam Schwartz, rabbinical counsel for Rustybrick.com, one of the leading creators of Jewish apps. Holy scriptures, such as a Torah scroll, have implicit holiness. Although text displayed on a LED screen is not considered a halachic text, it's not appropriate for one to have the text displayed in a restroom, for it may cause people to think about or say what they're reading, which is also prohibited in an unclean place. However, since the text on the iPhone is stored internally on flash memory drive, it's not considered halachic writing, just electronically charged ones and zeros, which has no sacred status whatsoever. So, you can bring your iPhone into a restroom. Just be careful not to read any of the content while there. [http://bit.ly/jdigital5]

Q. Similarly, are you allowed to erase God's name on a cellphone?

A. Relax. Most religious authorities rule that God's "name written on a screen can be erased and they have no sanctity as the pixels which make up the letters on a computer screen are being refreshed many times a second and are considered to be more virtual than real." [http://bit.ly/jdigital6]

And the questions keep on coming. These, however, come from the site frumsatire.net:

- If your iPhone drops while you are using the siddur app, do you have to kiss it?
- Can one lain from their iPad Torah?
- Can you use a smartphone application to check lettuce for bugs? [http://bit.ly/jdigital7]

One modern phenomenon tied to mobile platforms that's no laughing matter is a trend called "Half Shabbat (or Shabbos)," where teens who generally observe the day continue to send text messages on Shabbat. For a very good overview of the halachic and social implications, I recommend two articles from the Orthodox Union's Jewish Action. Jonathan Rosenblum, has written "Half Shabbos is No Shabbos." [http://bit.ly/jdigital8] And in "Is Half-Shabbos Really No Shabbos?" Rabbi Shalom Baum responded that "We do not tell one who has tragically violated even several prohibited activities to throw in the towel with regard to observing the rest of Shabbat." [http://bit.ly/jdigital9]

In his essay, "The Use of Electrical and Electronic Devices on Shabbat," Rabbi Daniel S. Nevins of the Jewish Theological Seminary takes a break from examining the halachic intricacies to address the impact technology has on the spirit of the day. "Contemporary families spend much of their time together focused on individual electronic devices. Faces lit by glowing screens large and small, ears attached to headphones, they busily interact with friends and strangers across the world while making minimal contact with the people around them. Shabbat can and should be different." [http://bit.ly/jdigital10]

Rabbi Nevins adds, "Shabbat can be a day to reclaim interactive entertainments occurring in real time without the mediation of technology. Focusing on the people around us rather than on communication with those far away creates a powerful sense of community which is not virtual."

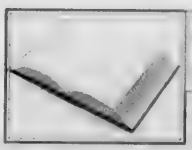
For Judaism to thrive, it must matter

Rabbi Lisa Grushcow



Rabbinic Reflections

Angels in America, the magnificent play by Tony Kushner, features many angels. We find one of them in this week's parashah.

In Vayishlach, Jacob is preparing to meet his estranged brother, Esau. The night before their encounter, he sends his wives and children ahead and stays in his camp alone. There, he wrestles with an unknown opponent, often understood as an angel. He is wounded, but he prevails, and wins a blessing.

In Angels in America, Joe Pitt is a Mormon who is gay and struggling with his sexuality. Speaking to his wife, he recounts: "I had a book of Bible stories when I was a kid. There was a picture I'd look at 20 times every day: Jacob wrestles with the angel. I don't really remember the story, or why the wrestling – just the picture. Jacob is young and very strong. The angel is… a beautiful man, with golden hair and wings, of course. I still dream about it. Many nights. I'm… It's me. In that struggle. Fierce, and unfair. The angel is not human, and it holds nothing back, so how could anyone human win? What kind of a fight is that? It's not just. Losing means your soul thrown down in the dust, your heart torn out from God's. But you can't not lose."

It's a radical rewriting of the story. After all, in the biblical account, Jacob emerges wounded, but victorious. It is from this struggle that he wins the name "Yisrael" – "for you have striven with beings divine and human, and prevailed."

Joe Pitt tells the story differently, because he experiences it differently. But one thing is clear: the story matters profoundly to how he understands his life. He doesn't just read about Jacob wrestling with the angel: he experiences it.

There has been a lot of buzz in Jewish circles about the Pew survey of U.S. Jewry, and a lot of anxiety about Jewish identity and continuity. This anxiety is not new. Decades ago, historian Simon Rawidowicz called Israel "the ever-dying people." We could talk strategy and statistics for years. But this I know: for Judaism to survive and thrive, it needs to matter. How many of us feel the encounter with our religion, or with our God, as profoundly as Jacob does when he is wrestling with the angel, or Joe Pitt when he uses that story to try to understand himself? Judaism is not a spectator sport.

Recently, I taught at both Montreal's Le Mood festival and at Hillel about contemporary Jewish approaches to sexuality, based on The Sacred Encounter, a book I edited on the topic (coming out soon). The most important takeaway was the idea that Judaism can speak to our lives in the here and now, even in the most intimate ways. Our texts and traditions can help us be true to who we are. They can guide us in difficult moments. They can inspire us to see the potential for holiness in every facet of our lives.

For a teenager coming out or a university student navigating sexual boundaries, for a senior whose spouse has dementia but who yearns for companionship, in the area of sexuality but in all other ways, Torah has something to teach. We learn and we live. We struggle, and we emerge as Yisrael, the ever-living people.

Israel needs bold leadership

From the Reut Institute

Omri Zegen

"It was the best of times; it was the worst of times." Charles Dickens

Israel is at a crossroads. The decisions and actions of the coming months and years will affect the country's prosperity, security and its very character as a Jewish and democratic state. Yet so many Israeli politicians try to preserve the "elegance of the status quo," immobilized by the fear of making the decisions needed to secure Israel's future.

Looking forward to the next decade, to our 75th year, Israel will constantly be faced with crises and opportunities. For the most part, these will be new, emergent and, therefore, unpredictable.

In contrast, the Israeli security and economic establishments operate on the basis of mapping and developing responses to known, quantitative threats – for example, maintaining past levels of defence spending or manoeuvring between the known alternatives of raising taxes and cutting expenses.

We live in an ever-changing world, in which the unknown and unexpected are the order of the day. So what will happen when these new threats, and new opportunities, emerge?

The regional upheaval following the so-called "Arab Spring" coupled with tectonic geopolitical shifts fundamentally affecting the world have shifted the security challenges that Israel faces. We need to rethink Israel's place in an evolving Middle East and beyond.

Israel needs a new national security vision based on marrying hard and soft power to ensure Israel's survival, security and legitimacy. We have to open the national security discourse to non-military spheres, as these are increasingly vital to Israeli defence interests. The defence establishment must connect with groups and organizations within Israeli society (for example, academic institutions, private firms and NGOs) that can assist in promoting Israeli interests in the region and around the world.

On Israel's domestic scene, deep societal and economic challenges threaten social upheaval. The OECD recently ranked Israel as suffering from the highest levels of poverty among OECD countries. One would be hard-pressed to find a statistic that more starkly contradicts the Zionist values the country was founded upon. Add to this the likelihood of a renewal of 2011's social protests in light of recent austerity measures, and the result is the mounting risk of Israeli citizens fundamentally losing faith in their political system and government.

As in the field of national security, the socio-economic front is in need of a new vision. The core of this vision should be inclusive growth: providing a fair opportunity for all residents to take part in rapid and sustained growth and to enjoy its fruits. This of course, is also a remedy to reduce the alarming rise in poverty.

Israel needs leadership with the audacity to grab the bull by the horns and shape a vision relevant to our future, fundamentally answering the question, "What kind of society do we want to live in?" Budget cuts may be a necessary part of economic policy, but they do not replace a vision. The reverse is also true: a guiding vision is integral for providing hope and long-term solutions for those negatively affected by economic policy in the short-term.

The 21st century demands a new form of democracy – we cannot leave our future and our children's futures to the "professional politicians." The Israeli public has to make its voice heard and demand that our leaders have the vision and the ability needed to grasp the opportunities of the times we are living in.

Omri Zegen is acting CEO of the Reut Institute.

Learning to tell time

From the Bimah

Rabbi Joe Kanofsky

Although possessed of fairly strong will power, I find that my resistance withers when I get within a block of a second-hand bookstore. Since stumbling upon the bookshops of Brookline and Cambridge, Mass., as an undergraduate, I have become an inveterate scrounger at any second-hand bookseller, hunting for the out-of-print, the rare, the fascinating.

Many years ago, while perusing the "foreign" table at one of those university-auxiliary book sales, I came upon a gold-stamped title Die Heilige Schrift on a stout black tome. As I leafed through this good-condition Leopold Zunz German translation of the Hebrew scriptures, I deemed it to be a worthwhile find. Flipping to the inside cover, even before I noticed the penciled-in price of $2 (!), I was drawn to the flawless gothic fountain-penmanship on the flyleaf.

This copy of the Bible was presented to a bar mitzvah boy in the Berlin suburb of Spandau, stamped and signed on behalf of the board of the "Gemliat Hessed" humanitarian organization, with the presentation date of Oct. 22, 1938.

Like most American Jews of my time and place, I grew up more familiar with the names and dates of the Holocaust than with 1,000 years of German or European Jewish history, to say nothing of 3,000 years of Jewish history. So not only was I struck by the place name "Spandau," most renowned as Hess' prison, I was also struck by the date – the date! Oct. 22, 1938, just three weeks before Kristallnacht! I had stumbled upon a real historical relic!

Yet the most important bit of information was the last: under the German inscriptions of the secular and Jewish date was written the only piece of information on the page in Hebrew: "Shabbat Bereshit."

For me, that changed everything.

By this time in my life, I had already celebrated "Shabbat Bereshit" numerous times. Just saying the phrase evokes the feeling: the last Shabbat in Tishrei, the culmination of all the High Holidays, from Slichot and Rosh Hashanah through Sukkot and Simchat Torah; the end of the holiday season and the return to the normal pace of life; a new beginning of another year of Torah reading and study.

Like the discovery that the town of Auschwitz or Oswiecim actually has green trees and a blue sky rather than the black-and-white I always pictured in my mind's eye, the discovery of this Chumash from a long-ago bar mitzvah changed my frame of reference and understanding completely and forever.

I had always thought of the date of Nov. 9, 1938, Kristallnacht, as a watershed date, which indeed it was. However, I came to appreciate it in terms of an adjacent and ultimately more enduring and significant watershed date: Shabbat Bereshit. I do believe that centuries hence, when Nov. 9 becomes a historical footnote even in Jewish history (this process has already begun, as that was the date of the Berlin Wall's collapse), Shabbat Bereshit will endure as a moment of transcendence, renewal and hope for the Jewish People.

Perhaps as I grew older and learned more, I became more attached to beginnings than to endings.

General Assembly held in Jerusalem

Peres, U.S. envoy back Obama on Iran

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Shimon Peres and United States Ambassador to Israel Dan Shapiro told North American Jewish leaders that they have confidence in U.S. determination to prevent Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon.

Addressing a plenary session at the Jewish Federations of North America General Assembly in Jerusalem on Monday, Shapiro stressed the United States' and President Barack Obama's commitment to Israel's security, calling the alliance between the two countries "as close as it has ever been."

He said that both countries share the goal of stopping Iran's nuclear program.

"There is no greater priority for the United States and Israel than preventing Iran from acquiring a nuclear weapon," Shapiro said. "On this issue, the United States and Israel share an identical objective. [Obama] will not permit Iran to acquire a nuclear weapon, period."

Peres downplayed reports of divisions between the United States and Israel regarding recent negotiations over the Iranian nuclear program, and expressed confidence in the United States' handling of the issue.

"The United States is our best friend, and the friendship of the United States to us is deep and meaningful," Peres said. "[Obama] committed himself not to permit the Iranians to become a nuclear power, not just for the sake of Israel but for the sake of humanity."

Peres' and Shapiro's comments contrast with recent speeches by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, in which he called a recent deal proposed by the United States regarding Iran's nuclear program "a bad deal."

"What is being proposed now is a deal in which Iran retains all of that capacity" to build a nuclear weapon, Netanyahu told the GA Sunday. "Not one centrifuge is dismantled; not one. Iran gets to keep tons of low-enriched uranium."

PM praises strong ties with Canada and the U.S.

Regarding ongoing Israeli-Palestinian peace negotiations, Netanyahu repeated his long-held conviction that the root of the conflict is Palestinian refusal to recognize a Jewish state.

He also said that Israel must have "robust security arrangements" in order to be confident that a peace with the Palestinians will last, and he referred to Jerusalem as Israel's "undivided capital." The Palestinians claim the eastern half of the city as their capital and have slammed recent Israel announcements of building in the West Bank and eastern Jerusalem, as have the United States and others.

"The minimum thing we can demand is that the official position of the Palestinian leadership recognizes the Jewish state," Netanyahu said. "This will be a long process, but it must begin with that."

At the end of the speech, Netanyahu praised the strong relationship between Israel and the U.S. and Canadian Jewish communities. He noted his government's efforts to reach a compromise between feuding factions at the Western Wall, long a high priority of American Jewish leaders.

"The Kotel is in Israel, but the Kotel belongs to all the Jewish People," Netanyahu said. "We have to consult together and reach a solution together."

Netanyahu appeared relaxed during the speech, cracking jokes, leaning on the podium and referring to audience members by name.

Conference delegates speaking before Netanyahu made many of the same points as he did, especially on Iran.

Speaking at a reception for the Ruderman Family Foundation before Netanyahu's speech, former Netanyahu adviser Dore Gold called for the Jewish People "to unite on this issue of Iran."

And introducing the prime minister, Jewish Federations Chair Michael Siegal said the international community must oppose the Iranian nuclear program.

"A nuclear Iran is an unacceptable position," he said. "It is unacceptable to Israel. It is unacceptable to the U.S. It is unacceptable to the world."

On Sunday morning, at the start of his cabinet meeting, Netanyahu called the deal on the table between the world powers and Iran "bad and dangerous."

"It is dangerous not just for us, it is also dangerous for them [the world powers]," he said.

Israeli team heads to typhoon-ravaged Philippines

JTA

JERUSALEM — The Israeli disaster relief organization IsraAid is sending an emergency response team to the Philippines, to the areas hardest hit by Typhoon Haiyan.

The non-profit group's team of medical professionals and trauma and relief specialists was scheduled to arrive in the Philippines on Monday, working primarily in Tacloban City in Leyte. A larger team was expected to land by the end of the week, according to IsraAid.

The death toll from the typhoon, which made landfall in the central Philippines on Nov. 8, could be at least 10,000, according to reports that emerged Sunday citing local officials. At least half a million people have also been left homeless by the devastating typhoon.

The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee has begun collecting funds for relief efforts. JDC representatives are consulting with local authorities, the Filipino Jewish community and global partners to assess the immediate needs of the survivors and said it will send a team to the area to assess the situation on the ground.

"Our heartfelt prayers go out to the Filipino people in the wake of yesterday's deadly storm," Alan Gill, JDC's chief executive officer, said over the weekend. "We immediately activated our network of global partners and will leverage our previous experience in the region to provide immediate, strategic relief to survivors in their time of need."

An Israeli diving instructor who was visiting the small Philippines Island of Malapscua and was believed to be missing in the storm was located early Sunday morning.

Hagar Klein, 23, had not been in touch with her family since late last week, Ynet reported. Most Israelis living in the Philippines are centred near the capital, Manila, which was not affected in any meaningful way by the typhoon.

Canadian Jews respond

In response to the disaster in the Phillipines, United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto has established the UJA Philippines Typhoon Relief Fund. Funds raised will support the efforts of IsraAID, which is a UJA partner agency.

Steven Shulman, UJA's campaign director, said that since an e-blast about the fund went out Saturday night, more than $20,000 has been raised, and the amount is increasing at a steady pace.

To contribute to UJA's Philippines Typhoon Relief Fund, please visit ujadonations.com/Philippines or call 416-631-5705.

Montreal's Federation CJA has also opened a fund to support victims of the typhoon. It will be live on their website at federationcja.org/Philippines.

In 1979, Adi Deutsch was critically wounded while serving in the Special Reconnaissance Unit of the Golani Infantry Brigade.

"We were on a mission deep inside Lebanon. It was supposed to be a quiet intelligence investigation. After completing our operation, I stepped on an anti-personnel mine. The explosion destroyed my body and shattered my right leg. I was evacuated by helicopter back to Israel.

"On my first leave from the hospital, I was at my parents' house sitting on a bar stool. When I wanted to get off my seat, I did what I would normally have done until that day – I put my right foot down. Except, there was no right foot. I fell directly on my stub and all the stitches opened up. I recall this event as a frustrating crisis, coupled with a lot of anger, depression and a definite regression in my progress".

This was until Adi visited Beit Halochem and began his rehabilitation. Along with hydro and physiotherapy, he started swimming in the Olympic size pool and later was introduced to cycling and running.

"I had always dreamed of participating in an Ironman competition and I was determined not to let my injury stop me. In January 2013, I stood at the starting line with 139 other athletes in Eilat, for one of the toughest races in the world: 3.8 km swimming in the sea, 180 km of cycling and a full 42 km marathon. I came in 50th, 4th in my age category and was the first Israeli amputee to ever complete this race.

"I was able to accomplish my goal thanks to the coaching, assistance and programs that Beit Halochem offered me. Sport is crucial in rehabilitating the body and mind. Being a disabled athlete, I know that I can achieve anything given the right environment. Beit Halochem provided this for me."

State-of-the-art Beit Halochem Centres in Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, Haifa, Nahariya and Beer Sheva boast an array of exceptional rehabilitative services including: physiotherapy, hydrotherapy, therapeutic devices, specialized sports equipment and training, family-oriented programming, creative and cultural activities.

75th anniversary

Israel's chief rabbi remembers Kristallnacht

JTA

BERLIN — Israel's chief Ashkenazi rabbi marked the 75th anniversary of Kristallnacht with a visit to a Jewish kindergarten in Berlin.

"Connecting Jews in Germany to their roots is the worthiest retort to the darkness that prevailed here 75 years ago," Rabbi David Lau said during his first official visit to Berlin, where he went to the Chabad-run Judische Traditionsschule Talmud-Thora kindergarten.

Riots on Nov. 9-10, 1938, organized by German authorities, killed 91 Jews, destroyed 267 synagogues and were followed by the deportation of 30,000 Jews to concentration camps.

The systematized attacks, which came to be known as Kristallnacht, the "Night of Broken Glass," anticipated the mass slaughter of European Jewry launched three years later.

During his visit, Rabbi Lau was scheduled to attend the General Assembly of the Conference of European Rabbis, which brought 200 members from across Europe to the German capital for the first time.

The conference, held 75 years to the day since Kristallnacht, also marked the 10th anniversary of Germany's Orthodox Rabbinical Council. Conference members attended a Kristallnacht memorial ceremony at the Beth Zion Synagogue in former East Berlin, which survived the 1938 pogrom and is now part of the Rabbinerseminar zu Berlin.

Speaking in Washington to mark the 75th anniversary of this pogrom that presaged the Holocaust, U.S. President Barack Obama said the lesson of Kristallnacht is to speak out "against anti-Semitism and intolerance."

"Kristallnacht foreshadowed the systematic slaughter of six million Jews and millions of other innocent victims," Obama said in a statement.

"Seventy-five years later, Kristallnacht now signifies the tragic consequences of silence in the face of unmitigated hatred," he said. "As we mark this anniversary, let us act in keeping with the lessons of that dark night by speaking out against anti-Semitism and intolerance, standing up to indifference and re-committing ourselves to combating prejudice and persecution wherever it exists."

A memorial service Nov. 10 in the Hall of Remembrance at the Yad Vashem Holocaust memorial museum in Jerusalem takes place 75 years after Kristallnacht.

Arafat poison tests paid for by widow PA: report

JTA

The widow of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and the Palestinian Authority paid for the Swiss medical tests on the late Palestinian leader's body that showed he did not die of natural causes.

The Washington Free Beacon reported Nov. 8 that a spokesperson for the University Centre of Legal Medicine in Lausanne told the newspaper that Suha Arafat and the PA paid for the tests.

The tests "moderately" supported the notion that Arafat had been poisoned with polonium, a radioactive substance.

Al Jazeera America reported last week that it believed the Swiss lab conducted the tests for free as a public service, according to the Free Beacon.

Polonium is a highly toxic substance that is rarely found outside military and scientific circles. The substance was found in Arafat's ribs and pelvis, and in the soil beneath where his body was buried, according to Al Jazeera America.

A report issued Nov. 8 by a team of Russian scientists found insufficient evidence that Arafat was poisoned with polonium.

Arafat led the Palestine Liberation Organization for 35 years and became the first president of the Palestinian Authority in 1996. He fell violently ill in October 2004 and died two weeks later, at age 75, in a Paris military hospital. His remains were exhumed last year

Suha Arafat had filed legal action in July 2012 asking French authorities to look into claims her husband was poisoned. The following month, French prosecutors opened a murder inquiry into the death of Arafat.

Last week, Palestinian investigators said Israel was the "only suspect" in the death of Arafat, after laboratory tests suggested the Palestinian leader died from poisoning.

Yasser Arafat

"We say that Israel is the prime and only suspect in the case of Yasser Arafat's assassination, and we will continue to carry out a thorough investigation to find out and confirm all the details and all elements of the case," Palestinian inquiry chief Tawfiq Tirawi told a news conference in Ramallah Nov. 8.

Tirawi said the Palestinian inquiry had studied the findings of Swiss scientists, released Nov. 6, which "moderately" supported the notion that Arafat had been poisoned with polonium, a radioactive substance.

The next day, Palestinian officials demanded an international inquiry into Arafat's "killing."

Abbas speech says Israel is 'occupied Palestinian land'

CJN Staff

As U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry visited Israel and the Palestinian territories last week to move along peace talks, a report emerged that Palestinian Authority chairman Mahmoud Abbas claimed all of Israel is occupied Palestinian land.

Palestinian Media Watch (PMW) reported that at a memorial event last month a speech delivered in Abbas' name asserted that all of Israel was called "occupied Palestinian land."

The event, which memorialized a Fatah and PLO leader from the 1970s, included the performance of a song that glorifies death and included the lyric, "My Weapon has Emerged."

The memorial was broadcast live on Palestinian TV on Oct. 9. Fatah Central Committee member Jamal Muhaisen delivered "the speech of Mahmoud Abbas, president of the state of Palestine."

According to PMW, Muhaisen stated, "not an inch of the land of Palestine" has been "liberated," including the "1948 lands," which is a term the PA and Fatah use to refer to Israel within the Green Line.

"All our holy places are still under occupation, and so far we have not liberated one inch of Palestinian land. All Palestinian land is occupied – Gaza is occupied, the West Bank is occupied, the 1948 lands [Israel] are occupied and Jerusalem is occupied."

PMW reported that a poster announcing the event stated it was held "under the auspices" of Abbas.

Earlier, PMW reported that Abbas' Fatah movement called released murderer Issa Abd Rabbo "one of our nation's symbols and one of our greatest leader."

The remarks appeared on Fatah's Facebook page in late October.

Abd Rabbo had been jailed for murdering two Israeli university students, Ron Levi and Revital Seri, who were hiking south of Jerusalem on Oct. 22, 1984. Abd Rabbo attacked them, tied them up at gun point, put bags over their heads and then shot them to death.

He was released from two life sentences in October as part of a larger prisoner release – he was one of 104 prisoners who were freed as a Palestinian precondition for renewing negotiations.

The Fatah Facebook page stated, "On this great day, Oct. 21, 1984, we stand respectfully, proudly, and with admiration for one of our nation's symbols and one of our greatest leaders, who spent his best years in the Zionist occupation's fortresses [prisons]... On this great day we express feelings of utmost loyalty and devotion to our brother Issa. We will continue to walk in his path, the way of resolve and defiance, the way of loyalty to our great Martyrs, foremost among them our symbol and great leader, Yasser Arafat 'Abu Amar.'"

Film producer takes close look at Jews and baseball

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There are a lot of words you could use when describing someone's appreciation of sport: enjoys, follows, is entertained by, likes, or perhaps even, roots for.

Then there are those who take it further: the fanatics, revellers, zealots, devotees and those whose adulation of a sport can be called, love.

That's the word at the centre of a documentary film that aptly describes Jews' longtime infatuation with the great American game, baseball. Jews and Baseball: An American Love Story will screen on Nov. 13 at the Beth Tzedec Synagogue, to be followed by a discussion with the film's producer, Will Hechter. It's part of the synagogue's five-part series, "Jews in sports," which runs on Wednesdays, off and on, until Dec. 11.

Jews really do have a long-standing love affair with baseball, he said. They've excelled at the sport on the diamond and have followed it religiously in the stands. Even Jewish owners of teams have a soft spot in their hearts for opposing batters – when they too are members of the faith, he said.

The documentary was inspired by the release of a baseball card series that featured Jewish Major Leaguers, as well as a desire to debunk a stereotype of the Jew as bookish and un-athletic, Hechter said.

Jews south of the border, and in Canada as well, have long felt proud of the accomplishments of Jewish players in the Major Leagues, said Hechter, a producer with Clear Lake Historical Productions.

"There's no question of a love story," he said. "First of all, baseball is America's national pastime. There's no question baseball has been at the forefront of their culture.

"When Jews came to America, they took to baseball. They wanted to identify with America."

"That still holds true today."

Jews have had heroes in the sport going back to its earliest days in the 19th century.

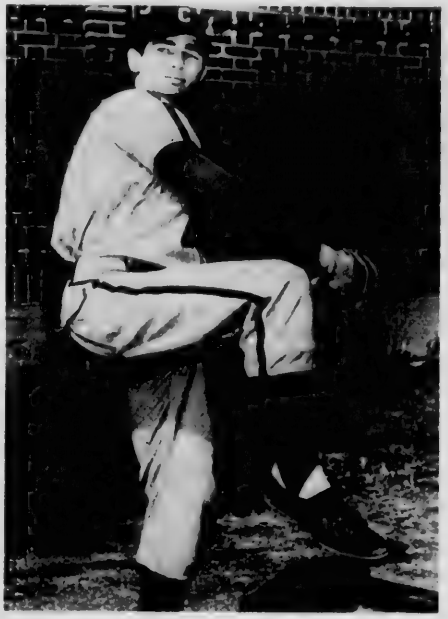
Lipman Pike was a pioneer of the game, known not only as the first Jew in baseball but also the first professional and one of its first stars.

Since then, Jews have played all positions, but perhaps the two best were Hank Greenberg and Sandy Koufax.

Greenberg was a slugger with the Detroit Tigers back in the 1930s and '40s. He was so good, in 1938 he threatened to break Babe Ruth's home run record of 60, but he came up short, finishing with 58. In 1934, in the midst of a pennant race, he sat out a game that fell on Yom Kippur.

Koufax, of course, was a star pitcher with the Los Angeles Dodgers. Not only was he the team's ace, he garnered international attention when he announced he would not pitch the opening game of the 1965 World Series because it fell on Yom Kippur. He did, however, pitch the deciding seventh game, a three-hit shutout that helped the Dodgers win the Series over Minnesota.

"There have been Jews who excelled in the game and they did a great deal for other Jews. It made them feel proud," Hechter said.



The great Sandy Koufax

Micro-distillery offers hand-crafted, authentic liquors

Paul Lungen

Barry Bernstein, left, and Barry Stein, show off the sampling station for Still Waters' adult beverages. (Paul Lungen photo)

Faced with a tempting array of hand-crafted, locally produced spirits, the intrepid reporter was faced with a conundrum that would tax the wisdom of Solomon: should he start with the single malt whiskey or go directly to the Canadian rye?

Solomon would no doubt still be tugging on his beard, weighing his options carefully in the time it took this reporter to go all-in for a wee dram of single malt, known colloquially as Scotch.

It was followed with an equally tasty sampling of the rye, a Canadian-style whiskey that was as smooth as the prairie grasslands, with flavours infused from the oak barrel, bourbon cask that had been its home for three years.

My late morning sampling at the headquarters of Still Waters Distillery – it was a cocktail hour somewhere, wasn't it? – proved that there really is something to this micro-distillery business.

The products on hand at the distillery, located in a commercial plaza in Concord, showed that the two middle-aged Jewish guys behind the enterprise really know what they're doing.

Barry Stein and Barry Bernstein – they share the middle name Michael, can you believe it? – are the proprietors behind Still Waters Distillery, a micro-distillery that has carved out a niche market among connosieurs of fine spirits.

As micro-distillers, they produce whiskeys and vodka, but at a fraction of the output of the big outfits, like Seagram and Wiser's. "They spill in one day what we can produce in one year," said Stein.

"They're 10,000 times bigger," added Bernstein.

But, after all, "Micro" does translate as "extremely small," and that may in fact be part of the reason for their success. There's a movement afoot among a segment of the population away from mass-produced anything to something smaller, local, hand-made, genuine and authentic. Perhaps run by a couple of guys named Barry.

In the alcohol business, it started with micro-breweries and small-scale wineries. With the advent of Still Waters, the Barrys have blazed a path for those who enjoy hard liquor.

In their Concord warehouse/distillery, 150 casks sit, with the heavenly nectars aging within. Each batch is produced by hand, with an attention to detail that only people who run their own business can provide.

The results are spirits that have garnered favourable reviews from experts and laymen alike. The final products are in demand in several U.S. states and they are shipped through brokers to a number of Canadian provinces. Just recently, the LCBO in their home province agreed to stock a Canadian rye whiskey under the company's Stalk & Barrel label.

The LCBO already carries the company's vodka. A 750-ml bottle of Still Waters Single Malt Vodka retails for $36.95. The company's single malt whiskeys sell for $69.95 for batches with 46 per cent alcohol, and $99.95 for "cask strength," undiluted spirits with greater than 60 per cent alcohol content.

Each cask produces between 175 to 300 bottles; it varies because the warehouse in which the casks reside is subject to changes in weather. There's expansion and contraction of the barrels as well as substantial evaporation – "the angel's share" it's called. But it's the expansion and contraction that brings more and more whiskey into contact with the wooden staves, where the flavours are enhanced with the characteristics left behind by the casks' original contents, American bourbon whiskey.

The Barrys re-fill two casks a week, or about 100 per year. And they're looking to expand by adding more casks and finding a bigger premises to house them.

The Barrys have long been devotees of fermented grains. They met some 20 years ago at their synagogue, Temple Kol Ami, where both served as president.

They became friends, as did their wives and children. The families took holidays together.

"Because we did a lot of pleasure travel together, we noticed there was a huge amount of single malt Scotches that never made it to the market in Canada," said Stein.

The two began to inquire into importing the product to Canada.

Eventually, they founded "Premium Bottlers," which bottled single malt whiskeys sent in casks from Scotland.

As one author recently wrote, "A beverage of leisure is a serious business, so, finding success they gave up their day jobs, Stein as the executive in charge of distribution for a large paint company; Bernstein from his own software business.

At the time, "we saw what was happening with craft distillers in the United States." It was just taking off and there was no equivalent in Canada. "It intrigued us and we looked into it," Stein said.

At first, "we had zero first-hand knowledge," said Stein. But they liked what they saw and to learn more they completed courses offered at Cornell University in Ithica, N.Y.

They ordered $300,000 worth of hand-made equipment from Germany, which arrived in boxes requiring assembly, much like a giant Lego figure, or a furniture item from IKEA, but without the Allen key. Stein and Bernstein assembled the 450-liter solid copper still – the same "still" as in "Still Waters" – that forms the heart of the enterprise.

It took three weeks, but "we know it inside and out," said Bernstein.

From there it was a matter of finding the right formula for the spirits. It took another six months to get that right

All the grains, the malted barley, rye, wheat and corn, is delivered to the distillery where the Barrys mix and create their alcoholic concoctions.

Vodka came first, as unlike other spirits, it does not require time to age. They found a market for it, but as craft distillers, their production is limited and as a result, so is the income it generates. The rest of their capital was tied up in whiskeys aging in casks. In this venture, you have to have patience.

The Barrys acknowledge the business is still in the red, but they knew going in it would take some time to make a go of it.

"It's a passion. It's definitely a long-term plan," said Bernstein.

"We're seeing the light at the end of the tunnel," said Stein. "Those casks are our RRSPs."

And while they're waiting for the business to take off, the inventory makes for a lovely liquor libation good at any time of the day.

What Jefferson Read, Ike Watched, and Obama Tweeted: 200 Years of Popular Culture in the White House.
By Tevi Troy
Regnery History

Yehuda Avner's 2010 book The Prime Ministers reveals a tradition of voracious readers among Israel's leaders, whose homes were lined with books in multiple languages. While those homes remind Tevi Troy of the residences of America's founding fathers, Troy's new book begins with President Barack Obama's reference to the cast of the Jersey Shore reality TV show during the congressional battle over health care.

Troy, who served as White House liaison to the Jewish community in the administration of George W. Bush, believes current Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's reading habits fall in line with the scholarly group of early Israeli leaders depicted by Avner. But in What Jefferson Read, Ike Watched, and Obama Tweeted: 200 Years of Popular Culture in the White House, Troy chronicles the opposite trend developing in the United States.

Israel's youth as a nation when compared to the United States likely accounts for this discrepancy, Troy said in an interview.

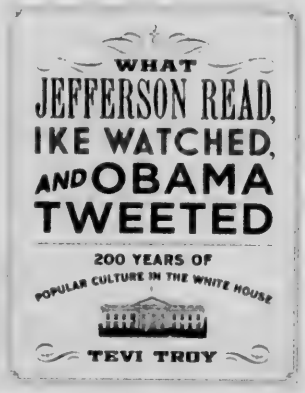
"Maybe there's something about the original founding generation, that in order to establish a state or know what makes a good government, you need to be a reader to be steeped in these great questions that man has debated for centuries," Troy told JNS.org. "Whereas when you're a caretaker leader, perhaps you don't need to read as carefully."

Troy's book lays out a historical trajectory in which the increasing prevalence of pop culture in American society has meant that U.S. presidents must be in tune with that culture in order to both get elected and then be "men of the people" while in office. What presidents may sacrifice in the process of immersing themselves in pop culture, however, is their ability to be scholars and "men of higher understanding," Troy writes.

What does that trend mean for American Jews? Troy said that pop culture is disproportionately shaped by Jewish voices; so if a president needs to be aware of the culture, the president is "clearly aware" of Jewish influences on culture as well.

Troy also chronicles a long history of American presidents welcoming Jewish artists to the White House. But he believes the Obama era might mark a shift.

"I think in some of these periods, Jews had a special status, because it was easier and safer politically to bring a Jewish artist than an African American artist [to the White House], for example, in some earlier and less enlightened times," Troy said.



"So I think that Obama signals kind of the end of this special relationship between presidents and Jewish artists for two reasons. One is that just his existence signals that we are sufficiently post-racial, that the kind of barrier that existed before doesn't matter. And two, that Jews have made so much progress that nobody really thinks of every Jewish artist as the Jewish artist, so much as the American artist."

Troy's book brings to light various unique factoids about how U.S. presidents related to Jews, such as the fact that, after his presidency, John Quincy Adams began working on, but never completed, a written history of the Jewish People. Theodore Roosevelt, in a 1903 speech for B'nai Brith, recalled that one of the colonels who fought with him at San Juan Hill was Jewish. Asked whether such a personal anecdote could appear in a modern presidential speech, Troy notes that while Roosevelt probably wrote his own speeches, presidential speechwriters have taken over that role today.

"Having been in the White House and having seen the speechwriting process, I know that the speechwriters do sit down with the president, and if he's meeting with a group [with which] he does have a personal experience, he will often relay it to the speechwriter, who will try and fold it into the speech," Troy said. "But even then, there's a filter between the actual giver of the speech, the president, and the writer of the speech, which kind of limits the personal nature of the story coming out to some degree."

Troy, who, besides being George W. Bush's Jewish community liaison, was also deputy secretary of the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services, writes in his book that Bush "was a reader and very few people knew it, until it was too late to change the public perception of him." After losing a 1978 race for the U.S. House of Representatives, during which he was decried as a Harvard and Yale graduate who couldn't connect with the people of Texas, Bush said he would not be "out-countried" again, and reinvented himself with a cowboy-like persona. That image would get Bush elected as governor of Texas and eventually as president, but also made it difficult for the public to believe that he was a serious reader, according to Troy.

How can modern presidents more effectively mould their images? Troy offers his formula in "Rules For Presidents Engaging Pop Culture" in his book's appendix. He said the book is recommended reading for future presidents and their campaign staffs, who "need to look at [pop culture] seriously, and have a plan and a strategy for approaching it." The same goes for Jewish organizations and leaders, Troy said.

"Someone like William Daroff (vice-president for public policy of the Jewish Federations of North America), he's the tweet master general of the Jewish community… and people are in some ways more aware of his organization than some of the others because of his activity on Twitter," Troy said. "A generation ago, it was [Anti-Defamation League national director] Abe Foxman's ability to get quoted in the New York Times that made his organization better known. So I think the new generation of Jewish leaders needs to adapt to new technologies, just like political leaders need to take these technologies into account."

The Orthodox Jewish community, meanwhile, must balance Shabbat observance with society's increasing expectation of its members to be wired 24/7. Troy, who has observed Shabbat for most of his life, said, "There is definitely a need in these days of PDAs [personal digital assistants] for people to feel connected at all times, and I myself put down that PDA at the last minute [before Shabbat] and I pick it up after Havdallah. And these things are great tools for knowing more than you could have known in the past. Not necessarily having more wisdom, but having more information."

That being said, Troy believes Judaism has benefited from having Shabbat "as a period when you step out and when you don't have your eyes fixed on a screen, and you can connect with family and friends." He says Orthodox Jewish parents should emphasize to their children the value "of breaking away from pop culture for brief periods, and then re-engaging later."

What lesson can the Jewish community as a whole glean from Troy's book?

"I think Jews should be appreciative of the home we found in America and the welcoming nature of the American community, and also of the role the presidents have played in this process," he said. "But I also think that they need to, when they are in the entertainment world, take their role seriously and think about what messages they are conveying about the Jewish community when they're creating and playing their product."

Brooklyn native brings humour to reboot of Beauty and the Beast

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Beauty and the Beast's second season is in full swing, continuing the modern revamping of the '80s TV series of the same name, and actor Austin Basis said there's still lots of action and excitement to come.

This season revolves around the theme of "Who am I?" – also the name of the season premiere. Each of the characters is going through changes and learning more and more about themselves.

Basis said his character, biochemistry professor J.T. Forbes, is learning how to open up to relationships outside the university and with his friend, Vincent Keller, the titular beast in the show who became beastly after a failed military experiment in post-9/11 Afghanistan.

At the start of this season, Vincent has a form of amnesia and can't remember anyone, including J.T., who had been his roommate and best friend for 11 years.

"[J.T.] is trying to figure out who he is without Vincent in this world," Basis said. "It's like an onion, peeling the layers to who J.T. is."

Basis said he brings lots of his own personality to the character. Identifying as a cultural Jew, he said that this trickles through in bringing humour to the character.

Austin Basis

"[It's] that kind of love of life, but in the deepest darkest moments, you are always able to make light or relieve the tensions with a little humour," he said.

The Brooklyn, N.Y. native said it's exciting shooting the show in Toronto, especially since it reminds him of his hometown. He has filmed in Canada before, but in Vancouver, which he likened to Los Angeles, where he now lives.

"It's that laid-back lifestyle that's very different from the urban lifestyle I knew in New York," he said. "Coming to Toronto, I was reintroduced to [it]."

The 37-year-old actor began his dreams of stardom with a goal of becoming a professional baseball player – specifically for the New York Mets.

"I was dead set on it and saw it in my future," he said. "I'd be that kind of player on the team that's the fun-loving jokester and the good player."

But once all his high school teammates grew, he realized that unless he was especially fast – he wasn't – being small wouldn't help.

He then enrolled in New York's Binghampton University, where he majored in theatre but also took pre-med courses, though he gave that up after taking a few university-level science classes and realizing they weren't for him.

So with some encouragement from his professors and lots of training, he began trying to make it in the acting industry.

He said his first big break was in 2004, when he was cast in an episode of Law & Order: Criminal Intent.

"You're not really an actor in New York until you've been on Law & Order," Basis said, explaining that the role almost legitimized him in the industry.

But you have to treat every role like your big break, he added. Every role could potentially help you break into the next level, and apart from a few A-listers, every actor is working toward finding their next big break, he said.

He's thrilled at the success Beauty and the Beast has found. It has a big following, especially among women.

"I think partly because of the romance aspect of the show and partly also because Jay Ryan, who plays Vincent, is a good-looking dude," he said.

But it's not just about the romance. There's action, supernatural mythology and even comedy.

"You'll laugh, you'll cry, you'll stress out and scream at the screen," he said, "and every episode will leave you wanting more."

Beauty and the Beast airs Sunday nights at 8 p.m. on Showcase.

Meet the married couple behind Dora-nominated theatre company

Cara Edell
Special to The CJN

dirty butterfly, currently running at Aki Studio in Toronto, is the most recent production from Bound to Create Theatre, the double Dora-nominated company established in 2004 by married couple and co-artistic directors Jack Grinhaus and Lauren Brotman.

Grinhaus, who spent his youth at Associated Hebrew Day School and Camp Ramah, began his theatre training at the age of eight at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. He went on to perform in community and touring productions, including the Holocaust drama I Never Saw Another Butterfly, which, he says, shaped his interest in serious drama for the stage.

"I do a lot of work with Jewish theatre companies that send artists into schools to use art as a way of teaching about tolerance," he said. "I also worked for a while at the Al Green Theatre and have done some work for the Harold Green Theatre. I am currently translating an Israeli play called Nutcase by Yael Ronin that I hope will be our next project for Bound to Create."

Brotman was also exposed to theatre at a young age. Her father has always been deeply involved in the arts community and she spent much of her childhood at his play rehearsals. In university, she realized she wanted to pursue a similar career and decided to study drama at the University of Toronto. She later trained classically with Soulpepper and at the Globe Theatre in London, England as one of 10 international artists through the Christopher Plummer Fellowship Award.

Brotman, who is half-Jewish, said she recently took a trip with her husband's family to Israel, where she "felt a deep connection" to the country. "Part of that was seeing phenomenal art and theatre and dance and it certainly inspired the kind of work we've been creating."

When first establishing their company, Grinhaus said he and his wife had a vision for a type of theatre they really wanted to see more of. "Our interests lie in fringe social and political issues that directly relate to the current world climate and also in finding unique and innovative ways of presenting them. We tend to create fast-paced, edgy, intense and dark-themed work that pushes boundaries and challenges the artists we work with as well as the audiences that come to see them."

Their mesmerizing and startling production of dirty butterfly explores voyeurism, power and guilt by confronting the collateral damage of domestic abuse and racial economic divide through a modern storytelling style that is equally blunt and poetic, he said.

"We chose this play to highlight an unfortunate truth that both domestic abuse and racism are actually on the rise. [Bound to Create] has partnered up with the White Ribbon Campaign for this show, with proceeds going to help raise awareness about violence against women."

The play is about three people, two black and one white, who live in adjacent tenement houses in a poor London neighbourhood.

Grinhaus said the play's subject matter is heavy, but the show itself is "highly theatrical and entertaining, challenging both artists and audiences to work their way through an almost postmodern style of writing for the theatre."

Bound to Create Theatre co-artistic directors Jack Grinhaus and Lauren Brotman.

Brotman said the play has "a musicality and poetry to its form" and challenges the audience to listen in a new way. "The text is fast-paced, the language broken up and overlapping. But the exciting rhythm is what we believe will compel audiences to keep up with it."

Aside from focusing on dirty butterfly, Brotman and Grinhaus have been devoting their attention to their new baby boy.

"He's a dream," said Grinhaus. "Little Ethan Jude came at this amazing time in our lives where we are birthing a great piece of art and a real life work of art. And he's such a good kid, rarely crying, and with us every day in rehearsal – a true theatre baby. Every time we get stressed out, there he is to calm us and let us escape the mayhem with his beautiful eyes and infectious smile."

While his son and wife inspire him to excel both personally and professionally, Grinhaus said his Jewish background is also a big influence.

"My grandparents were in Auschwitz and the horror stories we all share from that past makes many of us less tolerant to the injustices of the world. My talents happened to fall into the arts so much of my work comes from my own voracious appetite to speak human truths and out injustices. Almost every piece of theatre I create attempts to spark a public debate on an issue that isn't spoken of publicly."

The North American professional premiere of Debbie Tucker Green's dirty butterfly play is part of Obsidian Theatre's 2013/14 Season Presentation Series. It runs until Nov. 17 at Aki Studio, 585 Dundas St.. E., Toronto. To purchase tickets call 416-531-1402.

Cabaret artist returns to the stage in Toronto

Kathryn Kates
Special to The CJN

A Canadian "grande dame of cabaret" will light up the stage at Toronto's Jazz Bistro on Dec. 1 at 7 p.m.

Judith Lander is a consummate interpreter of cabaret's finest offerings. Her repertoire ranges from pop to Broadway, with the likes of Stephen Sondheim, to classical cabaret including Kurt Weil and Jacques Brel, with a sprinkling of jazz.

"My music is very emotionally driven, as well as musically driven, because I have been a singer for 50 years," says the singer, composer and actor. She has performed on Broadway and in other major North American cities in the original hit production of Jacques Brel is Alive and Well and Living in Paris, culminating with a memorable performance with Brel himself at New York City's famed Carnegie Hall.

"I have quite a background of music, so it is about connecting and reaching the hearts of the audience. It's very important to me to do that. There are a lot of singers these days who are imitations of imitations. They are not really connected as much to the musical lyrics as they should be, and I feel audiences today really hunger for that," says the Winnipeg native who now lives in Oakville, Ont.

"Cabaret is an eclectic combination of music that is either political, emotional or humorous, and it is coming back because people are tired of the sterility that's out there. Usually songs that have a personal bent have more emotional nutrition and people need that right now."

Lander, who is respected as a composer, most notably for compositions for ballet, including Diary, which has been performed by the National Ballet of Canada, the Hubbard Street Company of Chicago and the American Ballet Theater, is currently in the studio working on her first CD, due out in 2014. Jazz Bistro audiences will get a sneak peek of what's to come on this album, such as Anyone Can Whistle by Sondheim and September Song by Weil.

The 65-year-old has made a remarkable comeback, having retired from cabaret performance in her 50s. "What is amazing to me is that I'm in my 60s and I still sing really well, and that, to me, is an amazing gift," Lander says. "If you are trained properly, there's no reason why you can't maintain a lot of your voice, but you will lose a certain amount of your range, or it will shift. For me, I go a little lower with my range, but there were songs that I couldn't have done before, like September Song – but I was too young to do it – or Carousel by Brel that goes faster and faster and is quite mad at the end, and when I was young, it was extremely difficult to maintain the song. Now that I'm older, I can handle it much better because of experience, the [richer] interpretations and the power that I have at this age."

Lander says her first music roots came from singing at Winnipeg's Rosh Pina Synagogue's Saturday morning choir at 13. "The choir mistress, her name was Sara Udow, was a phenomenal singer herself. She heard something in my voice and asked me if I would like study with her. You couldn't be a Jew in Winnipeg in the '50s and '60s and not be really Jewish culturally."

The singer is also a respected voice teacher with students including beginners and seasoned stage performers. Lander is recognized by speech pathologists as a specialist working with people afflicted with nodes, and her techniques have been proven to revitalize their vocal chords.

Lander is a supporter of exceptional up-and-coming artists, and is thrilled that her show at the Jazz Bistro will also include special guests, The Watch, a new a cappella quartet consisting of singers Dylan Bell, Art Mullin, Daniel Galessiere and Aaron Jensen. The quartet's high-energy performance includes R&B, bebop and swing tunes.

Lander will be accompanied by pianist/vocalist Ghislain Aucoin and Tom Hazlitt on bass.

For reservations to Judith Lander's cabaret evening, call the Jazz Bistro at 416-363-5299 (JAZZ). For more information, go to http://jazzbistro.ca/event/judith-lander-with-opening-act-the-watch. Her website is www.judithlander.com.

Stratford newbie already feels at home on the big stage

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Sara Farb may have just made her Stratford Festival debut this year, but she's already a seasoned stage performer.

The 26-year-old actress made her professional debut when she was just nine years old in the role of young Jane Eyre at the Royal Alexandra Theatre.

"It was huge," she said. "Looking back it's astounding I was given that opportunity so young."

She remembers her first time performing in that production in front of an audience. The seats were totally black, darkened by the stage lights. She felt very little in the big room, but she hadn't yet developed the nerves that might worry an adult actor performing on that stage for the first time.

"People work their whole lives to achieve something like that, but I didn't really understand how lucky I was back then, because obviously I didn't know any better."

Now, the Toronto native is making her name known among the Stratford crowd, an experience she described as magical and overwhelming.

She was first seen this year as a young boy in Romeo and Juliet, a production that took the show back to its Elizabethan roots, with all of the cast speaking in the proper iambic pentameter – something that Farb said is quite rare, even in the town named for William Shakespeare's birthplace.

Although she prepared her lines as the understudy for Juliet, she never had the chance to actually perform it for an audience. Instead, she played the role of the Page to Paris, a little boy with a big musket. But she's not heartbroken about it.

"[As an understudy,] you hope to God you never have to go on, and if you do, you hope to God that you're ready. I was definitely ready... but it's great to know I have the role of Juliet in my wheelhouse," she said. "That's a huge amount of text that I now know."

Most recently, she performed the role of Jessica, Shylock's daughter who runs away from her father to marry a Christian, taking with her some of his wealth.

As is typical with all productions of the Merchant of Venice, this one drew some criticism from Jews, many of whom view it as an anti-Semitic story with Shylock as the villain.

However, Farb said she doesn't buy that argument.

"I know there's a preconceived notion that it's an anti-Semitic play, and depending on how you read it and depending on the production and how it's interpreted, it certainly could be," she acknowledged.

But that's not what this production was about, she said.

"What [Stratford artistic director] Antoni Cimolino so beautifully showed in this production was that what it comes down to is a question of humanity," she said.

"We have, at the crux, this religious disagreement, but when that's stripped away – and it is quite quickly – what you see is Shylock, who is just a complicated man who struggles to maintain his integrity."

In particular, the famous "Hath a Jew not eyes" speech, in which Shylock tries to point out that both Jews and Christians are human, is hugely valuable to that interpretation, Farb added.

"If a person saw the play and walked away thinking it was anti-Semitic, it was because they were insistent to begin with and reluctant to have their minds swayed."

Her next performance will be in Toronto for a night of music by Sting and The Police. Run by Acting Up Stage Company, the night will feature songs that have strong narratives, with a number of musical actors performing the songs. Farb said she's really looking forward to the concert.

"So many of the songs, I didn't realize I knew, and I love when that happens," she said, adding that she'll be performing a number of songs, but taking the lead on Synchronicity II, Don't Stand So Close to Me (in a duet with performer Jeff Madden), and Desert Rose as part of a trio.

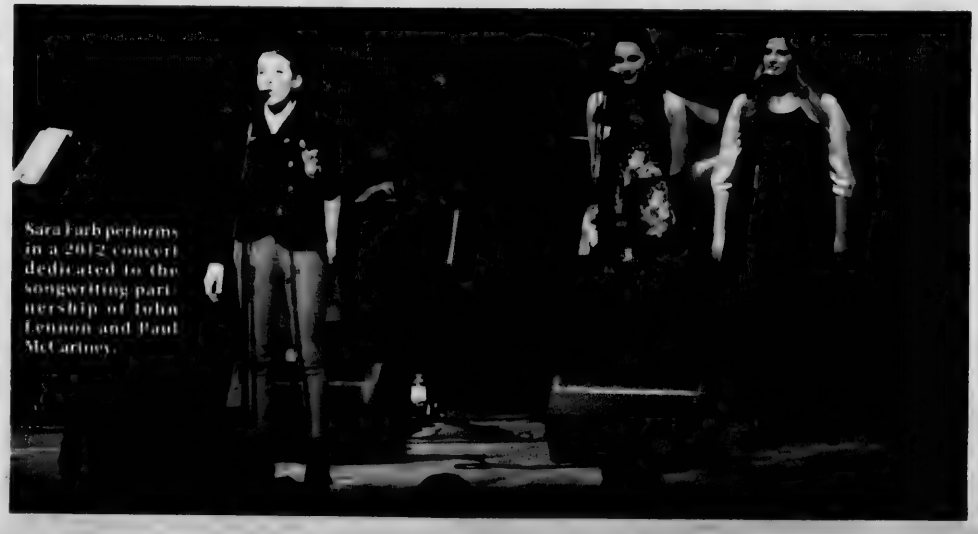
Farb said she was never going to spend her life chasing any career other than performing. When she's standing on a stage in front of an audience, she's comfortable and feels like she's doing what she's best at. The industry can be scary at times – especially the lack of stability – but she knows it's the right decision.

She knows employment won't be a concern for her for at least another year. The Stratford Festival recently announced that she's been cast as Cordelia in King Lear for next year's season.

And she hopes she can stay there for at least a while longer.

"It's every Canadian actor's dream to one day perform on a Stratford stage – especially on the Festival stage, which is where I got to do all of my shows this year," she said. "I can only hope that I'll be able to stay working in a place that I love and do work that excites me."

UnCovered:Sting & The Police will take place at Toronto's Telus Centre in Koerner Hall on Nov. 18.



Sara Farb performs in a 2012 concert dedicated to the songwriting partnership of John Lennon and Paul McCartney.

Music often important in dementia care

Senior Side of Life
Michael Gordon

I had seen the short YouTube video-clip of Alive Inside, which started as a short video clip of Henry Wakes Up – the Power of Music and has now been released for more general viewing in its entirety. I recently saw it at a special showing at the Alzheimer Society of Toronto, which is undertaking a major iPod project by which music will be delivered via the almost magical electronic wizardry of a small iPod loaded with personalized music that reflects the individual's musical history and preferences.

The movie was very powerful and brought back to me associations of the place of music in my own life and in illness in my family. It has also resulted in a number of research projects looking at the therapeutic use of music in other serious medical conditions.

In a recent report in the renowned Journal of the American Medical Association, an article on the use of personalized music delivered through earphones concluded: "Patient-directed music therapy in the intensive care unit (ICU) reduces anxiety in awake, ventilated patients while also decreasing the intensity and frequency of sedative use."

I recall vividly the devastating stroke and subsequent cascade of complications that ultimately resulted in my mother's death. During her hospitalization, my family and I utilized music during two seminal periods of her illness and dying process. The first was soon after her admission when she began to "come to" after the profound effects of the stroke and could understand what was being said to her: I applied earphones and played ballet music through the portable device I had (in those days, a Walkman was the advanced technology).

I also recall her reaction to the music of Swan Lake, which I had seen a number of times with her when I was a child. She not only moved her non-paralyzed hand to the music but pointed her non-paralyzed foot in typical ballet position as the music played on. She clearly responded to the music in a very positive way, and during the earlier period of her illness when there seemed to be some hope for partial recovery and maybe even rehabilitation, she wore the headphones often, and heard different pieces of classical musical, especially ballet music –always with a positive response on her part.

Toward the end of her illness, with great anguish, my father, my sister and I decided to stop further medical intervention other than palliative symptom management. I sat with her for hours with headphones on her, as she gradually slipped away. The Walkman played classical piano concertos that she loved. I, too, had developed a love for those pieces, especially Rachmaninoff's second piano concerto, which was one of the first 45-rpm recordings we ever owned, and we had shared performances of it when she took me to live musical concerts.

Although she did not actually die with the earphones on, they were with her almost until the very end, and I listened as well, through a coupler, to the same music, which at least transported me to another time.

With this in mind, I was very moved by the Alzheimer project in which personalized music was provided to individuals in long-term care facilities who could no longer apparently interact with the external world. The apparent awakening was so dramatic that many of us in the audience cried and laughed simultaneously because of the apparent joy we saw in response to the music.

The Toronto project is described very well on the website www.alzheimertoronto.org by clicking the button that describes current projects – this one being the iPod project

As part of long-term care planning for ourselves, it might be worthwhile to leave our loved ones a list, or even recorded selections, of music that we would like to hear when we can no longer make individual choices – a sort of musical personal legacy.

Change up your salads

Daphna Rabinovitch
Special to The CJN

When I was growing up, dinner at our house always included a green salad of some sort. My mother simply felt that no dinner was complete without salad, both for nutritional and aesthetic reasons. I have to admit that now that I'm a mother myself, dinner does indeed seem incomplete without a salad. However, my feelings about salad have changed quite a bit. Yes, I still love green salads of every variety but my repertoire has expanded to include those that take their inspiration from grains, fruits, both fresh and dried, as well as staples from a host of different cultures. I also know that it's important to include grains as much as I can in my diet. Grains contain a myriad of disease fighting compounds as well as fibre. They can lower your cholesterol, contain powerful anti-oxidants and can radically improve your insulin sensitivity. Because whole grains pass slowly through your body and help maintain blood glucose levels for longer periods of time, they are also considered a natural appetite suppressant, in effect sending the message to your brain, 'I'm still full, there's no need for more food.'

TWO GRAIN SALAD WITH DRIED FRUIT AND AVOCADO

1 cup quinoa
2/3 cup small green lentils
2/3 cup chopped dried apricots
½ cup golden raisins
2 ripe avocados, peeled and cubed
4 green onions, sliced
½ cup
toasted slivered almonds

Dressing:
1 cup chopped roasted red pepper
3 cloves garlic
2 tbsp. honey
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
2 tbsp. Dijon mustard
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil
¼ tsp. each salt and pepper

Bring 1 3/4 cups of water to a boil in a medium-sized saucepan. Stir in the quinoa. Cover and cook over low heat for 15 to 17 minutes or until the quinoa has absorbed all the water and is light and fluffy. Transfer to a bowl, fluff with a fork and let cool.

Simultaneously, place the lentils in a separate small pot. Cover with water. Bring to a boil over high heat. Reduce the heat and simmer, covered, for 15 to 20 minutes or until the lentils are tender. Drain well. Add to the bowl with the quinoa.

Meanwhile, place the red peppers, garlic, honey, vinegar, and mustard in the bowl of food processor. Pulse until thoroughly pureed. With the machine running, gradually add the olive oil in a thin stream, until thoroughly emulsified. Stir in the salt and pepper. (Dressing can be made ahead and refrigerated for up to 48 hours. Bring to room temperature before using.)

Gently stir the apricots, raisins, avocado and green onions into the quinoa and lentil mixture. Pour the dressing over and toss gently until well coated. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Garnish with the sliced almonds just before serving. Makes 4 to 6 servings.

APPLE LATKES

1 lg egg • 1/3 c plain Greek yogurt + 2/3 c natural plain yogurt • 1 c flour • 1/2 tsp baking powder • 1/4 tsp baking soda • 1/2 tsp cinnamon • 2 tblsp sugar • 2 apples grated • Vegetable oil, for frying • Maple syrup for serving

Beat egg with yogurts; set aside. Combine flour, baking powder, baking soda, cinnamon, sugar in a bowl. Peel, quarter, core and grate apples. Pour yogurt mixture into bowl with flour; fold in grated apples.

Pour enough oil to ¼" up in skillet; heat on stove. Dollop spoonfuls of apple batter into sizzling oil; press down on latkes in pan to flatten. Fry for a minute or two, until latkes are golden brown on underside; flip them with 2 metal spatulas; fry for another minute on uncooked side. Remove to a tray lined with paper towels to blot excess oil; continue cooking until you've used up all batter. Recipe doubles and triples easily.

BULGUR AND GRAPE SALAD

This dressing is simplicity itself. The sherry vinegar helps to highlight the nuttiness of the bulgur and adds wonderful acidic notes that contrasts wonderfully well with the sweetness of the grapes.

1 cup bulgur
1 1/2 cups halved red seedless grapes
1 cup sliced celery
4 green onions, sliced
¼ cup chopped fresh parsley

Dressing:
2 tbsp. sherry vinegar
1/3 cup extra virgin olive oil
¼ tsp. salt and pepper

Bring 1 cup of water to a boil in a saucepan. Add the bulgur. Reduce the heat and simmer, covered, for 15 to 20 minutes or until the bulgur has absorbed all of the water and is tender. Transfer to a bowl; let cool.

Meanwhile, pour the vinegar into a small bowl. Whisk in the oil gradually until well emulsified. Stir in the salt and pepper.

Once the bulgur is cooled, gently stir in the grapes, celery, onions and parsley. Pour the dressing over, and toss gently until well coated. Season to taste with salt and pepper. Makes 4 servings.

CJN writer honoured at foodfest

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

CJN food columnist Norene Gilletz, was the only Canadian on a list of people named as "pioneers in the kosher food industry" at the annual Kosherfest conference last month in Secaucus, N.J.

Chefs and cookbook authors Susie Fishbein, Laura Frankel, David Herzog, Gil Marks, Joan Nathan and Levana Kirschenbaum were also honoured at the pre-Kosherfest media dinner, dubbed Kosherfeast.

In addition, Menachem Lubinsky, president and CEO of LUBICOM Marketing Consulting, a full-service marketing and business development firm was also recognized.

Lubinsky, a well-known authority on the kosher food market, founded Kosherfest 25 years ago.

Gilletz, a cookbook author and food writer, said she was overwhelmed to be the only Canadian "on such a list of luminaries. I was blown away.

"As a Canadian, it is hard to make a mark in the culinary world, so I feel very proud."

Party Planner

Florist can make your party elegant

'We capture the essence of your imagination and ingenuity for that magical day'

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

The right décor can transform a party into a magical place – just ask Craig Gruzd, creative director of Dt Floral and Décor. The South African décor specialist boasts a large warehouse with a massive inventory of products reflecting the latest trends of glamour and elegance.

"We have the right materials to fit every vision, personality and budget, including rentals of furniture, prop, linens and more," he says.

With an in-house floral department Gruzd does custom consultations and has an amazing eye for detail, creating cutting edge designs. His specialties range from intimate gatherings to bar and bat mitzvahs, weddings and corporate events, each one customized according to his clients' personal taste, budget and details. For each one, Gruzd is the mastermind behind the staging, watching over every event large and small.

What distinguishes the company is its ability to reinvent a space according to the vision of the client. "Whether it's simple, classic elegance or something dramatic, innovative and different you're after, we capture the essence of your imagination and ingenuity for that magical day," he says. "We love it when clients bring us their dreams and challenges."

For a winter wonderland ski chalet-themed event, Gruzd created a ski chalet at the entrance to the venue, using a wooden wall façade and props that included skis and an animal head.

"We illuminated the dinner tables with alternating blue and white colours, used illuminated giant icicles as centrepieces, custom-made snowboards and a white vinyl dance floor decorated with vinyl snowflakes," he recalls.

In a wedding with a glitz-and-glamour theme, Gruzd incorporated as much purple, the couple's favourite colour, as he could. He draped the room floor to ceiling in white sheers, then lit the space in purple. White linens textured with white ribbon roses accentuated the purple drinking glasses while mirror troughs reflected imported white hydrangeas and gorgeous purple roses.

For the ceremony, the circumference of the chupah was encrusted in white and purple flowers with a crystal chandelier suspended in the centre.

"We received lots of compliments from the guests and the couple for that event," he says.

Gruzd buys fresh flowers from around the world and creates breathtaking floral arrangements, including extravagant hanging floral displays. Starting with a simple idea, he loves creating spectacular themes. Over the years, they have included fantasy, winter wonderland, an enchanted whimsical evening and glitz and glamour. He starts with a colour palette, moving to textures and using both to help create an event's mood and elegance.

Dt Floral and Décor uses colour palette and texture to create a party's mood.

Gruzd and his firm have received numerous awards from the Canadian events, weddings and meetings industries. High-profile clients who have benefited from his services include Brad Pitt, Russell Crowe, Innes Di Santo, Grace Ormonde and Queen Elizabeth II during her 2010 Toronto visit.

For a free consultation, call Gruzd at 905-669-9993 ext. 227. With his innovative ideas and creativity, he can execute a unique event on short notice, in as little as two weeks.

Let Karen G Events plan your simchah right

'I often call myself a party therapist'

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

Weddings can be quite a task to put together.

That's why you need an expert.

Karen Garscadden, who runs Karen G Events, has been planning weddings and other events for more than 25 years and knows what it takes to make the perfect function.

"Planning a simchah isn't just about the food and the flowers," Garscadden said. "It's about making everyone feel like it's their important family day."

That can be difficult to do, since when people from different backgrounds come together, there's plenty of mediation and understanding required.

"A lot of listening," Garscadden said. "I often call myself a party therapist, because many times, people come to the table, each with their own agenda or with 'that's the way we've always done it.'

"When they come to the table, and there's different opinions and ideas, it's my job to turn it into a positive experience," Garscadden added.

"You try and take a little bit from each [side] and blend it together, so that everyone is comfortable and everyone is represented."

Garscadden embraces the challenges of planning an important event.

"I love meeting with the people, and getting their vision. When I come up with the solutions, they'll say, 'oh my gosh, I can see this working' whereas before, they were [wondering] how they were going to do this," Garscadden said. "That's what I'm here for, to make this work."

A party planner can be extremely useful for a wedding.

"We're resourceful, have lots of new ideas, and we have a breath of what the trends are," Garscadden said. "We work with the facilities and know the benefits or limitations of certain facilities.

"I've worked with so many families, so many venues and so many suppliers that I have those resources right at my fingertips."

Garscadden's experience allows her to truly set the scene for people trying to get an idea of how a large, empty ballroom will look on the day of the event.

"When a family walks in, they see a blank room," Garscadden added. "I take that blank canvas and try to draw a picture on it so that they can really see how their simchah is going to come together."

One of the reasons Karen G Events remains a very in-demand planning company is because of the work they put in to stay ahead.

"I like to think of myself as cutting edge," said Garscadden, who has won awards for events that Karen G Events has produced in the past. "I like to be one step ahead of whatever is new and out there."

Part of the success stems from being able to deliver something that every party wants, even if the budget doesn't allow for perfection.

"Even when I'm challenged, 99.9 per cent of the time I come up with a good alternative," Garscadden said. "It might not be perfect, but it's a good alternative."

Garscadden has been around party planning long enough that she's now onto the third cycle of events for some families – the parent's wedding, the child's bar or bat mitzvah, and now that child's wedding.

"I love working with people and exploring new ideas and finding what [works] for them," Garscadden said. "I also like the creative element of what I do, always creating that new environment and new look [each time.]"

A planner turns your vision into reality.

Express your individuality with hundreds of in-store choices

The Israeli Source is simchah central

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

You could call The Israeli Source (905-482-2025) simchah central. The 3,000-square-foot warehouse, known for its huge selection of Judaica, carries all kinds of items that people might need for their simchahs and holiday parties.

For those having bar or bat mitzvahs in Israel, Israeli Source (60 Doncaster Ave.) can even arrange mobile telephone service. The store is also the place to go to for chupah rentals.

Not only does The Israeli Source (www.israelisource.com) offer customers a wide range of choices in Judaica items, but much of the merchandise, such as holiday-themed toys and gifts, is sold at discounted prices.

As well, ceremonial items such as shofars, menorahs, customized kippot and benschers are competitively priced, said president Chuck Elnekave.

If you're shopping for Chanukah, the store has gifts and novelty items for all ages: serving dishes, plush Chanukah toys, musical dreidels and gingerbread-house kits with blue and white icing.

You can also find unusual Judaica items such as kippot and tallit in the Scottish Jewish tartan.

For simchahs, few places can match the selection of kippot available from The Israeli Source. Between the variety of materials and the numerous styles, Elnekave said he and store manager Yehuda Aboudi figured out that if they mix and match all the various options, they can provide three million different kippot. "We can make something really unique. No two kippot need to be the same.

Some of the three million kippah options that are available.

"People are looking to be different. Our many options allow people to express themselves individually."

Aboudi said that there are about six or seven items to consider when deciding on a kippah for a simchah. Aside from colour and fabric, clients can also choose from a variety of styles that may include stitching, a button, a rim, lining, as well as different coloured panels.

People can also opt for hand-crocheted or suede kippot, he said, noting that linen is generally the most common choice, especially for weddings. "There are more than 39 different types of linens to choose from."

The Israeli Source can also match the kippot to any colour swatch from a tablecloth or a bride's colour scheme, says Elnekave.

A popular kippah choice for bar mitzvahs is a sports mesh, he says. "The bar mitzvah sport kippot are taking off like crazy.

"For one bar mitzvah, the kid was really into basketball. We put the number of his basketball shirt on the kippot. They were embroidered in the same way you would see on the back of a basketball jersey."

For bat mitzvahs, he says silk and satin kippot are the current trend.

Elnekave stressed that his prices for kippot and other ceremonial items are very competitive. "We give people many options, so they're not breaking the bank. We offer the best value."

He said his prices are good, because he sources out products from a variety of places. "We work with different vendors based locally and in Montreal, New York and Israel."

He stressed that in addition to kippot, he can customize benschers with a printed message.

Other ceremonial items available include tallit, tefillin and ketubot. "The ketubot are created by artists from around the world."

As for simchah favours, The Israeli Source is starting to work with chocolate makers and other confectioners for edible items that can be personalized, Elnekave said.

"There's a type of chocolate in which the bride and groom's names can be molded into the chocolate. It's a great give-away."

He says The Israeli Source also offers a wide selection of Judaica gifts for every price range. "We have great gifts for all occasions. We offer something for every budget."

For instance, he says, challah covers that can be personalized with printed or embroidered messages are thoughtful and practical wedding or engagement gifts.

Popular gift items for bar and bat mitzvahs include kiddish cups, shofars, menorahs and books, he says.

The Israeli Source also has special gifts to commemorate bar and bat mitzvot. One of the most popular is a replica of a Torah scroll encased in lucite, said Elnekave. "The Torah is open at the right parshah and the name is engraved in the lucite to make it personalized."

The Israeli Source also has a registry for weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs.

Personalized artwork lets couples add something unique to their special day

Ketubah captures the meaning of marriage

Danielle Kubes
Special to The CJN

A marriage isn't really about the wedding. As much fun as it is getting caught up in choosing the perfect dress, food and venue, a marriage is about two individuals promising each other a lifetime of love, care and provision.

That's why a hand-painted and personalized ketubah is such a wonderful way to represent a married couple's adoration and commitment – it literally outlines the obligations and responsibilities of married life.

Michelle Cohen, owner of Ketubah Gardens, designs hand-painted, nature-themed marriage contracts that that come in both standard and personalized text.

"I enjoy incorporating these special symbols to ensure that a couple's ketubah is as meaningful as possible," she says.

Cohen offers couples across Canada the opportunity to turn a standard marriage contract into something that reflects both the individuals' personalities and also a couple's particular relationship.

"One couple sent me a picture of two small turtles that held sentimental value and asked if I could incorporate it into their garden-themed ketubah. I painted the turtles on their ketubah print and embedded them at the base of the tree," she says.

"Another customer asked if I could somehow incorporate her husband's favourite guitar into her chosen design for their anniversary ketubah."

It's this sort of attention to detail that has earned her praise from clients.

"The people who find me always say they have gone through the big ketubah sites and either get overwhelmed or just can't find what they are looking for," she says.

"Because I'm a small business, I can still offer that personalized feel, whether by email, phone or in-person."

The creative process starts with an in-depth discussion with a couple about their relationship, favourite memories, colours and symbols.

Then Cohen hand-paints it, photographs it in high-resolution and prints it through a special technique called giclee printing. After it's printed, Cohen might add gold or silver accents by hand.

"Most of my customers are surprised when they see that they can have ketubah print that looks and feels like a true hand painting at an affordable price point," she says.

Cohen, a visual arts teacher for Jewish day schools, stumbled across this business when she made a vibrant and colourful ketubah as a wedding gift for her brother and sister-in-law. Guests noticed and started asking her for them.

Sure enough, word of mouth spread, and her ketubot became in demand. Cohen kept the business small in the beginning, just offering the service to friends, but when she went on maternity leave, she saw an opportunity to expand.

"I researched the different wedding texts and options for different wedding ceremonies, and started to build a repertoire of text options for clients to choose from," she says.

Now she has a website and ships worldwide.

"The ketubah is something special that represents a couple's journey together," she says.

"It's something that hangs in their home to remind them of their commitment to each other and of their special day."

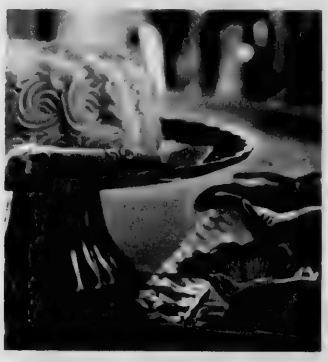
William Ashley: your perfect registry partner

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

A gift registry offers engaged couples an opportunity to create the perfect wish list for their home.

At William Ashley's 55 Bloor St. W. flagship store (416-964-9111), couples can select from North America's largest selection of tableware, kitchenware and home décor from all the leading, world-renowned brands at Canada's best prices.

"Professional registry consultants work with couples one on one in selecting their dinnerware, crystal, flatware and kitchenware, as well as home accessories that will best reflect their combined lifestyle, whether it's modern or traditional," says registry consultant Fatima Pacheco.



If a piece breaks within the first three years of use, William Ashley will replace it for 50 per cent off the current price.

"We make the process simple and unique to each couple. Our best kept secret is our Gourmet Shoppe that carries everything for your entertaining needs including small kitchen appliances, trendy gadgets, pots and pans and chef's knives."

Couples can register online or by telephone, where friendly and knowledgeable registry consultants are pleased to assist.

William Ashley's gift notification service informs couples of the gifts that have been purchased and who purchased them, allowing couples to ensure they receive the items that are most important to them.

William Ashley offers delivery across North America and provides couples in the Greater Toronto Area with a complimentary delivery service at their convenience.

Often, not everything a couple wants is purchased from the gift registry. The company provides a registry completion program offering the couple a 10 per cent discount (five per cent in the Gourmet Shoppe) on any outstanding items on their registry for up to one year after their wedding date.

As William Ashley wants to ensure that couples use and enjoy their china and stemware on a daily basis, it provides its unique, complimentary "Everyday Entertaining Insurance." If a piece breaks within the first three years of use, William Ashley will replace it at 50 per cent off the current national suggested retail price or comparable regular value.

William Ashley also provides a full-service stationery boutique.

"In the boutique, we carry Canada's best selection of custom invitations which allows us to provide couples with an exceptional variety of styles and printing techniques for any special occasion," Pacheco says.

Professional consultants work with couples one on one.

"A William Ashley invitation is not just an invitation, it's an expression of your special day."

William Ashley is proud to be Canada's exclusive destination for world-renowned Teuschér Chocolates of Switzerland. Teuscher's handmade chocolates do not contain any preservatives or additives. They are prepared in Zurich, Switzerland, and flown in weekly to arrive fresh for your shower, engagement party, or wedding. Made with the finest ingredients, their signature Dom Perignon Champagne Truffle is world famous.

"Your selection of truffles can be packaged in individual gift boxes with a co-ordinating colour box and ribbon to match your wedding colours. Each ribbon is hand tied as an extra special touch," she says.

Additionally, William Ashley offers complimentary parking in the Manulife Centre with purchase for the couple and their guests. Gifts purchased in store are packaged in William Ashley's signature gold boxes, free of charge.

Since 1947, William Ashley has been bringing "magic to every day and every occasion" by assisting couples to create a gift registry that reflects their unique taste and lifestyle. Pure Entertainment brings the energy

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

After reading from the Torah, it's time to get the party started.

And no one knows how better to do that than Pure Entertainment (905-326-4822.)

Although it's a new company, there is plenty of experience backing this high-energy entertainment package.

"I've been doing bar and bat mitzvahs for 15 years now, so I have a good reputation in the industry," said Pure Entertainment's Lucas Margulis, who had previously worked for companies such as the Magen Boys and Mandel Entertainment before deciding to head out on his own.

"We're a full-service entertainment company and we provide everything from high-energy interactive dancers to MCs to DJs to production."

Margulis began working with Mandel Entertainment at the age of 14 and within a year, he was on a microphone.

"I thrive on hosting events, and I still do it," said Margulis, who goes by the name MC Pitbull when he's hosting events.

"What I bring to the table is a lot of creativity, a unique perspective on an event. I've been doing it for so long, it's almost like second nature."

Lucas Margulis is youthful, but he's been in the party business for 15 years.

That isn't to say that a lot of effort isn't put into each and every event.

"I only care whether or not the party goes well for my client," Margulis said. "Whether you have a huge budget or a [small] budget, I try to give everyone the best party possible.

"I want to make sure that what our clients envision for the event is what we can provide, but most importantly, I know what's going to work and what's not going to work, so I can give the best recommendations for my clients."

Margulis' connection with popular dance music station Z103.5 also means that a Pure Entertainment party has some exclusive tunes.

"Because we're affiliated with them, we have mash-ups and other remixes that no one else has," Margulis said. "We do a lot of events with Z103.5, a lot of charity events, because we want to give back to the community."

And no matter the party or which staff member is working it, they're ready to go at a frenetic pace.

"We have a huge roster of people trained in my style, which is very high-energy and non-stop," Margulis said.

"I'm proud to have been training my staff and they've really delivered shows that are catered to the style I put out there."

Pure Entertainment is backed by Peter and Paul's and is a division of S4 entertainment, so with more than 30 years of experience behind them, they know how to do everything properly.

"Right off the bat, we get back to clients within 24 hours, always," Margulis said. "We have divisions for every little aspect of our company.

"We do provide a full service, so that when you come to us, it's a one-stop shop," added Margulis, who also mentioned that people can get a great deal if they're interested in Pure Entertainment at one of Peter and Paul's venues.

Although they are able to provide anything from decor to caterers to photographers, that doesn't mean Pure Entertainment will be insulted if you choose to go a different route.

"If someone comes to me looking for a party planner, I'll list 10 of them, all at different prices, just so that they have their options of choosing who they feel works for them," Margulis said.

"We're not just pushing our venues and products. We're there to help our clients and direct them in the right way, even if it means we might not be [getting the business.]"

Having done parties for more than 15 years, Margulis knows that each event is unique.

"Every party is customized," Margulis said. "We sit down with our clients and ask what they want and what they don't want, which is just as important, because if you play the wrong song, you can lose a crowd.

"We have over 50 DJs that can cater to any genre and MCs that can talk in different languages," Margulis added. "It doesn't matter your nationality, we've got someone that can cover it."

Artz Axentz (905-763-8384,) founded in 1999, is a unique lifestyle boutique in Thornhill. Due to increasing popularity, the store moved to a new, larger location last February at 1118 Centre St., unit 12. "We focus on offering our clients unique collections for any occasion. We accommodate every shopper's needs, such as birthday, hostess, bridal, wedding, holiday, men's or baby gifts. We have it all," said Maya Gold, owner of Artz Axentz.

"We travel the world and hand pick new artisan pieces and exciting collections to feature," said Gold.

The boutique carries one of the largest collections of Sympli, a Canadian-made line of fashionable clothing for day and evening, and travel. The brand, which carries sizes 2-18, was featured on CityLine's Fashion Friday.

Flirty & Femme is Artz Axentz's own brand of seamless body wear, which is wholesaled and distributed to retailers across Canada. The stylish products offer support while providing a comfortable stretch created from an ultra-soft blend of nylon and spandex. "The moment you enter the store, you become immersed in the gorgeous clothing, the stunning costume jewelry, accessories, and giftware for all occasions, Judaica for special holidays, home accents from around the world and hand-selected one-of-a-kind artisan pieces," Gold said.

The unique lifestyle boutique now has a new, larger location on Centre Street in Thornhill.

In addition to quality products, Artz Axentz also has experienced sales staff to ensure customers have a positive shopping experience. "Our staff has the ability, warmth and skills to put our customers at ease," said Gold. "They understand our customers needs and budgets and are focused on building happy and long-lasting customer relationships." To complete the shopping experience, Artz Axentz offers complimentary gift wrapping.

"With so many categories to cover there is something new and exciting arriving in the store daily," said Gold.

"Come and see for yourself what we're about. And then don't forget to tell your girlfriends!"

Memories and photos last long after party ends

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

A special celebration can take months, even years, to plan but it's over in a flash, and all that's left are memories and photographs, assuming you've taken the time to secure the latter.

Elliot Sylman, owner of Toronto's Sylman Photography (416-876-5904 or sylmanphoto.com,) has been shooting parties and people for the past 28 years.

"I've had a love of photography since I was a boy," he says.

Sylman's clients build their own package, and each package is individually customized, ranging in price from $1,800 to $5,000.

One thing he wishes, is that clients were more aware of the time factor required to shoot really great images.

Sylman Photography lets you build your own package.

"If people want brilliant results they have to be prepared to put the time in," he explains.

"I don't charge more because I spend more time. If my client is willing to put the time in, so am I, and it does pay."

Often, clients don't give themselves enough time before a party. Sylman recommends at least two to three hours devoted exclusively to capturing images in various locations.

"I recently photographed a family of four at the Canadian National Exhibition," he reflects.

"For this project, we got together several times to shoot pictures, because I wanted them to have a huge variety, and to love the images. And the results completely speak for themselves. They're beautiful."

His favourite shooting locations are outdoors in the woods, though he's also a fan of busy urban scenes such as Bloor Street, Yorkville and the Distillery District.

"I love a busy scene in the background, but I also like shade, as direct sunlight doesn't do any favours to the client," he says.

It's important to Sylman that his clients enjoy the shoot and have fun doing it. That enjoyment is reflected not just in the images, but also in their appreciation and memories of taking those pictures once they are printed.

Most clients choose a custom album after their event, containing anywhere from 80 to 180 photos. Some of his favourite events to photograph are the bar and bat mitzvahs of children whose parents' weddings he captured years previously.

Gina Kohn was one those clients.

"Elliot is an incredible photographer," she says.

"He photographed our engagement, wedding and many family events in the last few years. Not only does he capture the moment exactly how we picture it, but he makes the photo-taking part of every event fun and entertaining."

Another client, Rosanna Breitman, agrees.

"Elliot has been our family photographer for 20 years now and is an extremely talented, hard-working and generous guy. His work is just stunning, and we can't wait to have him shoot our younger daughter's bat mitzvah this year!"

When he's not photographing weddings and events, Sylman does commercial portraiture and photographs Holocaust survivors.

He currently has a photographic exhibition showing at Baycrest Centre that runs until early December. Head there to see Sylman's images, or check them out online at sylmanphoto.com.

There are so many decisions to be made when you hold a simchah. You have to choose a venue, plan the food, book the music, figure out decor, and if the celebration is a bar or bar mitzvah you've got to shop for giveaways and then have activities to keep the kids entertained.

But if you hold your event at the Pickle Barrel (416-984-5348), you can relax and leave almost all those decisions to the banquet department, says Tanya Murray, Pickle Barrel's longtime banquet manager (www.picklebarrel.ca).

"Hosts and hostesses can feel like guests at their own parties, because I will look after all the details.

"It's one-stop shopping, and I do everything from beginning to end. The customer meets me a few times and everything is done for them – the DJ, invitations, linen choices, menu selections, celebration cake, and centrepieces."

The party package even includes party favours and giveaways.

The Pickle Barrel party concept is very much appreciated by hosts and hostesses, Murray says. "They don't have to be stressed before or at the party. I do the worrying for them."

Party packages are available at Pickle Barrel's two banquet venues. The Rose Room, located downstairs at the original Pickle Barrel restaurant (5941 Leslie St.), can accommodate 100 people for a sit-down meal.

"It's a popular choice for bridal and baby showers, bar and bat mitzvahs, birthdays, engagement parties, baby namings, and Friday night dinners," says Murray.

The second banquet hall, which is in Markham, is located at the Markville Shopping Centre (5000 Highway 7 E., at McCowan Road). The space, named the Harold Soupcoff Room in memory of the Pickle Barrel's late co-founder, can hold 210 guests for a sit-down dinner and dance event.

Both venues have full speaker systems, projector screens, DVD players, podiums, and free parking. Only the Soupcoff room has an overhead projector, Wi-Fi and a microphone attached to the podium. The space has a private entrance and is wheelchair accessible. The Rose Room does not have a separate entrance, nor is it wheelchair accessible.

The party menus were revamped in the last year, and Murray says she's very pleased with the changes.

"Our packages are absolutely the best deal in town. People are getting premium quality food at excellent prices."

The Pickle Barrel has always offered party packages that have been well-priced, she adds. "It's hard to beat our prices for the quality of the food.

"We go to the market to get our food. You don't get much fresher. Our chefs are some of the longest-serving employees. Some have been here 30 years. They're really good at what they do.

"We've done special cultural foods and they were able to carry it off. I try everything before it leaves the kitchen."

She's also around for all the parties, she says. "I shuttle back and forth."

The bar and bat mitzvah packages, which are the same cost for both venues, start at $5,500 for 75 guests. The buffet has several hot entrees and side dishes, salads and desserts. The entrees include barbeque chicken, chicken fingers and a deli-carving station.

For an extra $5 per person, the carving station can be upgraded to prime rib or salmon, while table service costs an additional $5 per person.

As well, she says other additions such as popcorn machines and photo booths can be added to the party package.

Party packages even include fabulous food, party favours and giveaways.

One of the big party draws is the brunch menu, a full dairy buffet that includes salads, smoked salmon, cheeses, chopped egg and tuna, and an omelet bar.

And the desserts are always a huge hit, Murray says.

"We do cookies, cupcakes or plated cakes like chocolate fudge or cheese cake."

The Pickle Barrel has a pastry chef on staff, she notes. "She's amazing. She makes lemon squares you could die for."

And Murray says customer satisfaction is pretty high, because she gets many return bookings from families.

"I'm doing a lot of bar and bat mitzvahs for the same people. I'm on their second or third kids."

She advises people to book their simchahs early. "Our venues are very much in demand. I'm turning people away. I have bookings for 2015 already."

One-stop shop sells products for almost any kind of celebration

Party Supply Depot lives up to its name

Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

When Mel Grevler opened Party Supply Depot more than 20 years ago, it was located in a compact, 1,800-square-foot store on Thornhill's Doncaster Avenue. Today, his one-stop shop for all things party remains on the same street, but in a space six times larger than the original. What hasn't changed, however, is the storeowner's friendly attitude toward his customers.

"Honestly, I appreciate every time a customer comes into the store," says the South African transplant. "I really appreciate the fact that they've chosen us."

Grevler prides himself on having a family-oriented business. His store receives visitors from as far away as Montreal, and many of his adult customers have been shopping there since they were in strollers.

"There was a woman in the store today who told me that she's now purchasing because her son is getting married and she did the son's bris with us," Grevler said. "So people have kept coming back because we must be doing something right."

He also attributes the store's success to his amazing staff – some of whom have been with the store since it opened. Grevler said he's happy to hire young people so that he gets as much time with them as possible before they head off to university and other paths. "Nobody's been there less than five or six years," he said.

The idea of opening a party supply store came to Grevler during a Passover seder. It was 4 a.m. and he was still cleaning up from the night's festivities. "I said to my wife, 'There's gotta be some better way of doing it,'" he recalled.

They spoke to a mutual friend who introduced them to disposables. The duo investigated the industry and opened the store in 1990 – the day after Rosh Hashanah.

The store has since evolved to include anything and everything you need to throw a great party, including balloons, loot bags, costumes, party giveaways and virtually anything else you can think of.

"Well truthfully whatever you say, no one can ever be the cheapest in everything," he admits. "However, we try to give a very fair price. We try to carry as much inventory as possible to satisfy everyone's needs – whether they're looking to get half a dozen plates or they're looking to cater to five or 6,000 people – we can accommodate the caterer.

The store tries to carry as much inventory as possible, and at different price points.

Founder Mel Grevler came up with the idea for his store 20 years ago while cleaning up from a Passover seder with his wife at 4 a.m.

"I try to carry as wide a range as possible. If we don't have it, we'll do our best to get it for the customer if they've given us enough time."

Party Supply Depot also caters to the Jewish community. Some of the tableware in the store can only be found there.

"There's always the Friday night before, there might be the aufruf before," Grevler said. "And then even the day after the bar mitzvah, the families usually get together before everybody goes home. So, in that way, we've got a huge range of tableware. Then we also do decorating – and balloon decorating in particular. We can make deliveries, or we'll go out and decorate a hall."

Grevler said he also has all the fun centrepieces and giveaways one would need for a party. "We're always on the lookout for the newest product. And basic stuff like hats and blowups and, you know, that sort of thing."

Then there's what seems like an endless supply of costumes for themed parties and Purim. "We've bought a lot of costumes with biblical characters, and all the general stuff," he said. "Even the superheroes are popular, [and] kings and queens, and so forth."

Speaking of party supplies, there's one thing you'll always find in Grevler's store: helium. He said there's a worldwide shortage of the chemical element used to fill up balloons. However, he makes sure that never happens at his store. "Some of the biggest competition have been without it for sometimes two or three months at a time," he said.

Grevler's goal for his store is to continue on the path he's been on for the last 20 or so years. "Some people have opened multiple stores and struggled with them, and we've stuck to our guns – one store – and made it work."

Give the gift of theatre from Mirvish Productions

First-class live entertainment has never been more affordable

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

For the past 50 years, David Mirvish and his family have been producing and presenting theatre, and the repertoire of shows for 2013-2014 will be the largest ever for the company.

Back in 1963, Ed Mirvish couldn't resist the $215,000 price tag on the historic Royal Alexandra Theatre.

"It was an unbelievable bargain," recalls his son, David. "But there was a catch: whoever bought the theatre had to promise to keep it running as a theatre for at least five more years."

At the time, most prospective purchasers of the theatre were deterred by that catch, given the blow dealt to theatre by movies and television.

"Making a go of a business everyone said was doomed was just the sort of challenge to get Dad interested," David says.

The first comedy at the newly purchased theatre was Never Too Late, and just before the first performance, Ed Mirvish confessed to William Bendix, the show's star, that he knew nothing about running a theatre. Bendix reassured him, the show went well and five years flashed into a half century.

"It's hard for me to believe how quickly those 50 years have gone by," says David. "But one thing I've learned is that people are far less interested in what you've done than in what you're going to do next. It's fun to talk about the past, but it's the future that's really exciting."

On the schedule for Mirvish in the 2013-14 season are 18 shows. They are available alone at regular price, or as two different subscription packages.

The main subscription, which is also 50 years old and is among the most subscribed in North America with more than 40,000 subscribers, has a mix of large-scale musicals and dramas. Besides Les Misérables and Aladdin, there are the Tony-winning musical Once; two dance-based dramas, Arrabal from Argentina and Heartbeat of Home, a new spectacular creation from the producers of River-dance; a stage adaptation of Kafka's groundbreaking Metamorphosis, which has been a smash hit in London and across Europe; and the London success The Last Confession, starring David Suchet and Brian Bedford.

The second series, called Off-Mirvish, because the shows are more edgy and quirky, features three shows. God of Carnage is a Tony-winning comedy about two seemingly sophisticated and civilized couples that somehow go over the edge when meeting to discuss their children; the powerful drama The Two Worlds of Charlie F., and the hilarious new comedy Dead Metaphor from award-winning playwright George F. Walker.

Then there are shows that are not part of either subscription series: The Musical of Musicals – The Musical is a spoof of musicals that was hot at this year's Fringe Festival. Perennial favourites such as Chicago, the Musical – featuring Olympic skater Elvis Stojko; a touring production of Disney's The Lion King; Green Day's American Idiot; We Will Rock You, which features the music of Queen, and the crowd-pleasing Rain, a tribute to the music and lives of the Beatles.

Best of all, the cost of attending first-class theatre has never been more affordable. You can become a subscriber from $153 for the main series or $99 for the Off-Mirvish series. Tickets to the other shows start as low as $19.

I Love Lucy* was part of this year's season at the Royal Alexandra Theatre.

And if you're looking for the perfect gift and can't decide on the show, Mirvish Productions offers gift certificates in any denomination, available for purchase in person at the box office or by calling 416-872-1212.

For more information, visit www.mirvish.com.

Tickets to Les Misérables would make a great Chanukah gift.

Josh Israel teaches the art of invisibility

Rita Poliakov
Special to The CJN

Josh Israel (videobyjosh.com or 905-709-9277) prides himself on being invisible. In his line of work, it's not a bad skill.

"I try to stay a bit in the background," said Israel, who has been a videographer for about 34 years.

"There are a lot of clients out there who don't want video people to disturb [the event]. They'd like the event to continue without any noise or equipment," said Israel, who works in the Greater Toronto Area.

When Israel first started out as a videographer, blending seamlessly into the background was harder to do. But now, everything is cordless.

"You don't want people tripping. You don't want the place to become a mess. Most banquet halls are very well decorated. Clients don't want the decor affected in any way," he said.

For Israel, who mostly works at Jewish weddings and bar and bat mitzvahs, keeping up with changing technology is essential.

"There have been many changes. Anything from old VHS to digital video to high def video. Every few years, we have to turn over equipment, get rid of the old, learn all sorts of new software," said Israel, who uses a $40,000 camera.

"The lens on it alone is worth $20,000. The bottom line is, the consumer gets a lot more for their money than in the old days. The image quality has tremendously improved."

It may have been more than three decades since Israel first picked up his video camera, but the videographer still remembers his first gig.

'I try to stay in the background to get the best shots,' videographer says

"It was a wedding at Beth Emeth, a very popular, large synagogue. I learned a lot from it. [I learned] that it's very important not to miss anything. It's important to shoot much more. If you overshoot, you can always edit things down. If you don't shoot enough, you can't reshoot," he said.

For Israel, the best part of his work is when he's at the actual event.

"I enjoy the shooting the most. The editing can get a bit boring. The shooting is nice because the decor is usually quite beautiful. There's a lot of entertainment, music, fantastic bands. There's very good food," he said.

"When you shoot, you're mostly shooting people who are happy. It's not like having to go and shoot a funeral. It's great to shoot happy scenes."

Israel loves walking into a banquet hall.

"When I walk into a banquet hall, I totally forget about my personal life. I'm completely dedicated to the job from the time I arrive to the time I leave. I can feel it. When I walk in, I don't worry about being too tired, [having] pains, it all seems to disappear. You're there to do a job, to make everyone happy. When you drive away, your personal life becomes important," he said.

Unlike some videographers, Israel isn't shy about money talk. His prices are listed on his website.

"The average is around $2,000. It can go higher or lower depending on the party. There's even a $500 [package] for small events," he said, adding that having the price on his site reduces the amount of calls he gets.

As a videographer, Israel deals with his fair share of competition, and many times, competitors will offer lower prices. But, according to Israel, clients usually get what they pay for.

"There's too much competition, and it's mostly price competition. I find first-time clients are looking strictly at price. They're not looking at experience and materials. I find there's always a problem trying to make a sale to a first-time client," he said.

Be wary of low-cost operators, because you get what you pay for, he warns.

Clients who are planning a party for the second or third time are usually an easier sell.

"They find out the negatives of [going by price.] They're a little more educated," he said.

"The great majority [of my competition] are strictly into price. Their father buys them a cheap camera and computer, and overnight they're in business. The ones that have been around for a long time, their image quality is a lot better. Ten per cent [of my competition] are doing a great job. Those are the ones I compete with."

Routes to Our Roots lets you see how Jews live around the world

Enjoy a cruise while learning about Judaism

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Jewish travellers can reconnect with their roots through new cruise vacation options that will teach them about Jewish heritage and culture around the world.

Routes to Our Roots is the brainchild of Sheldon and Hope Saul. During their 16 years of experience in running cruise tours, the couple found that many of their Jewish travellers were particularly interested in learning about Jewish experiences around the world.

"When they travel on cruises and go to different parts of the world, they want to know how the Jewish people live in that city or country, and how they experience the Jewish situation," Sheldon Saul said.

So he and his wife got the idea that they could bring like-minded people together and book cruises specifically with the goal of learning about Jewish heritage.

"It's inherent in us as a Jewish culture to know our roots," he said.

The company is currently booking for 2014. There are seven cruise options, with stops in places such as Italy, Turkey, Spain, Monaco, France, Latvia, Finland and more. Prices range from $6,199 to $10,099, depending on the cruise.

Saul said his company will help with the planning of group trips, tailoring them to the individual group's needs. For example, if a group is planning a cruise for a bar mitzvah, "we can arrange for the actual bar mitzvah and the Maftir to be done off a cruise ship in a port in a synagogue with a rabbi," he said.

Another group trip idea is a family reunion, allowing families to meet on the cruise and discover their own personal history.

"We could go back to their roots," Saul said. But the trip could also show them the area around their native land, such as Scandinavia or other parts of Europe.

It's not limited to Europe either. Saul said many people are surprised at the richness of some of the Jewish history in places in Asia or South America. For example, India has a number of Jews, and although there are many similarities between them and their North American counterparts, there are also many differences.

The two most popular cruises for this kind of trip bring Jews to Scandinavia and Russia, and along the Danube River between Budapest and Prague.

There are seven trip options, with stops in places such as Italy, Turkey, Spain, France and Russia. Pictured is one of the company's featured ships docked in St. Petersburg.

"We have found our clients want to know about Jewish heritage everywhere," Saul said.

Boats are small or medium-sized, with capacities ranging from 700 to 1,200 passengers. Those on a Jewish heritage tour would make up just a small portion of the number of passengers on the boat. Saul said he likes to do these programs with a busload of people – a minimum of 24 passengers and a maximum of 40 per bus.

"We like to keep it small," he said. "There's more camaraderie and it's a much better experience if the group is small."

Although this is the first year for official Jewish heritage tours, the Sauls are tackling the challenge with their many years of experience, including several Jewish heritage cruises organized for individual groups.

The Sauls have been selling cruises since 1998, running a CruiseShipCenters franchise in the north end of Toronto. In their years of experience, they have won numerous awards, including the Eastern Canada Regional Franchise Of The Year and National Franchise Of The Year for the five years from 2002 to 2006.

The business has also received every major award from all the major cruise lines, including Oceania Connoisseur Club for top producers, from its inception in 2006 to present.

The upscale Oceania cruises will make these vacations an unforgettable adventure for the travellers.

Pegasus has a venue to meet everyone's needs

Three unique sites means one is sure to be the perfect wedding fit

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

As soon as a couple gets engaged they receive plenty of well wishes. Then people start asking when they're getting married and where their simchah will take place.

Since there are so many wedding venue options in Toronto, couples have a lot to think about before they decide on a location.

Choosing a wedding venue takes more thought than whether or not the bride and groom like a particular spot. There's a lot more to consider than that. Luckily, Pegasus Hospitality Group (416-385-7705) has three unique venues in Toronto so one of those is sure to meet a couple's needs.

Palais Royale (1601 Lake Shore Blvd. W.) is well known as one of Toronto's premier event venues. With a capacity of 350 for a sit-down dinner and dancing or 800 for cocktails, the recently renovated ballroom overlooks Lake Ontario. Other amenities include a gas fireplace with a large hearth, state-of-the-art sound and lighting as well as plasma TV's, projectors and screens, two custom full service bars and a baby grand piano.

The Grand Luxe (3125 Bayview Ave.) is a luxurious grand ballroom featuring contemporary canvas artwork, custom millwork and chrome accented walls. With more than 6,000-feet of event space, the venue can accommodate 450 people for dinner and dancing and 650 for cocktails.

Let their chefs create a menu that reflects your unique personality.

Casa Loma, Toronto's majestic castle estate, is the third venue in the Pegasus Hospitality Group. Guests will have access to the main floor of the castle including a large ballroom, the library, the conservatory and the outdoor terraces. Casa Loma can accommodate more than 500 people for cocktail receptions or 200 for a sit-down dinner.

Markos Markoulis, director of Pegasus Hospitality Group, says the biggest benefit of hosting your event at one of his venues is the attention you will receive.

"Every event has a team of staff dedicated to it. We focus on each event as if it's our only one – this means no detail goes unnoticed, and our clients always feel like their event is important."

Each event at all three venues is assigned to a wedding co-ordinator who will help with all the event details.

"They will come with you to appointments, and help you make all your decisions. We never want you to feel like you're planning your wedding alone," said Markoulis.

The venues all have an on-site kitchen and menus are customized to each event.

"The most important criteria is that the menu meets your needs and the needs of your guests," said Markoulis.

"Our chefs are good at everything, so we want your menu to reflect your personality and include your favourite foods."

Each site has dedicated pastry chefs who are also available to design wedding cakes.

The venue can supply clients with a wedding band or DJ, or the client is welcome to bring in outside performers at no additional cost. All three locations are accessible by TTC and have free parking.

The Grande Luxe features more than 6,000 feet of event space and can hold 450 people for dinner and dancing.

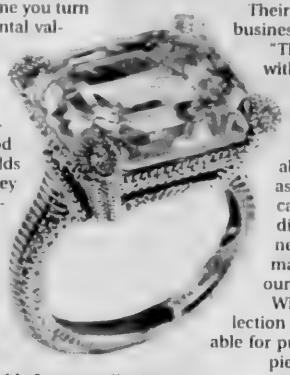
Jewelry holds unique place in women's hearts

Danielle Kubes
Special to The CJN

There's just something about a nice piece of jewelry that makes a woman's heart go aflutter. It's a combination of the aesthetic value – something that catches the light every time you turn your wrist – and the sentimental value – a memento to remember special occasions, such as graduations, birthdays and anniversaries.

Jeff Karadjian and Haigo Derian clearly understood the unique place jewelry holds in a woman's heart when they co-founded Cupido (647-346-2176,) a moderate to mid-priced jewelry and watch store with locations in the Greater Toronto Area.

"Derived from the Latin word for desire, the idea was exactly that – allowing people to have just what they wanted, affordable luxury for both women and men," says Christina Patriarca, Cupido's public relations manager.



Cupido features affordable luxury.

Karadjian and Derian know what women are looking for and are determined to provide it.

"Everyone wants to have something that is unique, something special. We know that sometimes that special something is hard to find," Patriarca says. "It's our job to find you a piece that you will fall in love with." And they mean that.

Their passion for the business is palpable.

"Those who shop with us share in the excitement of the find. We want our customers to be just as excited about the product as we are," Patriarca says. "When we discover something new, we can't wait to make it accessible to our clientele."

With the wide selection of pieces available for purchase, finding a piece to fall in love with shouldn't be a problem. Every year, Karadjian and Derian travel to conventions where they carefully choose which brands to bring back and sell. They look for brands that meet their standards of "quality, aesthetic appeal, comfort and practicality," Patriarca explains.

"Cupido enjoys delivering product that is constantly on trend, new, and exciting, and [offers] pieces that will last," Patriarca says. "We like to think of ourselves as a boutique-like shop where you can find the most interesting pieces."

One of the most popular brands they carry is Pandora. If you look closely at trendy Torontonians, you're sure to see Pandora's charm bracelets dangling off most of their wrists.

"This brand has modernized the charm bracelet concept and focuses on allowing the consumer to customize their own jewelery, and capture memorable moments in their life," Patriarca says.

Another popular brand is Canadian-owned HERA. "[Their] greatest inspirations came from absorbing elements of exotic cultures, the beauty of nature, and the flowing movements of the ocean, which are all reflected in [the] designs," Patriarca says.

They also offer a wide selection of watches and are an official Hermes dealer.

Store has many watch choices.

"Cupido is known for having different products," Patriarca says. "Our customers often tell us they enjoy shopping with us because they know they will find something that is diverse."

Besides Cupido's impressive array of designers, jewelry and watches, it's the focus on customer service that sets it apart from the competition. Karadjian and Derian's main mission is to make the customer content and thoroughly satisfied.

"We pride ourselves on providing a memorable customer experience," Patriarca says.

"We have built many relationships with our customers, sharing in their joys and sorrows. Our goal is ensuring our customers are happy."

Sky's Band wants you to party all night

We follow your lead, bandleader says

Ilan Mester
Special to The CJN

Morris Kast has been performing at weddings across the GTA for the past decade with his group, Sky's Band. However, he isn't interested in selling music – he'd rather sell energy.

"We're a party band," he told The CJN. "People don't pay money to see us. Really what I sell is strictly energy and party music all night long. We don't sell music. If people wanna go see the best musicians, they gotta go see the Toronto Symphony. That's not what I sell. I sell energy – strictly, strictly energy."

Kast may be a veteran when it comes to performing at weddings, but he certainly hasn't lost touch with what's current.

"When you say you've been in the business for over 30 years, people think you're an old fart," he joked. "But that's not true at all because we're right up to date with our music – everything that's current on the radio we learn it."

Kast said versatility is one of the many factors that make his band unique. He wants to see five-year-olds and 105-year-olds up on the same dance floor.

"If somebody wants more of an oldies music, we can play all night long," he said. "If somebody wants current, right-up-to-date music, we can do that all night long. And that's where we're very versatile as opposed to the competition… they seem to please a certain age group and not everybody."

Versatile and up-to-date group gets everyone up on the dance floor.

Another thing that separates Sky's Band from others is that Kast doesn't use set lists. He decides on a song when he gets a feel for the crowd. "The dance floor determines which is the next song that will come up in order to keep people on the dance floor," he said.

Sky's Band started out as a three-person band featuring Kast and his sister, along with a keyboardist. Today, the band can include as many as 10 artists, including percussionists, a saxophonist, a trumpet player and up to four singers.

So what's the secret to getting people up and dancing? Kast said it's not enough to just sing a song – you have to sell it.

"Each crowd, each wedding is totally different from the other," he said. "So, in other words, I could be doing one sibling's wedding on a Saturday night and do the other sibling on the following Sunday. It's the same family, but it would be a totally, totally, totally different wedding."

Sky's Band also caters to the Jewish community. "When we play a horah, it's not like a foreigner trying to play a horah," he said. "It's like a true Jewish horah. And we can play as much or as little as people want."

Kast said there are many advantages to hiring a band versus a DJ for your function. A band plays live, which means the volume can always be controlled.

"I've seen people in functions that I went to with DJs where the volume is so high that the party ends by 10 or 10:30. And people are spending thousands and thousands of dollars on these functions," he said. "It's really a pity when a party ends at 10:30 or the majority of the people leave by 10:30 because the volumes are so astronomically high."

Kast's goal is to make sure people are having fun until the very end of the party – sometimes even later. "Where the Sky's Band is, there's always a party," he said.

Despite having been in the industry for so long, Kast said he can never get enough of weddings. "I still can't wait to do the next wedding because for me, I really enjoy what I do. It's my pleasure to go out and do the next wedding."

It's notoriously difficult to plan birthdays for tweens. Every idea you present them seems to be answered with an eye roll.

They've lost interest in what was fun a few years ago – bowling, pizza and bouncy castles – and what will be enjoyable in a few more years – bars and clubs – just isn't an option.

Enter Glama Gal (905-482-4435.) Started by sisters Laura and Josie Cannone, it's a tween-oriented spa where young people can go and get pampered for bar mitzvahs, birthday parties, and other celebrations. They also offer summer and March break camps, as well as mobile spa and PA day programs.

Parents love it because tweens love it, and it gets them off the hook for party planning.

"We do everything for their party, right from the invitations all the way to the candle on top of the cake," Laura says. "It's the easiest spa birthday party." Parents can even book online.

The entire spa is geared toward young girls, from the bright pink font on the website to the spa menu that reads like a dessert menu: Chocolicious Sweet Sin Facial, Cupcake Sprinkles Manicures, Vanillalicious Hand and Foot Sugar Scrub. And there is also literally dessert available. Clients get a scoop of ice cream or a cupcake during pedicures.

There's also some spa-craft fun as the girls are shown how to create their own take-home products, such as lip glosses and foot scrubs.

The entire experience is geared toward young girls.

The spa offers services for children as young as two, with their "Posh Tot" package, all the way up to adults, with their "VIP Mom and Me" package.

Applause Catering makes food look great and taste fabulous

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

An article published last year in the Journal of Physiology and Behaviour says it's true that people eat with their eyes.

That's why presentation is such an important element in the cuisine prepared by Applause Catering (416-628-9198), the kosher catering company based at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

"If the food doesn't look good, it will never taste good," says Cary Silber, a co-owner of Applause.

If you look at photographs of some of the meals Applause (applausecatering.ca) has prepared, it's clear this caterer is offering haute cuisine. The dishes could easily be featured in any gourmet food magazine.

"When people try our food, they say, 'I can't believe this is kosher,'" Silber says, explaining that well prepared kosher food can rival any gourmet meal.

Silber, a Montreal native with a degree in food science from McGill University, has 35 years of catering experience behind him. His return to Beth Tzedec is somewhat of a homecoming, because he began his catering career in Toronto with Caterers York, which was based out of that synagogue.

Applause, which is three years old, will be marking its second anniversary at Beth Tzedec in January.

"When we took over the kitchen, there were three weddings booked a year. Now Beth Tzedec has over 25 weddings booked."

Applause works out of a number of other Toronto venues, including Palais Royale, Liberty Grand, the Factory, the Warehouse, the Grand Luxe, Casa Loma, the Westin Prince Hotel, Koerner Hall in the Royal Conservatory of Music, and the Arcadian Court at the Hudson's Bay store at Queen and Yonge streets.

Silber describes the food from Applause as "upscale and innovative."

The company goes to great lengths to stay up to date with current food trends, he says. "We go to conferences and food shows so we can find new products and be innovative."

Some of the ingredients Applause chefs have incorporated into their meals include soy, almond and coconut milk. "We use whatever ingredient we can to make a dish as authentic as possible."

They also use soy-based cheeses in their meat-pareve kitchen to make such dishes as pareve eggplant parmesan, pareve macaroni and cheese, and pareve grilled cheese focaccio. "We create these items for luncheons."

Silber stresses that all the food from Applause is prepared from scratch. "All our sauces, soups and dressings are made in-house. We don't buy any ready-made soups or dressings."

The style of the foods and the presentation is restaurant-style. "Each plate is made to order. Each plate is presented and made separately."

'We use whatever ingredient we can to make a dish as authentic as possible'

Some popular main dishes from Applause include Arctic char stuffed with halibut, short beef ribs, prime rib and grilled veal chops, he says. "We customize every menu based on the host's likes and dislikes, budget, and the style of the party."

Tapas, Spanish for small plates, is a very popular style for food stations, says Silber. "We do steamed buns with Mongolian beef that are presented in front of the guests. With the black cod lettuce wraps, the fish is pan fried in front of the guests."

The shwarma station is also very popular for cocktails, he adds.

When it comes to desserts, Applause tries to stay away from cream desserts that taste artificial and oil-based. "I think people are looking for desserts that taste and feel like the real thing.

"For our desserts, we use a pareve chocolate, which to the taste seems like it's milk chocolate. This helps us in achieving our goal of making our desserts as authentic-tasting as possible."

Silber says it's necessary to stay current with the latest food trends. "People are travelling more. They watch the Food Channel. They have more sophisticated tastes.

"We're trying to get our kosher cuisine to emulate the food styles that are shown on the food networks and that are served at high-style fine dining restaurants."

Applause marks its second anniversary at Beth Tzedec Congregation in January.

Lesley's Party Sandwiches serves 'em fresh

Stephen Sweet
Special to The CJN

Lesley Byrne knows how to make a great lunch.

Byrne started up Lesley's Party Sandwiches in her kitchen 20 years ago and it has been running strong ever since.

With great sandwiches and other items available for various functions, Lesley's Party Sandwiches, now in a much larger location, has steadily grown while maintaining a loyal clientele.

"I've always loved food," said Byrne, who thought that catering might be a good idea when she came to Canada a couple of decades ago. "To prepare and cook and bake, I've always enjoyed that."

Lesley's Party Sandwiches, which are also sold at Pusateri's Fine Food stores, are good for many occasions.

"We do [brit milahs,] baby namings, shivas, office lunches, brunches, lots of high teas as well," Byrne said. "We do it all."

And there's a reason why Lesley's Party Sandwiches are so popular.

"It's all made fresh daily," Byrne said. "Everything is fresh and we use the finest quality ingredients."

Byrne couldn't see doing things any other way.

"It's got to be fresh," she said. "That's just the way I run my business. It's got to be fresh for the day you need it and I've always done that."

Byrne's menu extends beyond just sandwiches.

"I do a fabulous teriyaki salmon that's a great hit," Byrne said. "I do fabulous salads too, as well as beautiful blintzes and french toast."

Lesley's Party Sandwiches also does wraps, fruit and vegetable platters, and desserts.

But, as the company name would indicate, one item is ordered above and beyond anything else.

"The party sandwiches are the most popular," Byrne said. "Basically, whatever we do is great."

The reason Byrne can make that claim is because she doesn't over-extend herself.

"There are always new things to look into, [but] I try to keep to what I know best," Byrne said. "Instead of having lots of different things, I just keep it more about lunches and brunches and early dinners, things like that."

The party sandwiches themselves come with the potential for many different options, with around two dozen types to choose from.

"We have all kinds of different fillings," Byrne said. "We have the regular ones, but we also have fig preserve, cheddar and tomato, watercress, cream cheese with dill and (many others)."

Byrne has been making sandwiches and other items in her industrial unit on Glen Cameron Road, near Yonge and Steeles in Thornhill, for the past dozen years, and more recently, she was joined in the business by her daughter, Nicky.

"It's great to be able to work with her and have her with me," Byrne said. "She knows the business."

For Lesley's Party Sandwiches, it's about being fresh, in more than one way.

"I've always enjoyed it and I love the business," Byrne said. "I love being able to come to work every day and be creative."

You can contact Lesley's Party Sandwiches by phone at 905-660-0551 or find them online at www.lesleyspartysandwiches.com.

All sandwiches are made fresh daily from the finest quality ingredients.

The sisters have thought of everything. There is even a service offering pampering to dolls, where little girls can get a "matching mini hairdo and hair accessory for you and your doll".

The sisters developed the business after "a family relative asked us to come up with a new type of kid's birthday party for her similar to my bridal shower," which was spa-themed, Laura says.

"So we decided to have a kids spa party for her. The kids loved it, and Glama Gals was born."

The spa first started off mobile, and the sisters would travel to clients' homes. But eventually the demand just got to be too much, and they decided to open a venue. Now, Cannone says they have performed some 5,000 birthday parties since they opened in 2006.

That's a lot of glittery manicures.

One of the most memorable parties is when they hosted a 40-girl bat mitzvah party.

"We managed to provide manis, facials, makeup and lip gloss to over 40 girls in three hours," Laura says. "It was crazy, and they were beyond happy."

And there's little worry young girls will become too focused on their appearance. The sisters are careful to emphasize that inner beauty is of utmost import. The walls of the spa have a "Glama Gal Oath" where tween guests are reminded of their inner beauty and the Glama Gal motto is "Be Confident! Be Positive! Be YOU!"

The sisters also offer lunchtime workshops in elementary and middle schools where they discuss bullying, and peer pressure.

The future certainly looks bright for these sparkly sisters. They currently have locations in Vaughan, Ajax and Oakville and are planning to opening three more in Toronto, Newmarket and Markham by next year.

Israel helps Philippines relief efforts

Marcy Oster
JTA

Obviously wanting to get back to work as the medical manager of the field hospital set up by the Israel Defence Forces in the Philippines, Lt.-Col. Dr. Ofer Merin spoke hurriedly about the three days his team has been seeing patients in the typhoon-ravaged nation.

He told of at least 12 babies the hospital had delivered – most of them premature – and the stabbing victim who might have died if not for the IDF hospital in Bogo City on Cebu Island, one of the areas hardest hit by last week's Typhoon Haiyan.

By 5 a.m. Sunday, Merin said, at least 50 people had lined up in front of the field hospital to receive treatment.

"If we stayed here two months, or even two years, we would have patient work," he said in a phone call with the media from the Philippines early Sunday morning.

The field hospital began operating last Friday morning, about seven hours after the team arrived on the island. The parents of the first baby delivered by the Israeli team that morning named him Israel in gratitude to the volunteers. Established adjacent to the local hospital in Bogo City, the Israeli field hospital is the only one located in a region of about 250,000 residents. Merin said. Representatives of other countries have visited to view its operation.

The 125-member Israeli team has been seeing about 300 patients a day who were either injured in the typhoon or unable to care for chronic conditions such as heart disease or diabetes because there's no running water or electricity. Others with untreated diseases, including those with advanced cancer, have also made their way to the facility.

Some 22 members of the team are medical doctors, 15 are nurses and the rest are technicians, lab workers and members of the Homefront Command who are co-ordinating logistics.

PQ bans candidates from wearing religious symbols

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

More coverage on pages 6, 26, 28

MONTREAL — The Parti Québécois (PQ) national council adopted a resolution at its convention Nov. 10 that effectively prevents anyone wearing religious symbols from running for the party.

The resolution states that future PQ candidates must make "a solemn declaration" not to wear headgear or accoutrements that identify a religious affiliation.

Premier Pauline Marois said she was "ill at ease" that the originally proposed charter of Quebec values banned religious symbols among public employees, but was silent on those elected to the National Assembly.

Section 38 of Bill 60, introduced on Nov. 7, allows the legislature to establish rules "to govern the wearing of religious symbols by members."

Democratic Institutions Minister Bernard Drainville, who is responsible for the charter, later said the intention is that the National Assembly establish a rule that unanimous consent of members be required before a member wearing overt religious attire be allowed to sit.

The PQ caucus had already adopted a policy promising that members won't wear religious symbols as long as they are in office.

The PQ is inviting other parties to follow suit.

The party's position is at odds with an opinion expressed by Quebec International Relations Minister Jean-François Lisée, who is also responsible for anglophones and the Montreal region, before the charter bill was tabled.

Trustee Resigns

CAMROSE, Alta. — A newly elected school trustee in central Alberta resigned last week after apologizing for racist, sexist and anti-Semitic tweets. In a statement released last week, the Battle River school board said James Andre, 50, resigned as trustee for Flagstaff West. He admitted to sending more than 80 tweets from his since-closed account containing profanity and jokes about blacks, Muslims, Jews, Aboriginals, Mexicans, Asians, women, and gays. Many were retweeted from an account called the Funny Racist. The tweets started last January and continued through the fall vote for the 6,300-student board. One was posted Oct. 21, after he was elected and before he was sworn in, the Edmonton Journal reported.

Museum To Open

WINNIPEG — After years of funding problems, content controversies and construction delays, the Canadian Museum for Human Rights announced it will open Sept. 20, 2014. The museum was proposed more than 10 years ago by the late media mogul Israel Asper. Construction on the $350-million facility, with funding from three levels of government and private donors, began in 2009. The museum has raised $138 million of its $150-million goal from donors, chief fundraiser Gail Asper told the Winnipeg Sun. The facility will be the first national museum outside Ottawa. Some groups objected to plans for a space dedicated to the Holocaust, saying all genocides should be treated equally.

WORLD

Investigation Ends

LONDON — A police investigation into sex abuse allegations against a prominent London rabbi has been dropped. London police said Nov. 15, the Crown wouldn't bring charges against a 54-year-old man regarding allegations of sexual assault, the Jewish Chronicle reported. Several London rabbis have confirmed that the man in question is Rabbi Chaim Halpern, head of the Divrei Chaim synagogue in the heavily Jewish Golders Green area of the capital. He was arrested in February but denied wrongdoing. The Union of Orthodox Hebrew Congregations will have to decide whether to reconvene a special rabbinical court, which was suspended during the police inquiries, to examine his conduct, the Chronicle reported.

Pew Reveals Dramatic Orthodox Growth

NEW YORK — The rate at which America's Orthodox Jewish population is growing – and the non-Orthodox population is shrinking – is more dramatic than previously thought, according to Pew Research Center survey data.

Steven. M. Cohen

In a finding first reported Nov. 12 in the Forward, sociologist Steven M. Cohen, parsed the data from the centre's recent survey of U.S. Jews to show that 27 per cent of Jews under18 live in Orthodox homes versus Jews 18 to 29, of whom only 11 per cent are Orthodox.

Previously published Pew data didn't indicate the proportion of Jewish children in Orthodox homes, the Forward reported, instead suggesting that Orthodox growth was tempered by high drop-out rates.

For every 100 Orthodox Jewish 50-year-olds, there are 230 Orthodox 10-year-olds, Cohen told JTA. Meanwhile, for every 100 non-Orthodox 50-year-olds, there are 70 non-Orthodox 10-year-olds.

"The Orthodox are moving in one direction and the non-Orthodox in the other direction," he said, adding that the shift is "equally a function of birth rate and intermarriage." He noted that Orthodox Jews have far more children on average and intermarry at much lower rates than non-Orthodox Jews.

Hillel creates scrapbook to support terminally ill teen

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

It's a video that has touched almost a million people: 16-year-old Olivia Wise, sitting in her new wheelchair, singing Katy Perry's hit Roar.

"I got the eye of the tiger, a fighter, dancing through the fire," she sings as a smile grows on her face.

And the Toronto teen is indeed a fighter, keeping her spirits up even as she's been fighting an inoperable brain tumour that she discovered early last year after suffering a seizure while on vacation in Florida.

When York University business student Zev Gasner saw the video, his first urge was to help.

"I had this overwhelming sense of indescribable influence," he said. "I wanted to go out and do something for her."

Even Perry herself was moved by the video, replying with one of her own in which she sends her love to Wise.

Gasner said he watched the video over and over for a week, then decided he had to act.

As vice-president of social affairs for York's Hillel chapter, he suggested that the group should send well wishes to the terminally ill teen.

Hillel students decided to put together a physical and video scrapbook to give to her family.

"What's really special about this case was that she's a teenage girl in Toronto," Gasner said. "Everyone could really see themselves in this position, or know someone in this position."

Danielle Miller, Hillel's co-ordinator of Jewish student life at the University of Toronto, echoed that sentiment in explaining why her group joined the initiative.

"She's only two years younger than our first-year students, so this really hit home for them," she said, adding that the fact Wise is Jewish really made them realize that this could be a girl they might know from school or camp.

The idea snowballed as others caught wind of the plan. Gasner invited his brother, a high school student at Yeshivat Or Chaim, to join in the scrapbook and to invite his classmates, along with students at Ulpanot Orot, to take part.

What really happened in Geneva with Iran

Where does the truth lie?

That's the question a lot of journalists are asking these days, even if, as many would argue, it's the primary responsibility of the media to determine what's true.

CBS's flagship investigative program 60 Minutes recently ran afoul of this responsibility – in what's being called its "Benghazi scandal" – when it interviewed, as an apparently credible source, a security contractor who claimed to have witnessed the attack last September on the U.S. consulate in Benghazi in which American ambassador Chris Stevens and three of his staff were killed. When other news outlets pointed out that this source had previously confessed to the FBI that he had not in fact been at the compound, 60 Minutes was forced to admit that they got it wrong, despite the host's assurance that "The most important thing to every person at 60 Minutes is the truth."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On another Middle East-related story, determining the truth has been a different sort of challenge.

When the P5+1/Iran nuclear talks in Geneva were leading to an impasse on Nov. 9, reports circulated that it was French foreign minister Laurent Fabius alone who refused to go along with what U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and others were prepared to concede to Iran for an interim deal limiting Iran's nuclear program in exchange for reduced sanctions.

Fabius himself famously said that France could not play a "fool's game" by yielding too much to Tehran – particularly by allowing Iran to continue work on its heavy-water facility at Arak that could produce plutonium, another path to a nuclear bomb, nor was France prepared to allow Iran to keep its stockpiles of 20 per cent enriched uranium.

On Nov. 9, Hossein Naqavi Hosseini, spokesman for Iran's parliamentary foreign affairs committee, said "the behaviour of the French representative in the nuclear talks shows that France is trying to blackmail" Iran and that "the French government prefers [enacting] the will of Zionist regime," meaning that France is acting as Israel's agent.

Kim Ghattas, the BBC's U.S. State Department correspondent, reported on Nov. 10: "French diplomats have told me in recent years they believed the Obama administration was willing to concede too much, too soon."

Also, on Nov. 10, when the talks with Iran concluded without an agreement, Kerry went on NBC's Meet the Press to deny charges by Israel and the Gulf states that the Americans were prepared to reach a bad deal with Iran. Kerry declared: "We are not blind, and I don't think we're stupid."

The following day, when Kerry was in Abu Dhabi, Mark Landler of the New York Times reported that he "is insisting to allies that the United States will drive a hard bargain with the Iranians and doing his best to dispel rumours [that the Americans are caving in to Iran]."

Landler continued: "The latest round of talks failed, he said, not because of dissent from France, as has been reported, but because the Iranians rejected an offer put on the table by the French, along with the United States, Britain, China, Germany and Russia. 'The French signed off on it. We signed off on it,' Mr. Kerry said. 'There was unity, but Iran couldn't take it.'"

Kerry's remarks prompted Iranian officials to criticize him, but his comments also raised questions about what had actually happened during the Geneva talks. Did the French prevent the Americans from accepting a weak deal or, as Kerry claims, were the parties united against Iran?

For days, reporters ended up with "he said/she said" stories, and no one, it seems, determined which account was accurate.

Why was it so hard for reporters to determine where the truth lies? Did they not dig deeply enough or have sufficient time? Bloggers overwhelmingly credited the French for saving the day while criticizing the Americans for weakness.

This column appears on Nov. 21, just as the next round of the Geneva nuclear talks resumes. As difficult as it may be, we should pay close attention to what's true in the reporting.

The PQ should stand down

Guest Editorial

It's been an inauspicious month for Premier Pauline Marois' minority Parti Québécois (PQ) government.

First it tabled its so-called charter of Quebec values. Bill 60 – whose full, Orwellian name is the "Charter affirming the values of state secularism and religious neutrality and of equality between women and men, and providing a framework for accommodation requests" – seeks to ban public servants, broadly defined, from wearing religious symbols at work.

There's no point sugar-coating the plan. It's exclusionary and reactionary, plain and simple. As many critics have noted, it's a classic case of a solution in search of a problem. There was – and is – little evidence that public servants can't put aside their religious beliefs when doing their jobs.

But as is so often the case with divisive, wedge politics, the charter's true purpose lies elsewhere. Bill 60 sacrifices minority rights in a craven effort to gain a majority and provoke a fight with Ottawa, with the ultimate aim of achieving separation for Quebec.

Hard on the heels of the charter came the party's adoption of a resolution that forbids PQ candidates from wearing religious headgear or symbols. This means that, even if they were to believe in the PQ's goals, hijab-, turban- and kippah-wearers can never represent the party in Quebec's National Assembly.

It's sad to see the PQ, a broad coalition of left-wing social democrats and centrist economic separatists, exploit right-wing bigotry and left-wing secularist fears of religion to score cheap political points. And it's no excuse to say that most Quebecers support the idea.

These tactics aren't in keeping with the party of former PQ premiers René Lévesque and Lucien Bouchard, who both were careful to respect minority rights when they headed the party. Indeed, it's telling that Bouchard was joined by fellow former PQ premiers Bernard Landry and Jacques Parizeau in condemning the charter, especially given the latter's own history of unguarded comments about ethnic groups in Quebec.

As a long-established minority in the province that understands the dangers of persecution, Jews have a duty to confront the charter and the xenophobic tendencies behind it, although it is irresponsible and inaccurate to liken the current situation to Germany in the 1930s, as some have done.

Perhaps the battle is one that's best fought in the places that would be most affected. Thus, kudos are due to Montreal's Jewish General Hospital – now led by Dr. Lawrence Rosenberg, an observant, kippah-wearing Jew – for declaring its intention to fight the charter.

"This bill is flawed and contrary to Quebec's spirit of inclusiveness and tolerance," he said last week. "Since the bill is inherently prejudicial, there is no point in taking advantage of any clause that would grant us temporary, short-term relief. If approved, this offensive legislation would make it extremely difficult for the JGH to function as an exemplary member of Quebec's public health-care system."

If the PQ ultimately wants to fight a third referendum, it should do so on the merits, or lack thereof, of Quebec sovereignty, not by violating religious freedoms.

The Parti Québécois is better than this. It would be best for all Quebecers if it backs down from its divisive strategy, one that's splitting the party and the province.

Dry Bones

KING SOLOMON AND HIS ADVISER

Declaration's main goal is homeland, not democracy

There is much to disagree with in Barbara Landau's letter, titled "Israel must halt settlements in capital" (The CJN, Nov. 14), but I would like to examine only one sentence, which is: "If a peace treaty is not achieved soon, Israel risks losing its status as a democracy, and with that, the support of progressive Jews who cherish the values in Israel's Declaration of Independence."

Although the Israeli Declaration of Independence deals with equality for all, its main objective is the establishment, maintenance and protection of a Jewish state.

Establishing a Jewish homeland, not establishing a democracy, is the number one reason for the existence of Israel. Because of the need to maintain its Jewish nature, it cannot be both universally democratic and Jewish. It must choose.

JSpace and its Jewish progressives have chosen democracy over Judaism. Many of us politically conservative and socially conscious Jews choose protecting our Jewish homeland over ensuring that Israel has a universal democracy.

Areas disputed, not occupied

Letter writer Barbara Landau, a member of JSpace Canada, is most certainly entitled to her point of view as to what steps Israel should take in achieving a peaceful settlement with the Palestinians ("Israel must halt settlements in capital," The CJN, Nov. 14).

She states that settlement expansion in east Jerusalem is an act of provocation and bad faith during peace talks. The fundamental error in her opinion is to state that east Jerusalem, and by extension the West Bank, are occupied territories.

Many scholars have opined that the areas in question are disputed, but certainly not occupied. A spokesperson for any Jewish organization should certainly recognize the important distinction between occupied and disputed.

LET THEM GO...

Ron Arad, Zachary Baumel, Zvi Feldman, Guy Hever, Yehuda Katz

She urges world leaders to take strong positions condemning actions by both Israelis and Palestinians. Please, Landau, there is enough unwarranted condemnation of Israel already without your encouragement.

A Jew is a Jew

I am shocked to read Larry Swern's letter to the editor ("We must not glorify assimilation," The CJN, Nov. 14).

First off, a Jew is a Jew no matter what they say or do. Raising children as Christians doesn't make Ellen Burka no longer Jewish.

Secondly, her story is an amazing one that needs to be told, and kudos to The CJN for publishing it.

Lastly, she didn't choose to be raised as a Christian. She was one of the lucky few that were taken in by a non-Jewish family.

For Swern to judge her for this is shameful.

Remembrance Day is about soldiers

I was lucky enough to attend the rededication ceremony at the Lipa Green Centre on Remembrance Day.

Although this is a minority opinion, I was hoping to hear about the Jewish soldiers that fought, lived or died in the war that Canada participated in – the Jewish soldiers that were captured and killed for being Jewish.

Unfortunately, it became another Holocaust Remembrance day, about the horror of Auschwitz and children that are not alive today.

There was little talk about the soldiers – guys who died in Normandy or served in Italy, the Pacific, Korea and now Afghanistan.

There are many days to remember the horrors of the Holocaust but Remembrance Day is not one of them.

Women of the Wall seeks to reinvent the Kotel

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I recently led a special delegation of 16 rabbis from across North and South America to be with Women of the Wall (WoW) on Rosh Chodesh Kislev for its monthly services at the Kotel, as well as to meet with Knesset members, lobbyists, and the WoW board. Two days after we celebrated the 25th anniversary of WoW at the Kotel with more than 600 women –and with little of the usual chair-throwing, whistle-blowing and cursing that they normally endure monthly – Avigdor Liberman, the former and since reinstated Israeli foreign minister, donned a tallit and celebrated his acquittal at the Kotel.

I was struck by the juxtaposition. For 25 years these pious, multi-denominational, serious women have tried to pray at the Kotel with tallit, tfillin and Torah and have only recently won the tenuous right to the first two, but not the third. But Lieberman can swagger right up to the front and be sure he will be welcome.

In previous months on Rosh Chodesh, busloads of yeshiva girls have been encouraged to jeer, intimidate and, by sheer numbers, push WoW away from the Wall itself into the plaza. We were determined not to let that happen this time, so on Rosh Chodesh Kislev, we arrived an hour early to "stake out" a portion of the women's section. At the last minute, the Bnei Akiva rabbis called off the buses. The few 15-year-olds who did come stood defiantly, yelling and waving fingers at women the age of their mothers with a rudeness I still cannot believe. We tried to be dignified as we sang to their taunts. Soon, WoW participants swelled and filled most of the section, while 20 female police officers made a line of protection around us.

I cannot fully describe the sound of 600 women singing with fervour. From the men's side – unusually sparse that day – a microphone drowned out our voices. But just as we began the Shema, the microphone suddenly went silent. We were stunned to find out that the police had cut the electricity, allowing us to proceed without having to engage in a prayer-shouting match.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein holds up the empty Torah mantle at the special 25th anniversary service at the Kotel on Rosh Chodesh Kislev (Nov. 4).

Unafraid for the first time to don tfillin or tallitot at the Kotel, we held up six empty Torah mantles, symbolizing our desire and our inability to read from a Sefer Torah, since a new order from the rabbi of the Wall gave him ultimate authority over who gets to bring in a Torah scroll.

The most moving moment for me was holding our tallitot over our heads in a "group" aliyah. If you've ever witnessed the priestly blessing done on holidays with hundreds of black-and-white tallitot covering the men, imagine instead tallitot of all colours, silk and lace and rainbow. Words cannot fully do justice to the sight. We were "priests" for the first time in our lives.

I understand those for whom the Western Wall's stones are the only stones that have the weight of tradition. In my dreams, I want a Western Wall where every Jew feels welcome, nurtured and valued. But that Kotel does not exist, and for me the Western Wall stones have been sullied since their "liberation" in 1967.

Women of the Wall now face a critical crossroads. Some believe that if they fight hard enough, women's prayer with tallitot will one day be welcome there. Others know this is not possible, will never be possible, and in the meantime, the right of tallit and tfillin hang on a thin thread.

This latter group, represented by the board of WoW, has agreed to move the monthly service to the southern part of the Western Wall. There you stand above fallen Herodian stones that share the same antiquity as the Western ones, minus the visual optics of being "the" Wall, and the connection to the iconic paratrooper liberation photo of 1967.

Until the government builds a beautiful, appropriate and equal southern site, WoW will continue to fight for space and dignity in the women's section. But if WoW's demands are met – including one entrance for all, visible and equal choice between three sections (men's, women's, mixed), equal funding for all three sections, equal state recognition for all three sections, and authority over the new section ceded to co-ed advisers from all denominations – WoW can have a Rosh Chodesh service with a mechitzah at the southern stones of the Western Wall and all of us will be able to pray without harassment.

Which do we want more: to get what we want, or for the haredim to not get what they want?

Women of the Wall aren't moving from the Kotel. They are moving the Kotel itself. Women of the Wall may go down in history as having reinvented the Kotel. The same imagination that allowed us to envision a woman in a tallit when we had never seen one, a woman leading prayers when we had never heard one, and a female rabbi when we had never met one will get us there. While these southern stones may not be the stones we remember, they will be the stones our grandchildren remember. This will finally be a truly pluralistic Kotel for a truly pluralistic people.

When all the WoW demands are met, the new Kotel will be ready, and those stones will gain a deep sacredness just like the others. We will, to be sure, miss the old Kotel, like immigrants miss the old country. And while Liberman may still be welcome at the old Kotel, I will finally be welcome at the new one.

Rabbi Goldstein will be offering a slideshow and discussion on WoW on Monday, Dec 2, at 8 p.m. at Wolfond Centre, 36 Harbord St. No charge and no RSVP necessary.

A more nuanced sense of remembrance

Jean M. Gerber
in Vancouver

This past summer, we travelled to England for a month's vacation. There were many things that struck us about the English countryside: thatched roofs, castles, stone circles. But one element appeared everywhere, over and over: memorials to war.

For example, a plaque in Salisbury Cathedral was dedicated to a soldier who had died in World War I.

It read: "In proud and unfailing memory to Edward Wyndham Tennant 1st battalion Grenadier Guards, eldest son of Lord and Lady Glenconner, who passed to the fuller life in the battle of the Somme 22nd September 1916 aged 19 years. He gave his earthly life in such manner as he set great store by the honour of his country and his home."

Imagine the pain of his parents when they erected this memorial to their dead son and heir.

Remembrance Day – called Armistice Day when I was in grade school – gives us the opportunity to recall how many have died because of war in the past century, and to reflect on both the triumphs and waste of those wars.

This column will appear between Remembrance Day and Chanukah. Why not continue the theme of remembering?

Chanukah is a great time for kids, who have learned that each night a gift will appear after lighting the chanukiyah and before the latkes.

Chanukah, however, also memorializes the end of another terrible time: thousands died to drive out the Syrian Greeks and re-establish a Jewish nation and temple in Jerusalem. It's difficult to imagine such pain, since the events occurred 2,000 years ago. They have been superseded by even greater losses, including the Land of Israel, until the 20th century – a century that carried its own horrific burden of Jewish suffering.

Let me link the two events, the Great War and its millions dead, and the war of the Hasmoneans against the Syrian Greeks.

First, we understand now that the miracle of the oil was a construct of the rabbis who, coming decades after the rise of the similarly tyrannical Hasmonean dynasty, decided to gloss the military triumph with a sacred idea: consecrated oil miraculously lasting eight days, thereby shifting the reasons for military success from human strength to godly intervention.

Second, history has revealed a much more complex interaction of Jews and Greeks in the Hellenistic age. In his introduction to The First Book of the Maccabees, H.A. Fischel deconstructs that relationship.

He writes: "Wherever Judaism and Hellenism encountered each other under favourable conditions, a fruitful amalgamation soon ensued... Jewish law in its later form, Jewish mysticism in its various shades, the religious philosophy of Philo, the midrash, and the medieval Jewish thinkers – all these are unintelligible without an appreciation of Hellenism. In the first century CE, and possibly earlier, the educated traditional Jew of Palestine included Greek in his studies, and in the Middle Ages, Plato and Aristotle were greatly revered names among Jews.

"The core of the conflict [which led to the war] lay elsewhere: in the cruder forms of Hellenism, in its pagan and secular aspects, and above all in the political ambitions which utilized it."

In other words, the Jews of Palestine had a very complicated and ambivalent attitude towards the Greek ethos. The stumbling governance of the Syrian Greeks managed to inflame a Jewish nationalistic spirit. That revolt led to the installation of the Hasmonean dynasty – with its guerilla tactics and the disarray of Syria at home – and it worked!

Victory led to a positive, if brief, historical event: the reconstruction of a nation and its most visible symbol, the Temple in Jerusalem.

The end was not so good. The successors of the Maccabees soon became like their enemies, and the perushim/rabbis became their opponents. Hence the introduction of a miracle.

Today, memorials to the Great War ring somewhat hollow as we understand its terrible slaughter, often the fault of inept generals bloated with a casual disregard for their own men. Its death toll was dwarfed by World War II.

This is not to say that we should not celebrate with thanksgiving the liberation of the Jewish nation, or recall the bitter lessons of World War I and subsequent conflicts. Not at all. But we should temper these with knowledge of the limits of military victories. Be careful of what you win, I guess. It might come back to haunt you.

One-dimensional views lead to misdiagnoses

Norma Raumel Joseph
in Montreal

As I sit down to write this column, I am at an Israel studies conference. Listening to the various papers and presentations, I'm struck not just by the diversity of topics and scholarly perspectives, but by the relative absence of the usual topic. Significantly, we're not focusing on war or the Palestinian conflict.

Oh, we are talking about Palestinians, but not monolithically, and about that tired and mishandled topic, "the unity of Israel in its conflict with the Arab world."

There is far too much to study, far too much depth and range to always cover the same territory. Israel studies is not about a unified picture, but rather, as Ilan Troen noted, it's about seeing the pixels in the giant picture – the massive number of identifiers and describers that illuminate and locate the vibrant culture and citizenry of the place called Israel.

There are 40 centres or institutes of Israel studies in North America, with more than 12,000 students taking almost 400 courses. What do these numbers tell you? It should signal that there is a lot to learn.

From one aspect our knowledge of the history of the land and the state is shifting in so many ways, as scholars unearth new information and research new understandings, new ways of looking at the material enlighten us.

Economists are probing the business models of Israeli start-up companies and examining the growth of the IT world in Israel. Political scientists are intensely occupied with the structures and efficiencies (or lack thereof) of Israeli systems. Biologists are exploring the shifting sands – quite literally –and the famous desalinization project that has altered many science labs. Linguists are studying the rapid acquisition of multiple languages at varying ages. Sociologists delve into patterns and relationships of communities and immigration policies, as the pressure cooker that is Israel forms one of the best case studies for ethnic absorption, clashing communities and government (mis)management of these issues. Legal theorists have a field day studying the intersection of church and state combined with diverse holdovers of colonial law. Israel is a wonderful research project, a case study for multiple studies, and Israel studies is growing by leaps and bounds.

How can one appreciate the range of scholarship, the excitement of discovery and the chaos of Israel itself if we only rely on media headlines or the usual discourse of the Jewish communal agenda? Both sources use the conflict as a unifying agent and defy the complexity of Israel itself. Yet one-dimensional presentations are inaccurate, they don't help us understand things, and they're boring.

Let me give an example. When my father was near the end of his life and quite ill, the doctors all labelled him as the old man with a heart condition. Of course, they didn't see him as the vibrant father I knew him to be. I accept that. But because they knew him to have a heart condition, they didn't look further into his pain and complaints. They missed his cancer of the spine. He died in agony, unnecessarily. He was a one-dimensional patient to them – misdiagnosed.

When we look at Israel, we need to see way beyond any headline or conflict. We need to see it as a place of both wonder and disorder, a country that managed to take in thousands of immigrants but that mistreated its mizrachi immigrants in unacceptable, ethnocentric ways. Yemenite Jews were forced into labour settlements to become cheap labor for Ashkenazi landowners to replace the Arab workers. Women were discriminated against. They couldn't find work in a state that claimed equality. It's not so easy to see a complex picture, but that's the reality that scholarship enables.

So as I sit and learn, I marvel at those who work in this arena. They're so open to new approaches and new material. They don't rely on old tales or one-dimensional views. Their world is often filled with a cacophony of sounds, not a smooth symphony, and the material they work on is not always appreciated within their institutions. They often go against the grain of the current discourse. But they learn and uncover voices not heard before.

Life in Israel depicted in a three-dimensional way, with all its warts and smiles – this is worth learning about.

Human trafficking not so rare: panel

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Sammy, who immigrated here from the United Kingdom as a young girl, grew up in a middle class home, had lots of friends, played sports and did well in school.

Few people could have predicted that, as a teenager, she would become part of a human trafficking ring.

Sammy told her story at last week's panel on human trafficking, sponsored by National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section. Also on the panel was Thai Truong, a detective in the organized crime bureau, drugs and vice unit for York Regional Police, and Tamara Cherry, a crime reporter for CTV.

Sammy said that in high school, she was confident and independent, "and always attracted to the 'bad boy.' I didn't know the path that would lead me down."

After her boyfriend was arrested, his friend, "Mark," took Sammy out for pizza, and asked her to hold his wallet. When she returned the wallet, he accused her of stealing money and drugs.

"He began punching me, and I admitted it just so he'd leave me alone. He told me I owed him that money, as well as money that my boyfriend owed him. His debt was passed on to me. He told me I had to work as a prostitute to work it off."

He let her go, but after a few days, she was picked up from her home and taken to a downtown hotel. A few men took pictures of her wearing skimpy outfits, and posted the pictures on an online prostitute site.

Eventually, they had her working from 7 a.m. to 4 a.m. for almost two years, and gave her no breaks and no money.

"They also fed me drugs, so I became dependent on them. My family and friends thought I was selling my body to pay for my drug habit."

She eventually escaped, and ended up in hospital, "but I was [afraid and ashamed] and didn't tell anyone I had been trafficked."

She began healing emotionally, she said, after talking to someone from the Ottawa Coalition to End Human Trafficking. "I hope and pray that by [telling my story] I can get the message out that we can prevent human trafficking before it happens."

Truong explained that human trafficking is different from human smuggling. "Smuggling [occurs] when a person comes to a country illegally. It becomes trafficking when the person is forced to work to pay off a debt."

He said that although he is shocked every time he hears about a human trafficking case, "I hear about it over and over again on a daily basis. It happens in our own community, in our own city, across Canada."

The police face a lot of barriers when investigating these cases, he said, because typically, the person is afraid to tell the police.

Even when a victim is free, he said, there are a lot of issues to resolve. "These girls need lots of help. Every victim has a unique set of circumstances, and they need to be dealt with. We have to get the girls back to a healthy state of mind."

Cherry, who wrote a series on human trafficking when she worked for the Toronto Sun, said it scares her to think how easily a trafficking case can start up. "It has been going on for hundreds of years, and nothing has changed. I'm happy that there is a room full of people who want to learn about it."

Second anti-Israel motion passed by student union

U of T Scarborough students endorse IAW

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

The students' union at the University of Toronto's Scarborough campus (UTSC) has voted in favour of a motion to officially endorse Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW), an annual week of events in support of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel that runs simultaneously on campuses around the world.

The motion passed at the Scarborough Campus Student Union (SCSU)'s annual general meeting on Nov. 13. The student union represents 10,000 undergraduate students at UTSC. At the AGM, any student can vote, and any student who cannot attend can have a student vote on their behalf.

In April, the same union passed an endorsement of the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel.

Although Toronto Students for Justice in Palestine (TSJP) have run events on the campus to coincide with IAW, this is the first time that it will run a week of events that is officially endorsed by the student union.

Josh Miller, a member of the Hillel-affiliated UTSC Jewish Student Life who was at the meeting, said he was frustrated with the result of the vote.

"It basically means that our student union is standing in solidarity... and that they agree there is an Israeli apartheid," he said. "As much as they would want to say they support open dialogue, they at the same time are supporting a more disagreeable environment on campus."

His group released a statement condemning the endorsement, saying that it takes no issue with TSJP running IAW, but draws the line at the student union's endorsement, since choosing a side contradicts the union's equity statement.

However, Mitra Fakhrashrafi, an executive member of the TSJP, said the group sought the endorsement to make sure IAW participants aren't reprimanded for their actions as they have been on several Canadian campuses.

In March, for example, Students Against Israeli Apartheid at York University lost its status as an official campus group after organizing a rally that the university deemed disruptive to classes, and one alumnus, Hammam Farah, was banned from York's campus following the event.

In a statement to The CJN, University of Toronto spokesperson Althea Blackburn-Evans said freedom of speech is a core value of the university, and it would not attempt to censor, control, or interfere with any group based on its beliefs or philosophies.

The university is a place where "ideas are exchanged, challenged and debated with mutual respect, tolerance and civility – even when those discussions challenge some of our views," Blackburn-Evans said, noting that the SCSU is independent from the university and thus the motion does not reflect the university's political position.

Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies (FSWC) condemned the motion.

"The passage of this racist resolution at the University of Toronto – Scarborough is a clear declaration of hate and intolerance for Jewish and Israeli students, and an effort to add to the voices calling for the destruction of the Jewish homeland," said FSWC president and CEO Avi Benlolo.

However, Sabrine Azraq, another executive of the TSJP, said that isn't the case.

"Would events aimed at raising awareness of Canada's ethnic cleansing and systematic discrimination toward the indigenous peoples constitute as intolerance toward Canadian students? Of course not," she said.

She added the goal of the week is to bring awareness to the actions of the Israeli government, not to rally against individual Israelis or Jews, and that TSJP has partnered with Jewish groups such Independent Jewish Voices in the past.

Miller said instead of an endorsement of IAW, however, he would have preferred to see the creation of an Israel-Palestine week that would include events that explain the intricacies of the issue.

Although the Jewish group has not yet approached the TSJP with that proposal, Azraq told The CJN she thought it was "a beautiful idea."

Miller explained an event of that kind would allow for discussions of the issues in an environment that is welcoming to all students and supportive of both clubs.

"It would give a chance for all students to interact in a cause they believe in and become more informed on what they want to stand for," he said.

SCSU representatives did not respond to The CJN's requests for comment.

Technion to launch Arabic-language course online

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Among the many calumnies faced by the State of Israel is the claim that it's an apartheid state. In some quarters, that allegation has prompted calls for an academic boycott of Israeli universities and colleges.

Yet on Jan. 3, 2014, the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology, headquartered in Haifa, will launch its first ever "massive online open course," or MOOC, in the Arabic language.

Peretz Lavie

The course on nano-technology will be led by Hossam Haick, a faculty member in the Technion's chemical engineering department who is an Arab.

So far, students from Saudi Arabia, Syria, Abu Dhabi, the Gulf Emirates and even Canada have registered to take the course, said Technion president Peretz Lavie.

Lavie was in Canada last week to meet the school's supporters, help negotiate a pending agreement with Toronto's University Health Network (UHN) on a joint research and development project, and to address audiences in Toronto, Waterloo and Ottawa on the Technion's innovative entrepreneurial agenda.

Lavie said Haick is one of the university's bright stars and an accomplished scientist. He's responsible for developing the Na-nose, a device that analyzes particles exhaled from the nose to diagnoses for diseases, such as cancer.

Over the last few decades, the university has invested heavily into improving the outcome of its Arab students, said Lavie. Funded in large part by Canadian oleh Benny Landa, founder of Indigo Digital Press, the effort has paid off. Ten years ago, only nine per cent of the school's students were Arabs; today that figure stands at 20 per cent. Ten years ago, the dropout rate for Arab students was 47 per cent; today, it's nine per cent, the same as the rest of the student population, he said.

"How can you identify the university as apartheid?" Lavie asked.

The Technion boasts three Nobel laureates – a fourth, Arie Varshar, graduated in 1966 but is now at the University of Southern California – and it plays an important role in training the engineers and entrepreneurs who have turned Israel into an internationally recognized start-up nation, Lavie said.

In December 2011, the Technion partnered with Cornell University to win a bid to establish a new applied science and engineering institution in New York City. Later, Chinese billionaire Li Ka-Shing donated $130 million toward creation of the Technion Guandong Institute of Technology. Since then, "scores of universities" have approached him inquiring about partnerships, Lavie said.

In Toronto, the Technion is close to finalizing an arrangement with the UHN on joint research on stem cells that ultimately will benefit cardiac patients. UHN represents Toronto General Hospital, Princess Margaret Cancer Centre, Toronto Western Hospital and Toronto Rehabilitation Institute, which are all affiliated with the University of Toronto.

The project requires an investment of tens of millions of dollars, but if clinical trials prove successful, "the sky's the limit" as to potential financial benefits, said Lavie.

Canadian Jews raise over $100,000 for Philippines

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Since Typhoon Haiyan hit the Philippines on Nov. 8, the Jewish community has stepped up to help out the devastated country.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto reports that as of Nov. 15, it has raised more than $85,000 since establishing the UJA Philippines Typhoon Relief Fund, with 100 per cent of the money going to support the efforts of IsraAID, the Israel Forum for International Humanitarian Aid, UJA's partner agency.

Steven Shulman, UJA Federation's campaign director, said that in the past, federation has qualified for a program whereby the government matches funds raised for emergency aid, and he expects it will qualify again.

On Nov. 11, a seven-person IsraAID team of Israeli professionals including medical, trauma and relief specialists landed in the Philippines and travelled to Tacloban, a coastal city of 220,000 that was almost destroyed by the typhoon.

Shulman said a second IsraAID team, comprising 15 to 20 medical and trauma personnel, was set to join their colleagues and travel north where a hospital is set up.

"We're looking to send a third team. IsraAID works with local government officials and the United Nations to provide emergency services to those affected. [Our] community has a great reason to be proud. It tells you something about Jewish values," he said.

Shachar Zahavi, founding director of IsraAID, said in a statement that "people are rioting due to the lack of food, clean water and access to health facilities and accommodation. Without health facilities, our first goal is health intervention. After the immediate medical issues are addressed, the next concerns are issues like the influx of people who have become homeless."

Robin Segall, director of programs and marketing for Ve'ahavta – The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, said the agency has raised about $15,000 for its Philippines fund. "Ve'ahavta will be directing funds raised through the Jewish Coalition for Disaster Relief [JCDR], and its response will focus on immediate as well as mid-term needs of the local population.

"As an executive member of the JCDR, Ve'ahavta is able to leverage the funds we raise by pooling our resources with those raised by up to 44 other coalition members across the United States and United Kingdom for maximum collective impact. Jewish organizations work in unison to allocate desperately needed financial resources to trusted, reputable partners engaging in immediate first response on the ground," she said.

In times of crisis, she said, "there is a need for short-term aid delivery as well as a need to manage the long-term painful aftermath. Ve'ahavta has worked closely with the Israel Trauma Coalition [ITC] on previous crises and is in close communication with ITC to determine how we might support their response to Typhoon Haiyan."

Terri Boldman, director of marketing and communications for Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA (JFC-UIA), said that the organization is accepting donations on behalf of the federations in London and Windsor and individual donations from non-federated regional communities. She said that as of Nov. 15 Montreal, has raised $38,000, and Edmonton, Vancouver, Hamilton and JFC-UIA have raised about $60,500.

Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Medical Centre said that it's been called on to send a team of medical personnel to join IDF medical and rescue response team that was dispatched to the Philippines. The selected members all have extensive training in rescue-and-recovery missions within the IDF Medical Corp and were extensively briefed prior to departure for what they can expect upon arrival in the disaster zone.

David Smith, president of Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, said in the release that the money it raises in Canada is being sent to support Shaare Zedek's IDF clinic and to help train and prepare the medical personnel.

In a more local response, at a Toronto bagel restaurant, Bagel World on Wilson Avenue, a group of employees, many of whom are Filipinos, have decided to donate all their tips to the relief fund. Bagel World's owners were touched by the gesture and agreed to match all the proceeds.

An IDF humanitarian mission arrived at Bogo City on Cebu Island last week to assist victims of the typhoon in the Philippines.

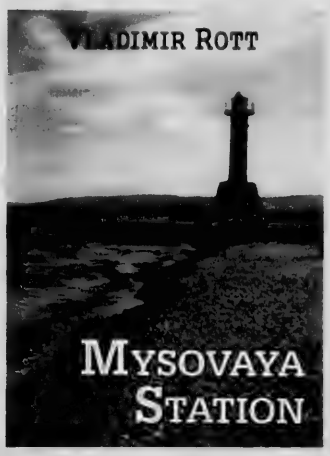
Toronto author helps to restore Siberian Jewish cemetery

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

In 1974, engineer, author and research historian Vladimir Rott defected from Russia and settled in Toronto. Two years later, he was able to liberate his wife Iya and his children "with the help of great Canadians."

Now, 40 years later, he's dedicated to finding the descendants of the small town of Mysovaya in Siberia and restoring the destroyed Jewish cemetery where his wife's family lived for generations.

While the last burial took place in 1937, this abandoned cemetery dates back to 1825. His wife's grandfather, Shlomo



Chaim Guterman, who was a prosperous tinsmith, is buried in the Mysovaya Cemetery.

Mysovaya, which is now called Babushkin, was once a prosperous town with more than 1,600 Jews. It was a bustling camel stop along czarist Russia's Great Tea Road until 1907, when the Trans Siberian Railway was completed, bypassing the town.

As a result, most of the Jews left, as there was no longer any business.

In 2009 and 2010, Rott published two books titled, In Defiance of Fate: Joy of Sadness, and Joy of Discoveries. The books tell of his life in Russia and his father's disappearance in the Gulag as an enemy of the state when Rott was very young. Rott and his entire family were also designated enemies of the state.

"That's why I had to leave," he explained.

His books caught the attention of Taisya Chernykh, a technical librarian who lives in Mysovaya. She contacted Rott and told him that she was very excited to learn that Jews had once lived in the town and that his books had made the town famous.

Chernykh began to research the Jewish community's archives and discovered the remains of the Jewish cemetery. She sent a photograph of the broken gravestones to Rott.

In 2011, the Rotts visited Mysovaya and met with Chernykh. She offered to help work with them to restore the forgotten Jewish cemetery.

On his return to Canada, Rott wrote a book titled Mysovaya Station about his trip to Mysovaya, the Jewish community that had lived in Mysovaya and about finding a cousin, the only Jew in town, who was in a psychiatric facility. Their cousin died shortly after the Rotts returned home.

"When my cousin died, Taisya researched the laws of Jewish burial on the Internet," Rott said. "She did everything to have him buried according to Jewish law."

A TV crew was filming a documentary on the 300th anniversary of the Tea Road. They met with Chernykh to research the area. They were also intrigued to discover that Jews once lived in their town. Rott was interviewed for the anniversary special.

Rott began working closely with Chernykh, raising money for a dedication memorial to those who had been buried in the Mysovaya Cemetery. The surviving tombstones are lying broken on the ground and many were stolen. The remnants of the scattered gravestones outside the cemetery are being collected.

Rott has been deciphering the remains of the Russian letters on the tombstone, and Gary Kipper, the ba'al koreh of the Torah Emeth Congregation, where the Rotts are members, is restoring the Hebrew.

To date, they have discovered 44 names. These names will be inscribed on an eight-foot high black granite Shalom Memorial, in the shape of the Hebrew letter shin, signifying shalom.

The stone has already been mounted and the names of those buried there will be inscribed before the official dedication in the spring, after the harsh Siberian winter, Rott said.

"I hope other descendants will come forward with names to be inscribed on the stone," he told The CJN. "My father never had a proper burial in the gulag. I want to keep the memory of those buried in Mysovaya kept alive. Why should these poor souls be forgotten?"

If you have any information on someone who was buried in Mysovaya or would like to make a donation to the campaign to complete the memorial, please contact Vladimir Rott at rott@sympatico.ca, 416-782-3175 or taya2109@yandex.ru.

Diab extradition case hinges on handwriting analyses

Monique Elliot
Special to The CJN

OTTAWA — The curve and style of a few words are again the focus in the extradition appeal of an Ottawa professor suspected by French authorities of a bombing outside a Paris synagogue in 1980.

In arguments heard in Ontario's Court of Appeal on Nov. 4 and 5, lawyers for Hassan Diab challenged an expert who said Diab's handwriting could be the same as the writing identified to be that of the suspected bomber, who killed four people and injured dozens of others.

French handwriting expert Anne Bisotti and Canadian Crown attorneys defended the handwriting analysis, which concluded that Diab signed a hotel registration card using an alias at the time of the attack.

Diab's lawyers brought in three of their own experts to challenge Bisotti's analysis, arguing that it's unreliable and did not use established procedures to forensically examine handwriting.

The panel of three appeal judges challenged the defence to show why the opinion of their three experts should be considered more reliable than the French expert.

The comparison between Diab's writing and that of the suspected bomber was the reasoning Justice Robert Maranger used to commit Diab for extradition in June 2011, while acknowledging the case against him was weak and that it was unlikely Diab would be convicted, assuming he got a fair trial in France.

The case against Diab has relied heavily on the handwriting analysis and additional publicly unverified intelligence that will not be shared with his defence lawyers, the Crown prosecutor, the judge who presided over Diab's extradition hearing, nor the French examining magistrate.

The defence considers the handwriting analysis to be flawed after the French withdrew discredited analyses from two experts after it was shown the comparison sample they had was not Diab's writing. Bisotti's analysis has replaced the discredited reports.

Longtime Diab supporter Donald Pratt travelled from California to be in the Toronto courtroom to hear the arguments.

Pratt echoed defence lawyer Marlys Edwardh's argument to the court that the extradition process should not be a "rubber stamp" for the sake of diplomacy.

"It [should be] more of a meaningful opportunity for the person sought to exercise at least minimal charter rights," Pratt added.

Diab has maintained his innocence throughout the extradition process.

"I've always found him to be fair-minded and view bigotry with a repugnancy," said Pratt, who attended graduate school with Diab at Syracuse University in the 1980s.

"He's always shown himself to be a peaceful person, not someone who's shown himself to be inclined toward any kind of violence."

Diab's lawyers are appealing the decision to extradite him to France for questioning.

French authorities requested Diab's extradition in 2008 for questioning based on allegations of his involvement in the attack. The allegations are based on intelligence of unknown origin.

Diab was arrested in November 2008 by the RCMP and was initially denied bail. He was freed on bail after more than four months spent in detention, and now wears an electronic ankle bracelet.

Though he is currently only being sought for questioning by authorities, his lawyers and human rights groups say Diab would not face a fair trial in France, since he would be unable to defend himself against the secret intelligence evidence in a French court.

A ruling in the appeal could take months.

"It's very hard to read the court," Pratt said. "It's probably going to be a long process from start to finish, however you define that."

JUMP gets larger home

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

The Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) is making some big changes, including cutting half its staff and moving from its mid-town Yonge Street location to a much bigger space on Avenue Road north of Bloor Street.

The Dec. 1 move is part of an effort to cut costs at the organization, which runs programming for Jewish young adults.

By working with developer Mark Mandelbaum of Lanterra Developments, JUMP has been able to save money while at the same time moving to a larger space near upscale Yorkville, said Rabbi Joel Wardinger, JUMP's director of education.

The new space is 3,100 square feet, compared to the current location's 1,800 square feet.

"By assuming a more urban location and perspective, [Mandelbaum said he] would get behind our work as an investor," Rabbi Wardinger said. "It's an opportunity that is positioning us to open up our further engagement with donors, local donors, to allow us to have a sustainable base."

The rabbi said the changes will make the six-year-old organization bigger and more relevant to young Jews.

"We would like to continue, enhance and ramp up the work we've been doing," he said, explaining that he hopes JUMP will eventually be able to host weekly Shabbat dinners – they're currently monthly – and have much more programming happening in JUMP's space.

In a statement sent out to JUMP's mailing list, Rabbi Wardinger said the organization has achieved many milestones over its six years in operation, including serving some 6,000 Shabbat dinners and offering 1,200 programs.

An average of 400 people come through the centre each month, he told The CJN, but he said in the statement that JUMP is reorganizing due to what he called "a mix of new challenges and opportunities."

The statement also alluded to "key personnel changes" – referring to the departure of director of strategic development Alana Kayfetz and director of programs and trips Shlomo Buzaglo.

Kayfetz said she's still working with JUMP as a consultant on an upcoming event, a Chanukah party at the Britt – the former Sutton Place hotel, which has been turned into a condominium building by Mandelbaum's company – but she's no longer a JUMP employee.

She said she's confident about the direction of the organization, including its relocation to a new physical space.

"It's the right move, and I am so excited to take my career to the next level," she said. "JUMP gave me some amazing opportunities to create real Jewish community engagement pieces, and I look forward to its continued successes."

Buzaglo declined to comment to The CJN on the changes or his departure.

In addition to the two staff cuts, Rabbi Wardinger said JUMP has added a "consultant on ongoing upper-admin and strategy" who would prefer to remain anonymous.

Rabbi Wardinger said he's confident about JUMP's future, because although, like other organizations, he works hard to get people out to events, he said JUMP is a known commodity in the market and people are interesting in its programming.

"I think that this place is so relevant to the future of Jewish life and I think… building it along with community partnerships is an answer to a lot of the concerns we have generally in the Jewish communal continuity questions," he said.

German commander's son embraces Judaism

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Anyone who has ever made the difficult, life-changing decision to convert to Judaism has his or her own story to tell. But perhaps none is more dramatic than the one behind Bernd Wollschlaeger's conversion.

Wollschlaeger's father, Arthur, was a highly decorated German army tank commander in World War II who was awarded the Knight's Cross – the highest honour given by Nazi Germany to soldiers for their military leadership – by Adolf Hitler himself.

It was Wollschlaeger's discovery of his father's involvement in the persecution of German Jews during the Holocaust that led him to ultimately turn away from him, and toward the Jewish faith.

"As a child... I idolized my father, and my father meant a lot to me. We spent a lot of time together, until I asked questions out of curiosity about his family and his past," said the 55-year-old Wollschlaeger in a phone interview with The CJN hours before he shared his story at Chabad of Markham on Nov. 12.

"All he told me was that there was a war, it interrupted everything, caused tremendous harm, that I don't have any grandparents because of the war and that was it," he said.

The turning point in Wollschlaeger's relationship with his father happened in 1972 when he was 14, and when Munich hosted the summer Olympic Games, during which Palestinian terrorists murdered Israeli athletes.

He said the massacre initiated a national discussion about the fact Jews were killed on German soil again, and the media reviewed the role of Germany during World War II and of course, the Holocaust.

Wollschlaeger said that until that point, he knew nothing about the Holocaust. In school, when taught about the war, they were told that six million Jews were killed among 80 million other people who perished in the war.

"It was regarded as collateral damage of the war, and not framed in the unique context of systematic murder of Jewish people as German policy, by the German government, elected by the German people," he said.

"That led me to confront my father, to find out what he knew about it. He denied the existence of the Holocaust, denied that it ever happened, or that he had any knowledge about it."

Wollschlaeger said he later found out the truth: that his father had not only known about the persecution of Jews, but had been part of a unit that participated in a human shield operation that killed about 200 civilians.

"Of course they knew it, they did it and that led me to turn away from my father in disgust."

It also caused him to turn toward the very people his father despised.

"I was searching for answers, why these people? Why the Jews? What makes them unique that you would single them out to kill them? I didn't understand it."

Following a trip to Israel when he was 18 "to discover what it means to be Jewish in a Jewish country," Wollschlaeger returned to his hometown of Bamberg and approached the small Jewish community there to learn about their culture and traditions.

"They accepted me as a Shabbos goy... over the course of seven years, I transformed from having an interest in learning intellectually to an emotional connection and then spiritual connection and finally a religious conversion," he said.

Although difficult because it meant that he'd be tearing himself away from a family that didn't understand his choice, Wollschlaeger said he embraced the idea of becoming a Jew and moved to Israel in 1987.

He lived on a kibbutz where he studied Hebrew and worked and served in the Israeli army, first in a hospital for a year to obtain his Israeli medical license and then in the military as a medical officer.

Upon starting his new life in Israel, Wollschlaeger chose to not to tell anyone, including his wife whom he met and married in Israel – about his family history and his conversion.

"I wanted to keep it as low-key as possible, because I felt embarrassed. I became Jewish, but I had such a family history where it was hard to believe that you can be the son of a father who represented exactly the antithesis that Israel stands for... I couldn't reconcile that at that point."

It was this decision to keep the details of his family history from his first wife – with whom he fathered two children and moved to Miami in 1991 – that ultimately led to the end of their marriage. He has since remarried and had a third child.

Wollschlaeger, who has been sharing his story with the public since 2007 and has even published his memoirs called A German Life: Against All Odds, Change is Possible, said it was his own son who inspired him to share his story when he began asking questions about his family history.

"I knew that if I concealed that from him, I might lose a long-term connection with him, so I told him when he was 14."

But Wollschlaeger's conversion to Judaism and his mission to speak out about his experience is not how this story ends.

Growing up, Wollschlaeger suspected that his mother might have been concealing a family secret of her own.

"She had knowledge about Jewish rituals. I thought it may be due to the fact that she lived in and grew up in Czechoslovakia and it had a large Jewish population... but she had some knowledge about Jewish rituals, even though she was a devout Catholic, and that puzzled me," he said.

Following up on a suspicion that his mother had Jewish ancestors, he did some genetic testing that revealed his maternal family line might have been connected to the Marrano Jews of Northern Spain and France.

"I never knew this, nor did it motivate me [to convert], but now, of course, it's curious and may be very revealing."

Wollschlaeger said he hoped that through his lecture at Chabad Markham, he would help people understand "that individuals can make a choice, can change a life, face issues that affect all of us... and that you're not doomed to make the same mistakes that you've been taught to repeat.

"What I've learned is that people are not inherently bad or good... There are many shades of grey."

1,000 pages in scrapbook

Meanwhile, someone else brought students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto into the loop.

As word spread, students from a number of high schools – not just Jewish ones – sent in scrapbook pages.

Laura Greenfield was one of the U of T participants. She can be seen in the scrapbook holding a sign telling Wise to keep on singing and being a positive inspiration.

"Even through I've heard her condition is getting progressively worse, she still has a positive attitude and that's amazing," Greenfield said.

Wise's cousin, Jeff Kassel, told CNN her condition has deteriorated since she made her video in early September, and she's now drifting in and out of consciousness.

In total, some 1,000 pages have been included in the scrapbook.

As well, Wise's family has set up a fund in her honour through SickKids Foundation to collect donations for brain tumour research. The initial goal of $50,000 was quickly surpassed, so her family raised it to $150,000. To donate, visit bit.ly/LivWiseFund.

Miller said situations like this are difficult, because you want to help, but you might not be able to do much.

"Other than support and love... it's kind of hard to do much else," Miller said, adding, however, that people can certainly make financial contributions.

But Gasner said the ultimate goal of the initiative was to show her family how much she has inspired others.

He noted that participants were mostly people who have never met Wise, but were touched by her voice and her story.

"It showed her family how much support is out here for them," he said.

CIJA denounces PQ resolution as exclusionary

He said that public employees should appear religiously neutral because they represent the state, but MNAs need not be because they represent the people who elected them.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) denounced the resolution as exclusionary and a break with the tolerance that characterized the PQ's early history.

"This resolution is a disavowal of the principles of inclusiveness upon which René Lévesque built the PQ," said Jonathan Kalles, CIJA's associate director for government relations in Quebec.

"It sends a troubling message that practising Jews and members of other visible minority faiths are unwelcome in the PQ."

He believes the PQ is "cynically" hoping to build popular support for Section 38 of Bill 60.

"Unsurprisingly, no PQ MNA has ever worn a religious symbol. Just like the charter itself, this resolution seeks to resolve a non-existent problem," Kalles said.

"It is deeply offensive for the PQ to claim that a religious symbol compromises the neutrality and integrity of an elected official or any public employee," Kalles said.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz, spiritual leader of Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem, excoriated the PQ decision in an article posted on FaithBlender.com and reprinted in this week's CJN.

"Pauline Marois has now made it clear: as a kippah-wearing Jew, I don't belong in the PQ. Well, I'm glad to be excluded. I'd never want to be part of a party that shamelessly undermines rights and courts bigots; I'd never want to be part of a party that will trample on democracy in order to further its political goals," he writes.

FaithBlender.com is a website shared by Rabbi Steinmetz, Catholic priest Father John Walsh, and Muslim Imam Ziyad Delic to offer their perspectives as religious leaders on current issues.

Canadians address Knesset committee

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The Knesset's aliyah, absorption and Diaspora relations committee has been faced with some pretty weighty issues as of late.

In the wake of the release of the Pew Research Center's findings on the assimilation of American Jews, it held hearings on the internal challenges facing Jewish communities, and last week, it heard from Diaspora communities confronting the external challenges of growing anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism.

Representatives of communities in Australia, Belgium, Croatia, France, Hungary, Latvia, Serbia and the United States addressed the committee, including a delegation from Canada representing the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and local federations.

Joel Reitman, right, co-chair of the Toronto Local Partner Committee of CIJA and the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, with Yoel Razvozov, chair of the Knesset Committee on Aliyah, Absorption and Diaspora Affairs. [CIJA photo]

Speaking to the Knesset committee, Joel Reitman described efforts undertaken in Canada to boost Israel's image while addressing the country's opponents in the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) and anti-Zionist movements.

Reitman, co-chair of the Toronto local partner committee of CIJA and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, said the community's "Shared Values" advocacy approach has proven successful, as reflected in Canada's "unwavering support for the Jewish state in forums like the United Nations and the G8.

"Shared Values is about tailoring our message to the interests and world view of our target audience – non-Jewish Canadians in positions of influence. By emphasizing the values Israelis and Canadians share – freedom, pluralism, family and democracy – we open the door to discussing more substantive pro-Israel messages, [which] we would never be able to convey if we didn't first humanize Israelis," he said.

(The signature ad in CIJA's "Size Doesn't Matter" campaign features two attractive young people in an intimate setting. It garnered more than one million hits, along with many subsequent visits to the advocacy website, where information about Israeli culture and politics was offered.)

Reitman told the parliamentarians that "we have worked to ensure that support for Israel in Canada transcends party lines and reflects no single political ideology. It is widely known that Prime Minister [Stephen] Harper and the Conservative Party of Canada are strong supporters of Israel. But Canada's left-of-centre parties have shown extraordinary support for the Jewish state too. On all the important issues – including increasing Iranian sanctions and disavowing BDS – Canada's Liberal and labour parties have been remarkably supportive of Israel."

Reitman said CIJA supports bilateral ties at the grassroots levels, particularly in academia and business. That broadens the stakeholders involved in the bilateral relationship, "in effect insulating support for Israel from the vagaries of political developments," he said.

CIJA has countered BDS efforts by encouraging "BUYcotts" of Israeli merchandise, creating "a direct incentive for Canadian businesses to seek Israeli products."

In addition to addressing the Knesset committee, CIJA and federation representatives also met with counterparts from other Diaspora communities.

"Whether it's fear of wearing a kippah in public, efforts to outlaw kosher slaughter or to ban circumcision, or attempts like those we see in Canada and elsewhere to make expression of support for Israel into a source of shame, my meetings with the leaders of the European communities made it clear that we face similar challenges to our ability to live fully and confidently as Jews," said Sara Saber-Freedman, executive vice-president of CIJA.

"European delegates see the Canadian Jewish community as an important strategic ally and source of moral support. The educational and advocacy strategies that work in Canada are seen as having potential benefits in Europe. I was touched by the warm reception our delegation received, especially from representatives of the Jewish communities of Belgium, France, and Spain," she said.

Reitman and Saber-Freedman were joined by Linda Kislowicz, CEO of Jewish Federations of Canada – UIA; Howard English, vice-president of CIJA for the Toronto region; and David Weinberg, director of CIJA's Israel office.

Parliamentary committee calls for recognition of Jewish refugees

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Dean Allison has long been familiar with various aspects of Jewish history; he knew the Jewish people had been persecuted and he knew that following the creation of the State of Israel, a Palestinian refugee population had arisen.

But he was "totally surprised" to learn that large numbers of Jews had been made refugees from Arab lands as well.

"I didn't understand the depth and breadth of it," said Allison, a Niagara-area MP who chairs the House of Commons standing committee on foreign affairs and international development. Last week, the committee tabled in the House a report titled Recognizing Jewish Refugees From the Middle East and North Africa.

In hearings that began last May, the committee heard from Jewish refugees, advocacy groups and experts on the expulsion of 850,000 Jews from Arab lands in the Middle East and North Africa, beginning in 1948.

"One of the main messages to emerge from the committee's hearings is that two refugee populations were created by the Arab-Israeli conflict: one Palestinian and one Jewish," the report stated.

"The committee was told of the rich Jewish heritage in the Middle East and North Africa, which had existed for approximately 2,500 years. However, those communities have for the most part been displaced since 1948.

"Jewish people living in these [10 Arab] nations left as a result of discrimination, intimidation and fear."

Allison said the witnesses who spoke before the committee "wanted acknowledgment that this happened."

The committee's findings and recommendations help "balance the narrative," he added.

The committee recommended that:

• The government "officially recognize the experience of Jewish refugees who were displaced from states in the Middle East and North Africa after 1948";

• The government "encourage the direct negotiating parties to take into account all refugee populations as part of any just and comprehensive resolution to the Israeli-Palestinian and Arab-Israeli conflict."

Shimon Fogel

In a supplement to the main report, the New Democratic Party stated its support for the first recommendation only.

Stanley Urman, executive vice-president of Justice for Jews from Arab Countries (JJAC), said the committee findings make Canada the second country after the United States to recognize the rights of Jewish refugees.

"It's a significant recognition, and we hope it will encourage other countries that have provided safe havens for Jews fleeing Arab countries to do likewise," he said.

Urman, who testified at the hearings, urged the federal government to adopt the committee's recommendations.

The Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which also gave evidence to the committee, called the report "ground-breaking and multi-partisan."

"Peace and reconciliation cannot be achieved without mutual understanding, including recognition of the historic suffering of Jewish and Arab refugees alike," said CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel. "While Canada's current policy on the Middle East acknowledges the plight of Arab refugees, it makes no mention of nearly one million Jews forced to flee Arab countries in the years after Israel's founding.

"For years, CIJA has raised this as a key shortcoming in Canada's standing policy toward the Arab-Israeli conflict. We are hopeful that the federal government will quickly enact the committee's recommendations, and ensure that Canadian policy reflects a fair, accurate, and complete account of the history of Middle Eastern refugees."

Sylvain Abitbol, the Moroccan-born co-president of JJAC, said, "The effort to ensure that Canada recognizes Jewish refugees is the lead initiative in an international campaign, and we are gratified that Canadian parliamentarians have been receptive to this important cause. For those of us who were personally impacted by the Jewish exodus from Arab countries, it is a matter of justice that any future peace accord acknowledges this painful – and widely neglected – chapter of the Arab-Israeli conflict."

As part of its campaign on behalf of Jewish refugees, JJAC will co-host a symposium on the issue at the United Nations on Nov. 21, in partnership with the World Jewish Congress and Israel's UN mission.

NDP govt. would be Mideast player: Mulcair

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Under a New Democratic Party government Canada would again play an active role in the Middle East peace process, said party leader Thomas Mulcair, who lambasted the current Conservative government for allowing this country to lose its once respected stature in international affairs.

"Canada is absolutely nowhere, we are not players. Our voice could count for a lot," Mulcair said during a public event at the Gelber Conference Centre Nov. 12, organized by the Montreal Friends of Peace Now and the Labour Zionist History Circle.

"Stephen Harper says he is a steadfast ally [of Israel], but what do allies do, if not take part in the process?

"Working for peace means working with countries that don't necessarily agree with us. That's the essence of diplomacy. We [an NDP government] are going to be at the table… and not just harp on the sidelines."

The NDP's policy on the Israeli-Palestinian conflict favours a two-state solution arrived at through mutual negotiation and resulting in borders that allow each of the peoples to live in peace, he said.

"Everyone in the NDP agrees on that," Mulcair said, speaking without text or notes and taking written questions from the audience. He acknowledged that there have been "attempts within the party to chip away [at that position], but they have gotten nowhere."

Mulcair said his caucus is "100 per cent" in support of that policy, and it is what the NDP will take into the 2015 federal election.

Mulcair described himself as "a friend of Israel under all circumstances" – a stance he said he has been reproached for, although he did not say by whom.

"But that is not to say that I don't see problems or that things could be done better," he said.

Mulcair said his "heartfelt and honestly held" view is that there must be an "inviolable homeland for Jews in the Middle East… Creating a homeland for the Jews is one of the noblest things the world community was able to accomplish since the war."

In response to a question, Mulcair said he came to that belief because his wife, Catherine Pinhas, is Sephardi and the daughter of Holocaust survivors.

However, accusing the Palestinian leadership of a "cycle of rejectionism," as a "lobby" charged [an apparent reference to a July 29 statement by Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs president David Koschitzky upon the renewal of Israeli-Palestinian peace talks] is not helpful, Mulcair indicated.

He also took to task Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's assertion that the international community is too soft on the Palestinians, made on Nov. 10 at the General Assembly of North American Jewish Federations in Jerusalem.

"What purpose does that have?… What is he hoping to accomplish?" Mulcair asked.

And building new Jewish settlements "clearly doesn't help, it's playing with fire," Mulcair said. He congratulated the United States for "not taking the bait" and allowing the Israeli government's move to derail the peace talks.

Mulcair said the NDP sees "the slight upgrade" of the Palestinian Authority's standing at the United Nations as "a positive step" and preferable "to other options" that might be outside international law.

He agreed with a questioner that the UN's regularly "singling out Israel as a pariah" is wrong, "but you can't get change if you criticize from the outside."

Mulcair rejected the boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against Israel, saying it is "exactly the wrong direction we should be going in."

Accusing Israel of apartheid also "serves no purpose."

As for a "one-state solution," Mulcair asked, "What does that mean? I've never received a clear answer," then continued: "Anyone who proposes a one-state solution for Israelis and Palestinians has been asleep for 60 years. It's not a realistic solution, it's not going to happen. It would mean invariably the death of the State of Israel… It's just another way of saying Israel does not have the right to exist."

Mulcair deplored the adversarial attitude the Harper government has taken with the United Nations.

"There is a lot that is negative about its structure and what has happened, but the UN is the only game in town. It's what was built out of the ashes of World War II," he said. "We don't get to play if we are in attack mode.

"With Harper, everything is black and white – we are right and everyone else is wrong… It doesn't matter what we do, we're serving a higher cause."

This attitude has been particularly detrimental to advancing the Mideast peace process, Mulcair believes.

"The tone is, there is no discussion, no debate, no analysis, nothing is open," he said.

Mulcair lauded U.S. President Barack Obama and Secretary of State John Kerry for the leadership they are showing in getting negotiations restarted.

Neither Israelis nor Palestinians should add new issues, particularly historic injustices, once the framework for negotiations has been established, Mulcair said. "There is always something that can be added… always one more roadblock… to getting a result."

Vancouver's first Jewish cemetery gets facelift

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — A crowd of 150 gathered at Vancouver's first Jewish cemetery, Mountain View, last month to witness the rededication of 147 previously unmarked graves, each of which was given a marker to indicate who is buried beneath them.

This forgotten Jewish cemetery forms part of a larger, 106-acre cemetery operated by the City of Vancouver and contains 450 Jewish graves dating back to 1892.

Some of them belong to notable pioneers in the community, such as Zebulon Franks, who arrived in Vancouver from Russia in 1887 and is regarded as the first leader of the Orthodox Jewish community. The family of Simon Petersky, president of Vancouver's Reform congregation, Temple Emanu-El, is interred at Mountain View, as is Abraham Nemetz, whose grandson Nathan Nemetz became the chief justice of British Columbia's court of appeal and a chancellor at the University of British Columbia.

Shirley Barnett, another one of Abraham's grandchildren, was the driving force behind this restoration project. A year ago, she approached the Schara Tzedeck Cemetery board, assembled a project team and started garnering support for the clean-up.

"I liked the setting. I have done a lot of projects in the Jewish community, and I thought I would like to do this," she said.

The rededication of the Mountain View Jewish cemetery last month drew a crowd of 150 to the site on Fraser and 37th streets.

Among her team members is Vancouverite Norman Franks, who has four family members interred at Mountain View.

"The cemetery is a diamond in the rough," he said. "With the proper landscaping, hedging, paths throughout and headstones cleaned, it's going to be a jewel in our community."

When it's completed, the restoration project will include rejuvenating the hedge that separates the Jewish cemetery from the rest of the graves, cleaning the headstones, adding a washing station for ritual hand-washing, adding benches, redoing the pathways and restoring the gates to their original artistic and historical significance.

The work comes with a $500,000 price tag and will likely take between two to three years, said project administrator Myra Adirim.

The professionals involved include renowned landscape architect Cornelia Oberlander, JB Newall Memorials and Bill Pechet Design Studio.

The Oct. 20 rededication ceremony, conducted by Rabbi Andrew Rosenblatt, was an important moment, Adirim said.

"This cemetery holds the key to a lot of the Jewish history that began in Vancouver," she explained.

"A lot of notable people are buried there and they're the ones responsible for our Jewish life now, today."

Between the Schara Tzedeck Cemetery board and Mountain View Cemetery, the records of all the people buried at the cemetery remain intact, including that of Otto E. Bond, the first Jew to be interred there on Dec. 19, 1892. Until last month, his grave was unmarked.

"The people buried there are basically the pioneers in our Jewish community," Franks said.

"It's important to pay respect to them. And we were so impressed by the numbers that turned out to mark the rededication."

In 1891, Mayor David Oppenheimer granted a reserved section of land at Mountain View cemetery to the Jewish community. It was consecrated in 1892, but after a new Jewish cemetery opened in New Westminster in 1926, the Jewish section of Mountain View went into decline. Today, a few remaining vacant plots at Mountain View Jewish Cemetery are reserved for future interment.

The cemetery constitutes part of the Jewish Historical Society's walking tour.

Thanks, Pauline Marois, for excluding me from PQ

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz

Comment

The Parti Québécois took an important step at its convention earlier this month when it decided that candidates for the PQ can no longer wear visible religious symbols. This new policy helped clarify an issue that has arisen in the PQ's past roughly zero times. But the PQ felt it was important to institute this rule as a gesture, to explain how serious they are about their proposed "Charter Affirming The Values Of Secularism And The Religious Neutrality Of The State, As Well As The Equality Of Men And Women, And The Framing Of Accommodation Requests" (or "Charter of Values," for short).

This means that if I wanted to run for the PQ, I could no longer wear my kippah. The PQ feels that public officials shouldn't display religious symbols, because it would compromise their neutrality. But one wonders: what does neutrality mean? Why not apply neutrality to other forms of expression? Will they allow someone running for the PQ to wear a Montreal Canadiens jersey? Perhaps there's a diehard former Québec Nordiques fan who roots for the Colorado Avalanche who will be intimidated by the jersey. And who knows, there may be some hockey fans in Gatineau who root for a non-Quebec team like the Ottawa Senators? Perhaps the PQ should order candidates not to wear regional baseball caps, with names such as Montreal or Heroúxville written on them. After all, by showing favoritism to one region, they are losing their neutrality!

Apologists for the Charter of Values will counter that religion is different than sports or regional interests. To them, religion is uniquely divisive, and, therefore, must be completely hidden in the public sphere. After all, wars are fought over religion. But then again, most wars are motivated by nationalism. Does this mean that nationalism isn't kosher? Should we remove nationalism from the public sphere? (Last I looked, the PQ was a nationalist party.)

Actually, experience shows that rather than being divisive, full freedom of expression brings about true tolerance. Just to the south of us is a deeply religious country, the United States. In it, people of multiple religions work together, and many of them wear their religious symbols proudly. And yet, despite these shocking displays of kippahs, turbans and hijabs, even in the public service, the United States does a better job than Quebec in ensuring that people of different backgrounds get along with each other. (Not to mention that the U.S. economy has grown much faster than our own as well.) In the American system, the most important cultural values one must learn relate to democracy and civil rights, not clothing styles or religious habits.

While grasping for a rationale for this law, apologists advance another argument. They say that the new Charter of Values is really about promoting the equality of women. They claim the hijab is an instrument of male domination. While the patriarchal structure of deeply religious societies certainly can lead to the oppression of women, refusing women with hijabs jobs certainly doesn't liberate them, and it's absurd to believe that discriminating against religious women will improve women's rights. And by refusing religious Muslims jobs, you prevent these very women from truly integrating into Quebec society.

Then, of course, there's the Celine Dion argument: "You are in Quebec and we have embraced you and opened our country for you to live in a better world, you have to adapt to our rules." In other words, if you want to live here, you have to be like us. But please tell me, what does "being like us" mean? Is there a Quebec uniform I somehow overlooked? I see people dressed in every possible way, business suits and ties to coloured hair and piercings. Some people wear tuques; others wear kippahs. What's the difference? Unless of course, the difference is that by wearing a kippah you acknowledge that your ancestors lived somewhere other than New France.

Jumping past the laboured explanations, it's obvious that the Charter of Values is a blatant political ploy. It is the solution to a problem that doesn't exist. Without cause and without reason, it cuts down our right to self-expression. The Parti Québécois simply wants to advance its political goals, and hopes that demagoguery will lead them into the promised land of sovereignty. Premier Pauline Marois cannot pretend that she doesn't know that this secular charter will appeal most to xenophobes and racists.

I oppose this charter not because I'm Jewish, but because I'm a Canadian and a Québécois. Democracy is founded not just on the rule of the majority, but also on protecting the rights of minorities. The social contract that holds all of us together requires me to respect the PQ government, even if I'd prefer another one, and it requires this government to protect my rights, even if I didn't vote for them. And one needs to recognize that democratic rights can be slowly sliced away, like salami, until they eventually disappear. Just just look at what former president Hugo Chavez did in Venezuela and what President Vladimir Putin did in Russia. Both of these dictators used populâr support to create near-dictatorships. Any country that tolerates a pointless restriction on civil rights is courting danger.

Marois has now made it clear: as a kippah-wearing Jew, I don't belong in the Parti Québécois. Well, I'm glad to be excluded. I'd never want to be part of a party that shamelessly undermines rights and courts bigots. I'd never want to be part of a party that will trample on democracy in order to further its political goals.

So, in short, thank you, Pauline, for excluding me from the Parti Québécois.

PQ candidate backtracks on JGH comments

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — After outrage from Jewish groups, a Parti Québécois (PQ) candidate has backtracked on comments she posted on the Internet appearing to suggest that the word "Jewish" be removed from the name of the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) and that circumcision be banned.

Tania Longpré, who is running in the Dec. 9 byelection in Montreal's north-end Viau riding, made the comments on Facebook in an exchange on the proposed charter of state secularism.

Tania Longpré

She wrote: "Answer me publicly: must we include in the charter the withdrawal of the word 'Jewish' from the hospital? Forbid circumcision? Sidelocks in the public service?

"I answer yes! Anyway, thank you for the idea for the next text."

After complaints from the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and B'nai Brith Canada and others via social media, Longpré, a former Journal de Montréal blogger, wrote on her Facebook page Nov. 10: "After what has circulated on social media, I would like to correct the facts: exasperated a few weeks ago, I responded nonsense to someone in a virtual exchange that does not reflect all my thoughts." She said, however, that she supports the proposed charter as it is.

Longpré, who currently teaches French to immigrants, followed that up with a second message on her Twitter account referring to the incident as an "infantile controversy."

Democratic Institutions Minister Bernard Drainville, who is responsible for the charter, told reporters, "Before she was a candidate, she was a citizen who had freedom of speech. Now she's a PQ candidate and she must endorse the policies that were taken by the PQ government."

Premier Pauline Marois did not take Longpré to task. On the contrary, she called her "an excellent candidate" on Nov. 12.

CIJA is "not buying" Longpré's explanation, and won't be satisfied until she "owns up to what she said, acknowledges that it was wrong and renounces it," said David Ouellette, the organization's associate director of public affairs.

Longpré's Facebook comments were not isolated, he suggested. "In the past, she has made statements that reflect a radical conception of secularism," and are especially troubling because she is a "passionate promoter of the charter."

CIJA, he said, also wants to hear a clear statement from the PQ government that it "by no means seeks to suppress, question or challenge this Jewish institution [the JGH], which is the pride of Quebec Jews."

Longpré's comments show an "utter ignorance," Ouellette added, of the JGH's care of all Quebecers regardless of origin since its founding almost 80 years ago, and of Jews' "rootedness" in Quebec for 2-1/2 centuries.

CIJA had earlier urged Marois to "call her candidate to order for this attack on Jewish identity and on the generosity provided by the community to the benefit of all Quebecers for many generations."

CIJA took the occasion to further criticize the proposed charter, Bill 60, saying it would effectively prohibit Jewish doctors who wear a kippah from practising anywhere but in Jewish establishments. This was a reference to a clause that would allow health-care institutions up to five years to "transition" to compliance with the law and those with a "confessional" mandate possibly longer.

B'nai Brith urged the PQ to distance itself from Longpré, noting how especially insensitive her remarks were at a time when the 75th anniversary of Kristallnacht was being commemorated.

"It is truly shameful that the lessons of Kristallnacht... have fallen on deaf ears," stated B'nai Brith CEO Frank Dimant.

"In fact, the Nazis banned circumcision and often taunted Jews by cutting their beards and payot [sidelocks].

"Hopefully, the comments endorsed by Ms. Longpré are not reflective of the PQ. We call on party leadership to immediately disavow themselves from such offensive and worrying comments and thereby make it clear that such notions form no part of their platform."

B'nai Brith said Longpré's explanation of her comments to date are unsatisfactory.

Viau was held by Liberal Emmanuel Dubourg from 2007 until he resigned to enter federal politics. He is seeking the seat vacated by Denis Coderre, who was elected Montreal mayor this month.

On Nov. 13, the JGH board of directors affirmed its opposition to Bill 60, the charter of state secularism, calling it "discriminatory and deeply insulting to public-sector workers."

Should the "offensive" bill pass, the JGH said that, as a matter of principle, it will not seek any delay in its application, as is foreseen in the law or that the government might extend to it.

"Since the bill is inherently prejudicial, there is no point in taking advantage of any clause that would grant us temporary, short-term relief," said executive director Lawrence Rosenberg.

The JGH said many of its staff wear attire denoting a wide variety of faiths, and there are no complaints from users of its services.

"As long as services are delivered with professional competence, courtesy and respect, no legislation should be allowed to override the freedoms of religion or expression that are guaranteed by" both the Canadian and Quebec rights charters, it stated.

Public hearings on the bill will begin on Jan. 14 before the National Assembly's commission on institutions. Deadline for the submission of briefs or requests to appear must be received by the commission no later than Dec. 20.

New JGH director slams charter

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Lawrence Rosenberg, who is in the forefront of the Jewish General Hospital's defiance of Bill 60, indicated to his fellow physicians that he's not one to back down from a fight.

Rosenberg, who was the chief of surgical services, became the executive director of the JGH this month, just as the hospital entered into an open challenge to Quebec's secularism charter, which it terms "patently discriminatory."

He succeeds Hartley Stern who left in September after five years.

Speaking at a Combined Jewish Appeal event organized by the Maimonides Society at the JGH on Nov. 13, Rosenberg related that he is descended from a long line of chassidic rabbis.

His great-grandfather was Rabbi Yudel Rosenberg, a renowned Talmudist and Kabbalist, and "a bit of a rebel," he said.

Rabbi Rosenberg was a key figure in what became known as Montreal's "kosher meat wars" in the 1920s – a battle over control of supervision of kosher meat and poultry abbatoirs.

Lawrence Rosenberg

"He took on the Vaad in an argument over selling chickens. That's my heritage," said Rosenberg, a kippah-wearing Orthodox Jew.

Rabbi Rosenberg, the "dissident chief rabbi," was at loggerheads with the official chief rabbi of the newly formed Vaad Ha'ir, Rabbi Zvi Hirsch Cohen.

Rosenberg is a cousin of the late writer Mordecai Richler, who was also not known for shrinking from speaking his mind.

On Nov. 13, the JGH confirmed that, if the bill passes, it will not apply for the "transition period" offered to hospitals to give them time to comply with the law, implicitly signalling that it does not intend to impose the ban on religious wear among its employees.

In the official announcement on Nov. 6 of his appointment, Rosenberg stated, "As executive director, I appreciate that I am being called upon to preserve the underlying values of our community that are deeply embedded in the hospital and which have been a key driving force of achievement for decades."

75th anniversary of Kristallnacht marked

Holocaust Education Month opens in Ottawa

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – Kristallnacht, or the "Night of Broken Glass," – Nov. 9, 1938 – was a night of terror for the Jews of Germany and Austria.

On that night, the Nazis unleashed a wave of unprecedented violence and destruction of Jewish-owned property, burning synagogues, looting homes and businesses. It was a turning point in Nazi Germany's persecution of Jews.

To mark the 75th anniversary of that horrible night, a program was held on Nov. 9 at Ottawa's Congregation Agudath Israel as the opening event of Holocaust Education Month in the capital.

Mina Cohn, chair of the Shoah (Holocaust) Committee of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa, and herself a child of survivors, welcomed those present and began by telling two moving anecdotes from the lives of her own family.

Following an excerpt from a video by the same name (Kristallnacht: The Night of Broken Glass), David Engel presented the keynote address. His topic, "The Context of Kristallnacht: Poland, Polish Jewry and the Refugee Crisis," and outlined the political and geographic scene in Europe leading up to, and following, the events of Nov. 9 and 10, 1938.

Engel, a professor of Holocaust studies, Hebrew and Judaic studies and history at New York University, a senior fellow of the Goldstein-Goren Diaspora Research Center at Tel Aviv University and a member of the academic committee of the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum, is the author of numerous books and the recipient of several honours and awards.

On the eve of Remembrance Day, the audience was reminded of the plight of Jewish refugees trying to flee Europe and find a safe haven. Unfortunately, Canada's record for accepting Jews was the worst of all western nations, Engel said.

While each country did, and does today, base its decisions about, among other things, who will live there, taking into account the existing population and its needs, Engel emphasized that "these decisions can have life and death consequences."

He urged audience members to "at least ask these questions and try to seriously consider" what, if any, other methods could be used to help refugees today and in the future.

One of the few places where Jews were welcomed during the World War II was Shanghai, China, where Tova Clark and her family lived for nine years before leaving for Israel. Clark read from her book, Compartments, the story of how her comfortable childhood in Germany was forever changed.

The program was presented by the Shoah (Holocaust) Committee of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa with co-operation from the U.S. Embassy, Agudath Israel Congregation and the Max and Tessie Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies of Carleton University. Holocaust survivors and their families, parliamentarians, ambassadors from a number of countries, Jewish community officials and members of the public attended.

Ve'ahavta gala honours tikkun olam leaders

Vicky Tobianah
Special to The CJN

A world-renowned violinist who is using music to help poverty-stricken youth in troubled neighbourhoods, a Holocaust survivor and educator, and two kids who raise thousands of dollar for cancer research from lemonade stands were a few of the nine people honoured at the 11th annual Starry Nights: Ve'ahavta's Tikun Olam Awards Ceremony on Nov. 10.

The event, which attracted about 500 people, including Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne, honoured nine people in five categories: human rights leader and activist Chief Phil Fontaine for humanitarianism, Joe Gottdenker and Faigie Libman for remembrance, Moshe Hammer for education, Dr. Andrew Simor for medicine, and Jamie and Alexandra Eckler and Amanda and Joshua Belzowski for young leadership.

"It's enormously inspiring," said Robyn Segall, director of programs and marketing for Ve'ahavta, the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee.

"We often recognize people who haven't been in the limelight, who have been doing tikkun olam quietly – people who may not have the recognition they deserve."

Wynne, who took to the stage unplanned, said that the work Ve'avahta is doing is very much in keeping with what she sees as her role as a politician – to make the world a better place.

Hammer is a world-famous violinist who is helping inspire children who live in poor areas stay out of gangs through the use of music.

In 2006, during Toronto's so-called "summer of the gun," Hammer noticed the heavy gang and gun violence amongst young children and teenagers in certain areas of Toronto and was struck by the fact that the words "violin" and "violence" are quite similar.

He realized he could use his talents to help inspire children, and teach them musical lessons – something most children in the schools he works in do not have a chance to take – to help them develop life skills, a positive self-image and sense of responsibility, and encourage them to become better citizens.

In its first year, the Hammer Band, as his project is now known, had 40 students. This year, he has 600 students, for a total of more than 1,200 school children who have taken part in the musical lessons.

"The philosophy behind what we do is that, besides making better adults, which I'm sure we are, because we're in some very dangerous areas, we are convinced that when we get the kids when they're 9, 10 or 11, their chances of joining a gang will be completely reduced," Hammer said.

"Kids who feel disenfranchised, lonely, out of place, and weak, those are the kids that are lured into gangs. We give kids that kind of belonging. They belong to a band."

Hammer and his team of professional musicians enter schools in poverty-stricken areas and teach students the violin and cello, for free, while encouraging them to develop their creativity and passion. The majority of the students are immigrants, and Hammer's team has taught students from 39 different cultures. To date, the Hammer Band has performed more than 50 concerts.

"We challenge their creativity, challenge their imagination, that's what kids don't get enough of," said Hammer. "My aim isn't to create hundreds of musicians but to create thousands of better people, because then how much better will our communities be?"

Another honoree, Holocaust survivor and educator Gottdenker, has made it his mission to ensure the Holocaust is never forgotten. Born in Poland in 1941, he was hidden with a Polish family for 3-1/2 years during the war. After the war ended, he was reunited with his parents and moved to the United States and then Canada, where he now resides. However, he never forgot the sacrifice the Polish family made to save his life, and he kept in touch with the parents, their children and grandchildren.

He is vice-chair of the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem and a board member of several organizations, including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Neuberger Holocaust Education Center.

"Fortunate is not strong enough of a word to have survived through the goodness of these people," said Gottdenker, who was the principal donor to the International Seminars wing at Yad Vashem's International School of Holocaust Studies, which opened in 2009.

"I feel I have to give back and to give back in a number of ways."

The keynote speaker of the night was Frank O'Dea, founder of Second Cup, who spoke about living on the streets of Toronto before founding the coffee empire.

Zareinu students the stars of annual fashion show

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

The power of fashion can indeed transform us – it can give us the confidence to keep on going, said Canadian fashion icon, Jeanne Beker welcoming some 650 guests to the 10th annual Zareinu fashion show.

The Nov. 12 event, hosted by Beker at Bellvue Manor in Vaughan, Ont., raised close to $300,000 in support of the Zareinu Educational Centre, a treatment centre that delivers programs for children with special needs, including cerebral palsy, Down syndrome, autism spectrum disorder and other neurological and developmental impairments.

The highlight of the night came when the children from Zareinu and students from across the GTA walked hand-in-hand together down the runway. The kids were dressed in original and Freeman Formalwear.

Zareinu student Rachel Kenley made her way down the catwalk beaming with delight. "For a kid that we thought would never walk, this is huge and I owe it all to Zareinu," Rachel's mother, Marlene Kenley told The CJN.

"Imagine if you had a child that does not speak and has a feeding tube. Imagine dropping off your child at school and not knowing how they were cared for because your child can't tell you how their day went. For me to drop off my daughter, who is the centre of my universe, at Zareinu, and know not only is she learning, not only is she being taken care of, but to know the therapists are aware of every twitch that Rachel makes and every facial expression, that if they think she is off even a little bit, they call me right away. That's massive for me."

Zareinu president and chair Danny Gordon paid tribute to the evening co-chairs: "Three people spearheaded the fashion show since its inception 10 years ago: Renee Rosenzweig, Stacy Markin and Esti Cohen. Together they have helped raise over $3 million cumulatively over the last 10 years.

"What began as a moderate yet momentous event has become one of our committee's monumental evenings of the year. These funds have directly contributed to a number of programs including state of the art equipment, interventions and physical therapies. The success is due to the efforts of these fashion co-chairs. We are fortunate to have them on our team."

Guests schmoozed and talked fashion at the cocktail reception as they observed a spectacular fashion installation from Cat's Meow Vintage Couture, sampled gourmet food, sipped some bubbly and participated in a raffle and auction.

Professional models from high-end Canadian retailer Andrews, as well as the international luxury designer label Versace took to the runway to showcase their collections. New this year was a menswear collection by Versace and Dirk Bikkembergs. The Shoe Company provided the evening footwear, and models wore beautiful accessories by Fiori.

Dr. Golda Milo-Manson, Zareinu board member and vice-president of Medicine & Academic Affairs at Holland Bloorview Kids Rehabilitation Hospital, addressed the crowd. "He or she can't do something is never something you will hear at Zareinu. Rather, it's, 'What can we do to make this happen?' The integrated education and therapy programs at Zareinu are unique and very special. It's a place for goals, dreams and endless possibilities that come to life with the help of donors, the community and the people here tonight."

Conference aims to empower Orthodox women

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The Canadian Friends of Nishmat, a Jerusalem-based organization that promotes higher Torah learning for women, is presenting a one-day conference that aims to educate Orthodox women about taboo issues.

The Nov. 24 Women's Health and Halacha Day conference, to be held at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, will promote Nishmat's Yoatzot Halachah program – the organization's "jewel in the crown," said conference co-chair Michele Herrmann.

Dr. Deena Zimmerman

Through Nishmat, women are trained for two years to become Yoatzot Halachah, women certified by a panel of Orthodox rabbis to be a resource to those who may feel uncomfortable discussing family purity law and women's health questions with their doctors or rabbis.

"The women work in tandem with rabbinic authorities to help Orthodox Jewish women become more comfortable in understanding family purity and ritual halachah," Herrmann explained.

Medical professionals from Canada, the United States and Israel, along with three Yoatzot Halachah, will lead sessions at the conference on topics including pregnancy, conception and miscarriage; how to talk to your daughter about puberty; post-partum issues; a Torah perspective on intimacy; perimenopause and menopause; and pre-natal genetic testing.

Dr. Deena Zimmerman, a Yale University and Albert Einstein College of Medicine graduate, who practises as a pediatrician, a Yoetzet Halachah and lactation consultant in Israel, will be a presenter at the conference.

She said she understands why women would prefer to hear from other women who understand their cultural background.

"You go to a doctor who doesn't understand where you're coming from, even if they're an amazing doctor, you might get a feeling that they don't really understand what's bothering you. Here, you get a sense that they really get it," said Zimmerman, author of A Lifetime Companion to the Laws of Jewish Family Life and Mi Dor L'Dor: Genetics and Genetic Diseases: Jewish Legal and Ethical Perspectives.

"The conference is not about feeling more comfortable with one [a rabbi] or another [a doctor]. It's about understanding the issues on both sides, so they are comfortable talking to both… and being educated about these issues both halachically and medically."

Zimmerman offered an example of an issue that can be very disruptive to the life of an Orthodox woman, but not to the general public.

"I think a common issue that comes up is a side effect of birth control that can cause irregular bleeding and spotting," Zimmerman said.

Orthodox women who practise the law of niddah cannot have any physical contact with their husbands until their menstrual cycle – a 12-day process that includes five days of bleeding, followed by seven "clean" days – is complete, and after immersion in a mikvah, a ritual bath.

"It has an impact on Orthodox Jewish women that it may not have on the general public, and that's why some doctors don't get it, because they think, you're fine, you're not anemic. It's a spot, put on a pad. But they don't realize the implications it can have on a particular group," Zimmerman said.

"But I think also, often women are not comfortable enough with the Halachah to discuss it with their doctor. They know it's an issue, but they don't know the nitty-gritty of the issue, so they're not able to explain to their doctor in a way that will be able to solve the issue."

Herrmann hopes the conference, which Canadian Friends of Nishmat aims to present biannually, will address issues like the one Zimmerman outlined.

"These topics will help and empower women to understand the routes to take, who to approach, what the best avenues are when you're looking for help, and to give it a halachic perspective," Herrmann said.

"We'll explore everything from intimacy in a marriage, what is halachically acceptable, what it is not – which is something Orthodox women are relatively clueless about and embarrassed to talk about…" to body issues and eating disorders, and caring for cognitively impaired parents or spouses.

"We can even bring out the halachic perspective relating to cancer. If you're suffering from cancer and you're going through chemo and it's physically debilitating, there is an issue of holding your husband's hand during your menstrual cycle."

Whatever the topic, Herrmann is confident the conference will be "a comfortable place for women to ask questions they usually feel uncomfortable asking."

Let's make Jewish high school free

Money Matters
Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The recently released Pew survey on of U.S. Jews has generated anguished discussion on the future of American Jewry. Some of its key findings include an intermarriage rate of 58 per cent, a number that rises to 71 per cent if the Orthodox are excluded (in 1970, the rate was 17 per cent), as well as the findings that two-thirds of Jews don't belong to a synagogue and one-third had a Christmas tree last year.

Jerry Silverman president and CEO, Jewish Federations of North America, stated simply that non-Orthodox Judaism is "facing an existential crisis." Similar views were expressed by many, if not quite as starkly.

One of the ideas Silverman floated to re-engage many with Jewish life free Jewish preschool for all Jewish families. Admittedly, at this point, this is an idea whose details and full costs have not been worked out. Nonetheless, we finally have an important federation leader publicly acknowledging the need for free Jewish education if we hope to ensure the Jewish future of the vast majority of American Jews. But while getting Jewish kids in the door is a great idea, unless there's a strong incentive to have these kids continue, it would be more effective to begin with the high school years, where adolescents are in their formative years.

This need for universal accessible (free) Jewish education is quite apparent, yet many are afraid to admit as much, fearing they may be asked to help implement such a program, one that requires heavy investment now and whose dividends will take years to show up in a future study.

At the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, where I teach, recent research showed that 96 per cent of graduates married other Jews. The student body is overwhelmingly non-Orthodox. The solution to intermarriage is readily apparent. Is our community up to the challenge?

What if an education at TanenbaumCHAT was free for all students. At the current enrolment of about 1,400 and with tuition at $23,500, we're talking about an investment of $32 million a year. That may sound like a lot, but it's actually a tiny fraction of the money sitting in Jewish foundations (not to mention personal wealth) and is less than half of what UJA raises annually in Toronto. Even if the in-marriage rate were to drop as low as 80 per cent for TanenbaumCHAT graduates, it means hundreds of people every year are marrying Jews because they received a Jewish high school education.

With many opting out of a Jewish education due to cost, offering free education would save hundreds more from intermarriage and help guarantee a vibrant Jewish future.

The Pew report noted that 96 per cent of Jews who marry other Jews are raising their children as Jewish by religion, whereas only 20 per cent of Jews who are intermarried are doing the same.

There's no need for an anguished response to reports of disconnected Jews. The solution is simple and is contrary to what many claim is most affordable. If the richest community in Jewish history is unwilling to find the money to rescue Jews from assimilation, it should anguish us all.

Sufganiyot: paradise in a deep fryer – Pt. 1

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietkiewicz

When you think of Chanukah, the first food that comes to mind is probably the latke. While the potato pancake certainly has its virtues, its oily cousin, the sufganiyah, has it own unique, delightful pleasures.

Israeli folklorist Dov Noy says sufganiyot go back. Way back. An apocryphal Bukharan fable claims the first sufganiyah "was given to Adam and Eve after their expulsion from the Garden of Eden. This sweet doughnut had three characteristics: it was round like the wheel of fortune, it had to be looked at not for its external qualities but for what was inside, and it could not be enjoyed the same way twice." And its name? Sof (end) + gan (garden) + y-ah (of God's).

[http://bit.ly/sufg1]

Hmmm. Sufganiyot in exchange for expulsion from the Garden, working by the sweat of your brow and the pain of childbirth? Sounds like a fair trade to me.

Rabbi Josh Waxman has entered the etymological fray. He says sufganiyah is related to the Hebrew word for sponge, sfog. Sounds plausible when you think of that ball of dough soaking up all that oil and calories in a deep fryer. [bit.ly/sufg5]

Jewish Action magazine says the earliest reference is found in the 12th century writings of Rabbi Maimon ben Yosef, father of the Rambam. Surprisingly, in his day, some scorned the Chanukah treat. "One must not make light of the custom of eating sofganim (fried fritters) on Chanukah. It is a custom of the Kadmonim (the ancient ones)," he warned. [bit.ly/sufg9]

Or perhaps we have the labour movement to thank for the goodie. According to food writer Gil Marks, "in the late 1920s, the Histadrut, the Israeli labour federation, decided to champion the less widespread jelly doughnut as a Chanukah treat rather than levivot (latkes), because latkes were relatively easy and homemade, while sufganiyot were rather difficult for most home cooks, thereby providing work (preparing, transporting, and selling the doughnuts) for its members." [bit.ly/sufg25]

Too difficult for most home cooks? Here are a couple of case studies. In "Baptism by Fryer," Sara Ivry describes her maiden attempt at preparing a batch. Despite the fact that she didn't chill the dough as instructed (her fridge was on the fritz), she used the wrong oil ("I bought safflower, thinking the word sounds an awful lot like sunflower"), and had no oil thermometer, Sara persevered and delivered "two dozen slightly scrawny, knotted pastries, lacking specific centres and radiating absolutely no mouth-watering aroma. They looked nothing like the pristine, fluffy, round delights I picture when I think of sufganiyot." [bit.ly/sufg22]

Miranda Levenstein had good reason to refrain from making sufganiyot. "My hair is like a sponge. If there is an aroma anywhere, you can be sure my porous locks will emit that stench long after I have left the space where the smell was produced." Miranda decided to throw caution to the wind and embrace her "inner Jewess". The upshot: "Do not be scared to make these. I was, and not just because of smelly hair. Yeast is intimidating, as is a large pot of burning hot oil. But these sweet jammy treats were surprisingly doable and truly delicious." [bit.ly/sufg26]

Next week, goodbye jelly, hello daring sufganiyot.

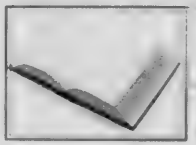
Peace first, Chanukah second

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner



Rabbinic Reflections

Rabbi Abraham Twerski, in his book Smiling Each Day, tells of a Jewish community composed of many different religious sects, each one adhering to its own rabbi's authority. At one point a dispute erupted, mushrooming to such an extent that an outside sage was imported to resolve the strife.

This objective authority interviewed the various sides and investigated the issue at length before proposing a solution. When he finally presented an idea, though, one of the interested rabbis rejected it. He tried an alternative proposal, but another participant shot it down. A third approach was similarly demolished. Finally, he threw up his hands in exasperation and declared, "Now I understand why Abraham asked God regarding Sodom (Genesis 18:24), 'If there are fifty tzaddikim [righteous people] in the city, won't you desist from destroying it?' Abraham's logic was simple: If there are fifty tzaddikim in the city, they will make sure to bring it to ruin themselves. There is no need for You to intervene!"

The lesson of the story, to me, is that people pursuing righteous goals sometimes forget that they have homes, families and a world to maintain, and that shalom in that home, family and world must be given greater priority than our other pursuits.

The Talmud (Shabbat 23b) seeks to educate this forgetful Jew, declaring, "It is obvious that a Jew who must choose to spend on either the lights of Shabbat or the lights of Chanukah should spend on the lights of Shabbat, for the sake of the peace they will provide for the home." The core purpose of our Shabbat candles is to illuminate our homes in a dignified way, so that people will be able to enjoy Shabbat in peace, without tripping over obstacles and squabbling with each other. This goal is deemed so important that it even overrides the imperative to publicize Divine miracles through the lights of Chanukah.

This law is remarkable in light of the fact that the minimum length of time required for the lights of Chanukah to burn is just 30 minutes. We are talking about reducing the fuel for one's Shabbat lamp by only 30 minutes – and even that brief length of time is considered so important that it trumps the Chanukah lights. Judaism decrees that it would be better to omit all thanks for the Divine miracle than to have a home in pain for 30 minutes.

The home exists on multiple levels; there's the literal house, the broader family and the still-broader community. On each level, we need to preserve our shalom bayit, the peace of our home, lest people be pained. On each level, we must remember the Divine mandate: without the lights of Shabbat, one might as well not have the lights of Chanukah. First we build community and create shalom, and then we're able to celebrate Chanukah and thank God for the miracles. May we merit to have both parts, the shalom and the gratitude to God, in our homes.

Rabbi Mordechai Torczyner is rosh beit midrash of Yeshiva University Torah MiTzion Beit Midrash Zichron Dov in Toronto.

Violence against women must end

From the Bimah
Rabbi Catharine Clark

We'd like to think it doesn't happen among Jews, but it does. Jewish women experience physical, sexual and verbal abuse perpetrated by their husbands, fiancés and boyfriends. It's time to put a stop to it.

Nov. 25 is International Day for the Elimination of Violence against Women. In the spirit of this day, here are some important steps for ending abuse of women in the Jewish community.

• Stop denying it. Denial has been a popular "strategy" since at least the 12th century, when Rabbeinu Tam wrote, "Wife beating is unheard of among the children of Israel." Denial, however, does not change the fact that Jewish women in abusive relationships live in fear and pain inflicted by their partners.

• Recognize that Jewish law prohibits a man from striking his wife. In his commentary on the Tur (Even HaEzer 154:15), Rabbi Yosef Karo quotes Rabbeinu Simhah, who says that "we must treat a man who beats his wife more severely than we treat a man who beats another man, since he's not obligated to honour the other man, but is obligated to honour his wife, more, in fact, than himself. And a man who beats his wife should be put under a ban and excommunicated."

• Understand what shalom bayit, "peace in the household," means. The person who is disrupting the wholeness of family life is the abuser, not the woman who seeks to stop the abuse or to leave the relationship.

• Speak about domestic violence from the bimah or in the synagogue bulletin. Rabbis, cantors and lay leaders who do so send the message that they take the problem seriously and will listen to a congregant suffering abuse.

• Insist that the leadership of your synagogue or JCC put the contact number of the local women's shelter in the women's bathroom and nursing room. This information empowers an abused woman to take her first steps toward help or to flee to safety in a critical moment.

• Listen and believe. If a woman tells you that her partner is hitting her, controlling money, demanding detailed accounts of where she is at all times or denigrating her, respect the courage she has shown in coming to you.

• Refer her to a domestic violence program so that she can develop a safety plan. A safety counsellor can help her protect herself, for instance by knowing when to call the police.

• Do not tell her that she should stay in the relationship for the sake of the children. Long-term exposure to violence inflicted by one parent against another has detrimental effects on a child's development. Moreover, children who witness domestic violence are themselves in danger of being physically injured.

• Support her in making in her own decisions, even if her decision is to stay with her abuser for now. Her partner probably is not always abusive. In fact, it is likely that the cycle of abuse includes times when he is thoughtful and charming. In addition, abusers often respond to attempts to leave with escalated violence.

Please take these steps. All of us have the responsibility to ensure true shalom bayit for the families of our Jewish community.

The impact of Hungarian anti-Semitism

Christopher Adam

Csanád Szegedi invited to speak in Montreal

Csanád Szegedi, a member of the European Parliament and a founder of the rabidly anti-Semitic Jobbik Movement for a Better Hungary – a far-right political party that last year suggested Hungarian Jews posed a national security risk and should be forced to register with authorities – never thought that he would one day be participating at an event hosted by Montreal's Westmount Chabad.

Since his election in 2009, Szegedi has regularly attended sessions of the European Parliament dressed in a black vest and adorned with a red-and-white striped crest worn by the disbanded Hungarian Guard, the far-right paramilitary wing of Jobbik. He brought to life terrifying memories for Hungarian Holocaust survivors, who recognized how similar this uniform was to those worn by Hungarian fascists during World War II.

As Szegedi discovered in 2012, one of those Holocaust survivors was his grandmother. She was tight-lipped about her family's past, but had Szegedi paid closer attention, he may have been able to decipher the tell-tale signs of his family's hidden past.

But I am hardly in a position to blame Szegedi for not having been able to put together the pieces of the puzzle. However incredible Szegedi's story of self-discovery may seen on this side of the Atlantic, it was not uncommon for Holocaust survivors to provide their children with the image of a clean, untroubled family past and to bury both their Jewish heritage and their horrific experience during World War II as deeply as possible.

I only discovered that my father, aunt and my grandmother were Holocaust survivors – and that my grandfather was killed in Mauthausen concentration camp – on a damp February afternoon earlier this year, as I was emptying out my late aunt's apartment in Montreal. My father, who died in 2004, was 12 years old when his father was deported. My father, grandmother, aunt and uncle were taken from their home in Budapest and were moved into one of the 2,000 "yellow star houses," where Jews were forced to live between June and late November 1944, before being taken to the Budapest Ghetto. My father shared snippets – hardly more than blurry, abridged memories – of his experiences surviving the war as a child, but remained silent on his family's persecution during the Holocaust. His father, Béla Ádám, one of some 600,000 Hungarian Jews murdered during the Holocaust, had "died on the front" according to one story and had been executed in late 1944 for trying to desert, according to another.

While my paternal grandfather hailed from a generation of Budapest merchants, the official family history chronicled my grandmother's family as being patriotic Hungarian Protestants from Transylvania. My grandmother, Mária Borsai, was an author of children's books, her father was a widely respected chief physician in the county and a philanthropist, supporting ethnic Hungarian authors and artists in Romanian-controlled Transylvania.

But with the death of my aunt early this year, the carefully crafted narrative created by three generations of my father's family unravelled at lightning speed. In an effort to assimilate, my great-grandfather changed his family name at the beginning of the 20th century and established a scholarship at the Unitarian secondary school in the town of Cluj. His children took the process of assimilation a step further and converted to Christianity, while my father's generation crossed the last 't' after the trauma of the Holocaust by pledging never to speak of the family's past to their children, sparing them the heavy burden of persecution. One of my father's cousins tried to break the silence in 1999, but met resistance. His letter revealing the family's deeply hidden secret was never shown to me.

Death sometimes has a way of baring all. It isn't always possible to take secrets to the grave. A generation of Hungarians arose from the shattered cities and communities in 1945 with a mindset that they would be building a new world, rather than preserving the painful memories of a previous one. And by forgetting, they believed that they were shielding their children from the visceral anti-Semitism of the likes of Szegedi, but also from the bias that they knew permeated Hungarian society.

Szegedi once noted that since discovering his Jewish heritage, he has gone from the persecutor to being the persecuted. Thousands of other Hungarians, including myself, grew up and lived their adult lives knowing nothing about their family's Jewish roots and their parents' experience during the Holocaust.

Yet this lack of knowledge did not stop us, as it did in Szegedi's case, from having compassion for those who survived the horrors of the Shoah and for condemning all forms of anti-Semitism.

It seems to me that the test of human empathy is whether you are able to walk in solidarity with "the other." Szegedi's former colleagues on the far right, as well as many supporters of Hungary's current, authoritarian government, find solidarity that crosses religious, cultural and ethnic boundaries wholly undesirable. Szegedi was once a firm proponent of this viewpoint, and it took an unexpected revelation to convince him to change direction. The difficult question that remains unanswered – and perhaps requires more reflection – is whether Szegedi will now find forgiveness.

No single solution to hatred

OPINION

The winds of change are blowing for Jewish communities all over the world. A shocking poll released recently by a European Union agency found that 76 per cent of Jewish people polled believe there has been an increase in anti-Semitic hostility in their European home countries. Close to half of the poll's respondents (46 per cent) are afraid of being verbally attacked or harassed because they are Jewish, while more than 23 per cent said they had actually been discriminated against recently.

Avi Benlolo

Hate is a mutating illness that knows no borders and has no boundaries. Canada has not been immune to pernicious anti-Semitism and Israel defamation. For the last 13 years, we have been battling anti-Jewish hate on university campuses, at gay pride parades and on city streets, all the while seeing vicious propaganda and slander adopted by unions and church groups. Families and neighbourhoods that have been hit by anti-Semitism struggle with the age-old question – "Why us?"

The rise of anti-Semitism, whether by stealth as practised by university students, or the more overt methods employed by radical Hezbollah supporters, is real and must not be ignored or played down. This is particularly true of university campuses, where students and faculty alike have spearheaded the boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel.

How we as the Jewish community of Canada engage with problems of anti-Semitism, defamation of Israel and the threat to democracy and human rights will ultimately define not only who we are today, but also our very future.

We are fortunate to be residing in one of the most dynamic and engaging communities in the world, with supportive federal and provincial governments. But with the seeds of hate being planted today, can we take our comfort for granted? The new proposed Quebec charter of values is an example of how the tide of religious freedom can easily turn. Although one Parti Québécois candidate has already had her knuckles rapped for suggesting the removal of the word "Jewish" from the name of Montreal's Jewish General Hospital, it seems safe to say we can expect increasing incidents of anti-Jewish hate in Quebec if the charter becomes law.

As history shows, there is no single solution to anti-Semitism. Any suggestions to the contrary must be looked upon with suspicion. I support all community methods of advocacy, education and programming as a convergence of efforts to push back.

In my capacity as leader of a Canadian human rights advocacy organization my strategic approach has been to build a sphere of influence outside of the Jewish community. Most non-Jews are revolted by the sight of anti-Semitism and anti-Israel sentiment. By harnessing friendships with educators, police, governments, community and religious leaders, we can strengthen our efficacy. Projects such as Freedom Day, Tools for Tolerance, Compassion to Action, Speakers Idol, diversity workshops and now, the new Tour for Humanity mobile Tolerance Education Center, allow us to engage with the world.

Alone, we are a light unto the nations. Together, with friends who share our values, we become a beacon of light that can transform the entire universe.

Family rescues their rescuers

Muslims helped save Jewish family during World War II... debt repaid during Yugoslav war in 1990s

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Sara Pechanac lives a film script that could be titled "The rescuers became the rescued." She's fine with that. Indeed, she smiles broadly and her eyes dance when she recounts her family's story.

"I find that today, in the 21st century, I need to share my story with people because it's a very important time we are living in," said the 56-year-old Pechanac, in Toronto last week for some speaking engagements sponsored by the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). "I think people need to hear this story."

It's an irresistible one.

It begins in April 1941, when the Nazis invaded Yugoslavia. Pechanac's family lived in Sarajevo, now the capital of Bosnia and Herzegovina, then part of Croatian territory. The city was bombed relentlessly from the air.

The clan was Muslim, and their sole concession to observance was to eschew pork. Sara's mother, Zejneba Hardaga-Susic, wore a face veil, but only in public. They lived across the street from a synagogue and had many Jewish friends and acquaintances.

Among them was Josef Kavilio, who owned a factory near the Hardaga home. Bombed out of their house and marked for deportation, Kavilio, his wife and two children were taken in and offered haven by the Hardaga family, comprised of Musafa, his wife Zejneba, Mustafa's brother, Izet, and Izet's wife, Bachriya.

Following a short stay, the Kavilios fled to Mostar, in an area of Croatia under Italian control where Jews were relatively safe. Kavilio himself stayed behind to liquidate his business, but was caught and imprisoned by the Ustase, Croatia's fascist, anti-Semitic movement.

Heavy snow prevented the transfer of Kavilio and other prisoners from Sarajevo to the infamous Jasenovac concentration camp near Zagreb, where the Ustase systematically killed Serbs, Jews and Roma.

"Instead, the prisoners were taken, with their legs chained, to clear the roads from snow," states the website of Yad Vashem, Israel's Holocaust memorial and museum. "This is where Zejneba saw Kavilio. Kavilio later testified that he saw her standing at the street corner, her face traditionally veiled, watching the plight of their family friend with tears in her eyes. Undisturbed by the danger, she began to bring food to the prisoners."

Josef Kavilio managed to escape and make his way back to the Hardaga home. The family welcomed him and nursed him back to health. Gestapo headquarters were nearby and the danger was immense. In his testimony to Yad Vashem, Kavilio described the notices on walls threatening those who hid Serbs and Jews with death. Not wanting to further endanger the Hardagas, he again fled to Mostar to rejoin his family.

Sara Pechanac

By this time, the Hardagas had learned a family secret: Zejneba's father, Ahmed Sadik, had been hiding a Jewish family named Papo in his home. Sadik was caught and shipped to the Jasenovac camp near Zagreb, where he was murdered.

"My mother tried to do everything to save her father," Pechanac said.

Meantime, the Kavilios all survived, and at war's end, they revisited the Hardagas, who returned the jewelry that Josef had left with them for safekeeping.

The Kavilios immigrated to Israel, where they began a campaign to have the four Hardagas recognized by Yad Vashem as Righteous Among the Nations. In 1985, the family, as well as Ahmed Sadik, became the first Muslims to be so honoured, in a ceremony attended by Pechanac's mother and the Kavilio descendants.

Fast forward to the early 1990s. The civil war in Yugoslavia was raging, with Sarajevo in the crosshairs. "When my mother saved the Jews," Pechanac said with a sigh, "she never thought that a half-century after that, we would find ourselves in the same place – but now, we needed help. You could not arrange things like that."

Shimon Peres, now Israel's president, wrote the nascent Bosnian government inviting Pechanac, her mother, husband and daughter to the Jewish state. In February 1994, they arrived "with one suitcase and no money," Pechanac recalled. It didn't matter; Israel had repaid a debt.

As if to acknowledge that, a year later, Pechanac, her husband and their daughter all converted to Judaism. Pechanac said that for her, it was natural.

"I grew up near the Jewish community. I had Jewish friends. I didn't think it was bad to be a Muslim, [but] all my life I knew that I wanted to become a Jew." Avoiding pork, she added, "helped me really to feel like a Jew."

Pechanac, who was born in Sarajevo, said her mother did not speak of the family's heroic exploits, and that Pechanac herself did not discover them until she was an adult.

"My mother didn't find it was necessary to talk about that. My mother was a special woman. She never spoke too much. She'd done so much in her life.

"She educated us: 'If you want to do something, do it.' But not for this"– Pechanac slapped her chest to indicate self-satisfaction. "You do it because you believe in God."

Her sole regret is not pressing her mother for more details. Zejneba Hardaga-Susic died eight months after arriving in Israel. Pechanac's husband also died there. Pechanac has a sister, a Muslim, in Sarajevo, and a brother, who's Christian, living in Mexico City.

"Three children, three religions, from the same mother," Pechanac noted. Her daughter, now 30, was an officer in the Israel Air Force.

Another kicker: Pechanac works in the archives department of Yad Vashem.

Asked what messages she brings to Toronto, she replied, "Many... You need to do only good things in life. Always put yourself in the situation of others. Bad things can happen to you, too. Follow your feelings and try to do the best you can."

IN MEMORIAM: In honour of Remembrance Day, York Centre MP Mark Adler attended a ceremony and laid a wreath at the Memory of Flames monument for Jewish war veterans. Erected in 2011, the monument honours Jewish men and women in uniform.

American rabbis deal with new challenges

Conservative shuls wrestle with non-Jews in pews

Uriel Heilman
JTA

NEW YORK — To an outsider, the battles might seem to be over trifles — in some cases, just a few feet.

Where may a non-Jewish parent stand in the synagogue during his child's bar mitzvah? Can a non-Jew open the Holy Ark? Should non-Jewish synagogue members have voting rights?

Such questions have been pushed to the fore by the growing percentage of Conservative homes that include non-Jewish family members — more than one-quarter of them, according to the recent Pew Research Center survey.

For many Conservative synagogues, the issues are not trivial. They cut to the heart of a philosophical and practical debate about how open they should be toward the non-Jews in their midst.

"For a variety of reasons, my colleagues are being challenged to rethink positions that in the past we accepted almost as dogma," said Rabbi Charles Simon, who, as executive director of the Conservative movement's Federation of Jewish Men's Clubs, organizes seminars for Conservative synagogues on how to be more inclusive of non-Jews.

"It doesn't mean that the standards of Conservative Judaism are changing," he said. "It means that my colleagues are metaphorically learning they have to broaden their own tents."

In some ways, the dilemma is not unique to Conservative Judaism; the Reform movement has grappled with some of the same issues. But Jewish law does not bind Reform synagogues, and the movement accepts intermarriage – two key distinctions from Conservative Judaism. On the Orthodox side, the line against non-Jewish participation is pretty clear; many strictly Orthodox synagogues won't even allow the Jewish partner in an interfaith marriage to lead services.

Conservative synagogues are navigating the perilous middle, wrestling with how to adapt to an era of increasing non-Jews in their ranks while still adhering to Conservative principles of Jewish law that among other things forbids intermarriage.

The discussions also come at a time of serious decline for the Conservative movement, whose share of the American Jewish population has fallen to 18 per cent, according to the Pew study.

"Since such a large percentage of our younger families include interfaith marriages and relationships, we want very much to keep our children as loyal and involved Conservative Jews, and we realize that in order to do so we need to be welcoming to their partners and spouses and families," said Rabbi Raphael Adler of the Woodbury Jewish Center in New York. "Many in our congregations are not willing to give up our children and our families to Reform synagogues or to no congregation at all. It seems wrong."

The ways Conservative synagogues are adapting varies widely. Many offer non-Jews the honour of reciting the English prayer for the government, Israel or peace. Some allow non-Jews voting rights but bar them from board positions. Others exclude them from membership.

For Debbie Burton, a gentile who was married to a Jew and was raising her kids as Jews, exclusion from synagogue ritual roles never really bothered her until her daughter's bar mitzvah, when she was told she could not speak from the pulpit of her Chicago-area synagogue.

"It was the first time that I had ever felt that I was excluded from a minyan activity because I was not Jewish," Burton, a professor of mechanical engineering at Northwestern, wrote in a 2010 essay for Interfaithfamily.com. "I was hurt to feel prevented from publicly sharing my thoughts on the occasion of a Jewish milestone of my child. After all, even though I wasn't Jewish, I had played an important role in my children's Jewish education and upbringing."

Burton told JTA that the experience prompted her to push for changes in her synagogue's policies, though in the end she didn't require the changes for herself because she converted.

Rabbi Jarrod Grover

During life-cycle events, many Conservative synagogues now offer non-Jews a place of honour, but with limitations. At the Woodbury synagogue, non-Jewish parents may join their Jewish spouses when receiving an aliyah to the Torah during a bar mitzvah service, but the non-Jew must take a couple of steps back when the blessings are recited. A non-Jewish grandparent may offer an English blessing composed by the rabbi, but only from his place in the pews, not from the bimah.

Adler says reaction to the changes has been mixed: Some members have threatened to quit if certain changes are adopted.

Rabbi David Booth of Kol Emeth in Palo Alto, Calif., recently began giving non-Jews in his congregation a standalone ritual role unconnected to lifecycle events: opening the ark. Last month, the Conservative movement's Committee on Jewish Law and Standards formally endorsed the practice.

At Congregation Kneses Tifereth Israel in Port Chester, N.Y., Rabbi Jaymee Alpert offers a public blessing to interfaith couples right before their wedding in an adaptation of the traditional Shabbat aufruf celebration that precedes a Jewish wedding. Alpert also presents the interfaith couple with the same synagogue gift bestowed upon Jewish couples.

"We should be as open and inclusive as possible within the parameters of Jewish law and the Conservative movement," she said. "It's not that the congregation is advocating intermarriage, but I think there's a little bit of acceptance that this happens, and don't we want our children and the next generation to feel comfortable in the synagogue?"

Rabbi Alpert says she finds it painful to have to explain to interfaith couples why she cannot officiate at their weddings. Though the Conservative movement also bars its rabbis from attending intermarriages, the rule often is ignored.

Like many Conservative clergy in Canada, Rabbi Jarrod Grover of Beth Tikvah Synagogue in Toronto considers intermarriage a breach of Conservative Judaism. At Beth Tikvah, non-Jews are barred from membership. Synagogue mail sent to interfaith homes omits the name of the non-Jewish spouse. The synagogue does not allow blessings for interfaith unions.

"We do not recognize the validity of intermarriages — period. There's no simchah, there's no aufruf," Rabbi Grover told JTA.

He believes the best way to welcome non-Jews and encourage them to raise a Jewish family is to lower the bar for conversion.

"The danger of making the shul too welcoming for the intermarried is that there stops being any reason to convert, and I don't want that," Rabbi Grover said. "I want to push conversion because the right way to raise Jewish children is with two Jewish parents."

Rabbi Stewart Vogel of Temple Aliyah in Los Angeles rejects that approach.

"Parents who have made a commitment to raise a Jewish household and they don't convert, I think they're heroes," Rabbi Vogel said. "I think they deserve our praise and recognition. Instead, what do they get? At best, a feeling that they're accepted."

Rabbi Vogel's synagogue doesn't just welcome interfaith families but celebrates them. On "anniversary Shabbats," when couples celebrating anniversaries are acknowledged in shul, intermarried couples are honoured along with everybody else. At bar mitzvahs, the non-Jewish parent is invited to be part of the tallit presentation but must step back when the blessing is recited.

Vogel even officiates at funerals for non-Jewish congregants, noting in his eulogy that the deceased was not Jewish but was an "ohev yisrael" — a lover of the Jewish people. Vogel's synagogue also allows non-Jewish spouses who have lost their Jewish spouse or divorced to remain a member of the congregation.

"Some of my most committed congregants are non-Jewish congregants," he said.

Vogel says he initially was resistant to many of these changes, but his attitude shifted over time.

"My actions have been changed by the personal interactions with congregants and seeing how with a change in attitude we can really inspire them Jewishly," he said. "Someone who might otherwise turn away is now validated and sanctified. It's so affirming."

Lee Harvey Oswald's Jewish killer

My history with the family of Jack Ruby

Steve North
JTA

NEW YORK — We were sharing a pastrami sandwich and pickles at the Los Angeles landmark Canter's Deli. I was 24. She was nearly 50 years older, with a piercing voice as loud as her flaming red wig.

Her name was Eva Rubenstein Grant, and she was a little-known nightclub manager the morning of Nov. 24, 1963, when her brother left the apartment they shared in Dallas and blasted his way into infamy by fatally shooting Lee Harvey Oswald. It was history's first live televised murder.

Grant worked and lived with Jack Ruby and spent the rest of her life defending him against various allegations.

"I swear on my life, my brother was not three things," Grant told me, her voice rising. "He was not a homosexual. He was not with the Communists. And certainly not with the underworld."

I listened with fascination to Grant that day in 1977. (Years later she was perfectly portrayed in a TV movie by Doris Roberts, the high-decibel mom on Everybody Loves Raymond. Grant died in November 1992 at 83.)

"But Mrs. Grant," I said. "Jack had ties to the 'syndicate,' as you call it, as far back as your childhood in Chicago."

"Look," she replied in exasperation. "We would see these people in the neighbourhood and we'd ask, how's your mother? How's your sister? But that doesn't mean Jack was connected with them. I grew up with a bunch of boys who turned out to be no good. Who knew?"

It was a quintessentially Jewish response, albeit delivered in Grant's hybrid Chicago-Dallas accent. And the Rubensteins were a staunchly Jewish family, a fact that may have played a role in Ruby's killing of Oswald, John F. Kennedy's assassin.

Ruby was born Jacob Rubenstein in 1911 to a family of Polish-Jewish immigrants. His parents, Joseph and Fannie, were a volatile couple. Joseph was a mean and abusive drunk. Fannie suffered from mental illness and at one point was committed to an Illinois state hospital.

Their eight children had their fair share of problems, both before and after the parents separated. Ruby and three of his siblings were made wards of Chicago's Jewish Home Finding Society and placed in foster homes for periods of time during the 1920s.

Despite their dysfunctional world, the Rubensteins kept a kosher home, observed the holidays, sent their boys to Hebrew school and attended synagogue.

Ruby idolized Chicago Jewish boxing champion Barney Ross, who later described him as a "well-behaved" youth. But others recall Ruby's hair-trigger temper and street brawls, especially when taunted by the non-Jews in his mixed Jewish-Italian neighbourhood. Ruby's biographer, Seth Kantor, relates that as an Air Force private, Ruby once beat up a sergeant who called him "a Jew bastard."

After World War II, Grant moved to Dallas and began managing nightclubs and restaurants. Ruby received an honorable discharge from the Air Force in 1946 and joined Grant a year later in Texas. It was in 1947 that Jack, along with brothers Earl and Sam, legally changed his last name to Ruby.

As a young man in Chicago, Ruby reportedly ran errands for Al Capone's cousin and henchman Frank Nitti. A former Dallas sheriff once testified that Chicago mafia figures told him that Ruby was sent to Texas to run nightclubs that were fronts for illegal gambling operations.

According to evidence uncovered by the U.S. House of Representatives Assassinations Committee in the 1970s, Ruby was later linked to mobsters Carlos Marcello and Santos Traficante, who the panel considered prime suspects in a possible mob conspiracy to assassinate Kennedy.

Whatever he was doing behind the scenes, Ruby became known as a nightclub owner and at some point began attending services at Congregation Shearith Israel. Rabbi Hillel Silverman, who was the Dallas synagogue's spiritual leader from 1954 to 1964, says Ruby came to say Kaddish for his father.

"He came to minyan one day with a cast on his arm," Rabbi Silverman recalled. "I said, 'Jack, what happened?' He said, 'In my club, somebody was very raucous, and I was the bouncer.' "

Rabbi Silverman, now 89 and still leading High Holiday services every year, remembers Ruby well. Once Ruby showed up at the rabbi's house with a litter of puppies and insisted the rabbi take one. When the family went to Israel one summer, Ruby looked after the dog.

"The day of the assassination, we had our regular Friday night service, which became a memorial service for the president," Rabbi Silverman said. "Jack was there. People were either irate or in tears, and Jack was neither. He came over and said, 'Good Shabbos, rabbi. Thank you for visiting my sister Eva in the hospital last week.' I thought that was rather peculiar."

Two days later, Rabbi Silverman spoke to his Sunday morning confirmation class, expressing relief to the students that Lee Harvey Oswald was not Jewish or there might have been a "pogrom" in Dallas. He then switched on the radio and heard that a "Jack Rubenstein" had killed the assassin.

"I was shocked," said Rabbi Silverman. "I visited him the next day in jail, and I said, 'Why, Jack, why?' He said, 'I did it for the American people.' "

I interrupted Rabbi Silverman, pointing out that other reports had Ruby saying he did it "to show that Jews had guts." The rabbi sighed.

"Yes, he mentioned that," Rabbi Silverman said. "But I don't like to mention it. I think he said, 'I did it for the Jewish people.' But I've tried to wipe that statement from my mind."

Another person close to Ruby who tried, unsuccessfully, to block out the past is his nephew, "Craig" Ruby. (He asked that I not publish his real first name). His early memories are pleasant: Uncle Jack having a shot of whiskey with Craig's father, doling out silver dollars to the kids, his flashy sports cars.

Like millions of Americans, Craig watched Oswald's murder live on television. Soon afterward, he and his mother heard the name of the gunman.

"Did you ever hear the expression 'The colour drained from her face?' I literally saw my mother's face go from flesh to green," he recalled. "At age 12, that was a little freaky to watch."

Half a century later, Craig is still bitter over the dramatic effect his childless uncle's act had on the extended family, including bomb threats and huge legal bills. Given his last name, Craig was an easy target for bullies during his junior high school years in Dallas. But worst of all was facing Uncle Jack himself.

"One Sunday my dad insisted we go to see Jack in jail," Craig said. "Outside, a police car's siren started up, and my uncle was standing there with this incredibly intense, wild-eyed look on his face, and he yelled, 'You hear that? You hear that? They're torturing Jews in the basement!' That particular experience was traumatic enough to where talking about it right now, 50 years later, is turning my gut into a knot."

Rabbi Silverman, who later testified before the Warren Commission, also vividly remembers his jailhouse visits.

"In prison, he deteriorated psychologically," the rabbi said. "One time I walked in and he said, 'Come on, rabbi, duck underneath the table. They're pouring oil on the Jews and setting it on fire.' He was quite psychotic."

My initial connection to the Ruby family was through Grant, who I convinced to appear on ABC's Good Night America program in 1976. Later I visited her several times at her apartment in Los Angeles, where she once gave me the last piece of stationery from Jack's Carousel Club.

She introduced me to her brothers – Earl, who owned a dry cleaning store in Detroit, and Sam, who lived in the Los Angeles suburb of Sylmar. Sam showed me the one picture he had of their immigrant parents as well as the rusting car Ruby drove to the Dallas police station the morning he shot Oswald.

In 1991, Earl allowed me to rendezvous with him in Dallas on the day he retrieved Ruby's gun, which he won after a decades-long legal battle. I later showed the weapon on television for the first time since 1963, shortly before it was auctioned off for $220,000.

The brothers also downplayed Ruby's ties to the mob. Sam, who died in 2008 at age 95, leaned in close and lowered his voice, confiding: "These guys would come into Jack's club, and you had to be nice to them, ya know."

Ironically, when Earl chose a place for us to meet in Dallas the day he was given Ruby's gun, he picked an Italian restaurant better known for its links to the Mafia than its lasagna. (Earl died in 2006 at 90.)

Some conspiracy theorists believe Ruby was ordered to silence Oswald by his organized crime contacts. Others, who think the murder was an impulsive act, point to Ruby's fury over an anti-Kennedy advertisement in a Dallas newspaper the morning of the president's visit. It was paid for by a right-wing Jewish activist named Bernard Weissman, which Ruby thought put Jews in a bad light.

We will never know for sure. What Craig Ruby knows for certain is that he did not mourn his uncle's death from cancer in 1967. His family had moved to Chicago by then and when he saw the headline announcing Ruby's death, he felt like a weight had lifted.

As for having a connection to one of the darkest moments in American history, Craig Ruby's view has not changed in 50 years.

"I wish to God it hadn't happened to us."

Hollande urges halt to settlements

French president vows to stay vigilant on Iran nukes

JTA

JERUSALEM — France will uphold economic sanctions on Iran as long as necessary, French President Francois Hollande said in Israel on Sunday.

It was Hollande's first visit to the area since he became president more than a year ago, and he met with Israeli and Palestinian officials.

The meetings come as western powers are preparing for another round of negotiations with Iran over its alleged nuclear weapons program.

"France considers [Iran] to be a threat to Israel, and it is clearly threatening to the region and the world," Hollande said upon arrival at Ben Gurion Airport. "France will not give up or compromise on nuclear proliferation, and as long as we are not completely sure that Iran has given up nuclear weapons, we will continue to maintain our position."

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said at a welcoming ceremony for Hollande that Israel views France as a true friend.

"France, like Israel, aspires to a stable, moderate Middle East in which the peoples live in peace with each other, in security and mutual respect," Netanyahu said. "You, Mr. President, have taken a resolute stance regarding Syria, and in the face of Iran's relentless attempts to arm itself with nuclear weapons, which would endanger not just Israel, but regimes and countries throughout the Middle East. It would also endanger France, Europe and the entire world."

It has been reported that France was the one country that stood in the way of the P5+1 world powers (the UN Security Council's five permanent members plus Germany) signing an agreement with Iran last week in Geneva. The agreement reportedly would have offered an easing of economic sanctions in return for Iran halting high-level uranium enrichment.

"The citizens of Israel are full of gratitude to France for standing by our side in times of difficulty. We will never forget it," Israeli President Shimon Peres said at a welcoming ceremony at the President's Residence in Jerusalem.

On Monday, Hollande called on Israel to cease all settlement construction, praising Netanyahu for halting a recent announcement of more apartments in the West Bank. Speaking at a press conference in Ramallah alongside Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, Hollande urged both sides to continue to make goodwill gestures to create an atmosphere conducive to peace, suggesting the Palestinians give up or at least soften their insistence on the right of return.

"For a peace agreement to be reached, France demands the total and definite halt of settlement construction because it compromises a two-state solution," the French president said. "I said that to the Israeli authorities in friendship. I say here to the Palestinians that they, too, need to make efforts to deal with difficult and complicated problems, notably the refugees."

For peace to be achieved, "realistic propositions" will have to be made, the French president said, referring to the Palestinian demand for a so-called right of return for some five million Palestinian refugees and their descendants. "If not, then there won't be an agreement."

Abbas said that in accordance with the Arab Peace Initiative, a "just and agreed-to" solution to the refugee problem would have to be found. "Let's sit down around the [negotiating] table and let's discuss a just solution and see if we can perhaps agree on it, and sign this peace agreement."

Hollande travelled to Ramallah on Monday for a meeting with Abbas in the Muqata'a, the third meeting between the two leaders meet since Hollande took office in May 2012. Hollande also laid a wreath at the grave of the late Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat.

Hollande said he was hopeful because Palestinians and Israelis had agreed to negotiate a final-status agreement. Both sides took painful steps to enable these talks to commence, "but more gestures are needed if one wants to arrive at an agreement," he said.

"France is an exceptional position, because it is a friend of the Israelis and it is a friend of the Palestinians who want peace," he said. "One has to make gestures, always gestures, because it's going to be the last gesture that counts, that will enable peace."

The French president mentioned that Netanyahu last week withdrew plans for new West Bank settlement construction, saying that he considers the prime minister's move as a gesture that allowed the Palestinian negotiators to continue with the talks.

Last Tuesday, Israel's Housing Ministry published tenders for the planning of some 20,000 settlement units — an unprecedented number. Netanyahu hastily ordered the project to be rolled back, saying it constituted "an unnecessary confrontation with the international community at a time when we are making an effort to persuade elements in the international community to reach a better deal with Iran."

Interns edit Scholastic book without Israel

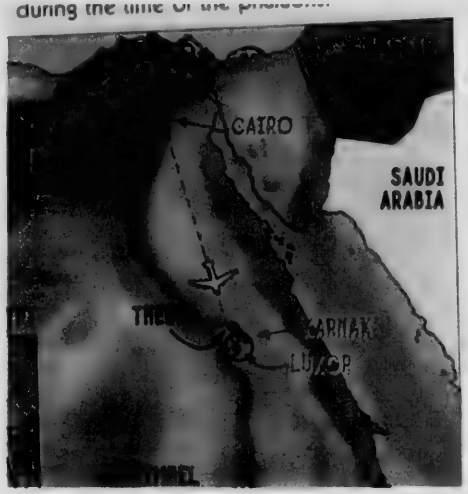
Elhanan Miller
The Times of Israel

The vast majority of Scholastic's proofreaders are paid interns with little qualifications to correct factual errors in the books they review, such as the one containing a map omitting Israel, a former production intern at Scholastic said last week.

Hours after an article first published in The Times of Israel, the world's largest children's book publisher expressed "regret" on its blog for erasing Israel from a map in the book Thea Stilton and the Blue Scarab Hunt, published in 2012. Scholastic promised to stop shipment of the book, revise the map and reprint it, but it provided no explanation on how the error came about or what it would do to prevent similar ones from taking place.

Speaking to The Times of Israel from New York on condition of anonymity, the former student employee – who had reviewed several maps in Scholastic books during her six-month internship – described typical Scholastic proofreaders as "bored out of their minds," with no specific knowledge of the subject matter in books they review. She estimated 75 per cent of Scholastic's proofreaders are interns, not full-time staff.

"As an intern, I haven't majored in history and I don't have any degrees in geography or mapping. They basically just trusted me to use any references at my disposal and check the map that I had been given against the Internet or reference books of any sort," she said.



The map of the Mideast does not show Israel

She said that during her time at Scholastic, a map – like any other graphic image – would be checked for factual or artistic errors together with the book's text.

Once, the intern was asked to check the accuracy of maps in a book about the Holocaust. It was she who realized, without guidance or instruction, that she must use a historic map of Europe as reference rather than a contemporary one.

"I had to be educated enough to know that you can't use a current map of Europe for that book," she said. "I don't know if every intern... is going to spend as much time as I did to make sure the images are factually correct. I happen to care enough about the topic to make sure the map is correct, but I don't know if I would have employed the same attention if it were a different situation."

Though she did not yet work at Scholastic when Thea Stilton and the Blue Scarab Hunt was published – it's book No. 11 in the series, copyrighted in 2009 and translated in 2012 – the intern said that as far as company policy is concerned, it must have been reviewed by at least three or four people in the United States.

"I think it's pretty safe to say that several people saw this map and let it go," she told The Times of Israel.

Adina Golombek, a Jerusalem resident who emigrated to Israel from Toronto last year, said she was shocked to discover Israel's absence while reading the book with her seven-year-old son.

"I wanted to show my son where we lived in the Middle East, but it didn't say Israel on the map; instead it said Jordan," Golombek told The Times of Israel. "I showed him the problem and drew in the border of where Israel is today."

Translated from Spanish or Italian, the Geronimo Stilton series is adapted by Scholastic's editors to an American audience. The erroneous map was almost certainly inserted in the original Italian version of the book and was overlooked by Scholastic, the intern concluded.

In a statement to The CJN, Kyle Good, senior vice-president of corporate communications for Scholastic said, that, "Thea Stilton and the Blue Scarab Hunt, a title in the Geronimo Stilton series, includes a map that inadvertently omits Israel. Scholastic is stopping shipment on this title, revising the map, and going back to reprint. We regret the error."

Peace talks will continued despite hurdles: Abbas

The Times of Israel

The peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians will run their full course, "regardless of what happens on the ground," Palestinian Authority (PA) President Mahmoud Abbas said on Sunday.

"We are committed, and we will go to the full nine months, and then we will take the appropriate decision," Abbas told Agence France-Presse-AFP, the day before an official visit by French President Francois Hollande that is expected to focus on peace talks. Hollande arrived in Israel Sunday for meetings with Israeli officials.

"We have committed to continue the negotiations for nine months, regardless of what happens on the ground," Abbas told the French news agency without elaborating.

Under heavy U.S. pressure and following intense shuttle diplomacy by U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry, Israel and the Palestinians resumed peace talks in July after a three-year hiatus, agreeing to a nine-month timeline, set to expire in March 2014. For the duration of the talks, the Palestinians agreed to suspend their efforts to gain international recognition and to not pursue Israel in the international legal arena. Israel committed to freeing 104 Palestinian prisoners who committed their crimes before the Oslo accords were signed in 1993. The second phase of that agreement was completed late last month.

The negotiations have hit some hurdles so far, including an uptick in terror attacks perpetrated by Palestinians, with the latest incident occurring just last week when a 16-year-old Palestinian youth stabbed an 18-year-old IDF soldier to death while the soldier was sleeping on a bus. Israel has also made continued announcements of planned construction in the settlements, the latest of which was swiftly scuttled last week by Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

The Palestinian negotiating team resigned last week, blaming continued settlement activity. Three weeks earlier, Saeb Erekat, the chief negotiator, and Mohammed Ishtayeh, had also tendered their resignation citing Israel's "lack of integrity," following Israel's announcement that it intends to demolish 20 Arab-owned buildings in east Jerusalem.

Neither resignation was formally accepted by Abbas. "The delegation to the talks handed in its resignation, which we have still not accepted," he told AFP, adding that the PA leadership was still deciding what to do – convince the team to return, or appoint a new one.

Earlier this month, Kerry launched an unusually bitter public attack on Israeli policies in the West Bank, and warned that if current peace talks fail, Israel could see a third intifadah amid growing international isolation. He also said that calls for boycott, divestment and sanctions would increase in such a case.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas

"The Palestinian people know that the way to peace is through negotiation. But they also know we are insisting on Palestinian constants," Abbas said, referring to Palestinian demands that an agreement be based on the 1967 borders, with east Jerusalem as the capital of a future Palestinian state, and a resolution to the Palestinian refugee problem created with the establishment of Israel in 1948.

"That is what the Palestinian people are asking us to get from the Israeli side. If we don't get that, we won't sign anything," said the PA president.

Israeli delegation brought 100 tons of equipment, supplies

The delegation brought 100 tons of equipment and supplies.

Merin said the local officials and residents, as well as the medical staff of the local hospital, "greeted us warmly.

"We are working hand in hand with the Filipino people," he said.

Merin, a cardiac surgeon and deputy director of Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem, says the Israelis have also performed surgeries in the local hospital in concert with local doctors "to give them some of our knowledge."

Despite the death toll of more than 3,000, which is expected to climb thousands higher, and the nearly two million displaced, Merin said the wounded are not wandering the streets the way he saw in Haiti following the 2010 earthquake. He was also part of the Israeli team that travelled to Japan in the aftermath of its 2011 tsunami, and he said the Japanese infrastructure was better able to withstand a disaster.

At about 4 a.m. Sunday, a man who had been stabbed in the chest was brought to the Bogo City field hospital by friends. Doctors put in a chest drain, which Merin said was beyond the capabilities of the local hospital.

"I am not sure what would have happened if we had not been around," he said.

Mobilizing and operating the field hospital has cost Israel millions of dollars, Merin said, as well as lost manpower. The medicines and much of the equipment brought in will remain when the team members leave in about two weeks, he added.

Merin, who is volunteering, believes the IDF is able to mobilize so quickly in the wake of natural disasters because it operates as an army unit, sending an advance team that allows the unit to deploy quickly upon arrival.

One of the logistics officers left with the team for the Philippines two days after his wedding, despite being on leave from the army for the occasion.

Israelis, Merin said, are "ready to drop everything and come and assist anywhere in the world that we need to be."

His team in the Philippines, he added, is "really treating [the patients] with all their heart."

The lure of cheaper prices has drawn Canadians south of the border in increasing numbers since the dollar started hovering around parity a decade ago. And there may be no better time to take advantage of those lower prices then when you have bulk Chanukah gift shopping to do.

Keith Pitts, author of The Canadian Cross-Border Shopping Guide and the blog, 2sidesof49, estimates you can save as much as 15 to 25 per cent on electronics and up to 100 per cent on clothes.

But in order to maximize those savings, it's essential to take holiday shopping seriously and create a plan of attack.

"Plan your cross-border shopping trip the same way you plan any other trip," Pitts says. "If you're going to go to Paris, you're not just going to go over there, get off the plane and say, 'Gee what I am going to do today.'"

First, figure out what gifts you want to buy and then research the best prices on online sites.

Then you have three options. One, do it the classic way. Drive down to the mall, get some Chinese for lunch and browse.

Or, you can do it the lazy man's way and set up a mailbox in a border city. These are cheap, easy to do online, and usually designed specifically for Canadians. Then just address your online shopping to the mailbox, drive down, pick it up and go right back over the border.

The bonus is that you can save a bit on sales tax, since many online American retailers aren't required to charge sales tax.

With these two shopping methods, you'll still save even with the price of gas for driving down.

The final shopping option works well for snowbirds and for those who have short shopping lists: just mail your gifts back home. Gifts under $60 are not subject to duty or taxes and postal service is much cheaper than here – Pitts says it's usually only $6 or $7 to send a package.

And although it's always tempting to try to sneak in items through the border, Pitts says not to bother. That's in part because they only charge GST at the border at five per cent, and duty is variable based on where items were manufactured. It is up to the discretion of the border agent, but can be negligible.

Even with the extremely high duty charged on alcohol, major savings can still be realized (and alcohol is a great gift to stockpile for that night-before-Christmas-forgot-to-buy-the-neighbour-something emergency).

"A wine that my wife drinks is about $16 a bottle here. Down in the States, it's about $10 a bottle, but they had a sale on that when you buy one bottle you get your other bottle for a dollar," Pitts says. "So now, the bottle of wine is $5.50. On that $5.50 bottle, you pay your 30 per cent duty and taxes on it, and you're still coming in with a bottle of wine at $7.50." That's a savings of about 47 per cent.

"You need to always declare and keep your receipt with you," he says. "Even if you're paying duty on it you're still going to be saving."

Israeli chef shares memories and recipes

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

City Shul recently served up an evening of food and fun with leading Israeli celebrity chef and cookbook author Gil Hovav.

He spiced up his food demonstration with plenty of humour as he regaled the audience with family lore gleaned from his illustrious Yemenite, Sephardi and Ashkenazi background. He's the great-grandson of Eliezer Ben-Yehuda, father of modern Hebrew; the grandson of journalist Itmar Ben Aviv; and the son of Moshe and Drora, who were pioneers in Israeli public radio.

This lively event, sponsored by City Shul and Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University, was held at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life in support of City Shul, the new downtown Toronto Reform congregation founded by Rabbi Elyse Goldstein.

Rabbi Goldstein said when she and Toronto food writer and author Bonnie Stern lead their culinary trips to Israel, they always visit Hovav. "He's very connected to Bonnie through their shared experiences in the culinary world.

"When we found out Gil was coming to Canada, we immediately invited him to do a food demonstration for City Shul, and he immediately said yes. It was a great event."

Hovav showed the audience how to make zehoug (hot Yemenite relish). "The number of zehoug recipes in existence correlates with Yemenite households," he wrote in the recipe handout. "Each family safeguards its own recipe.

"Some recipes are made with cloves, without cardamon, with a lot of salt or with red peppers instead of green. It all depends on the Yemenite region of origin and on intricate tribal politics."

Hovav offered many stories about his Moroccan grandmother (Ben-Yehuda's daughter-in-law), who was famous for her fish recipe. "She made the best Moroccan fish in Israel." He said he has tried to replicate her recipe, but he confessed that his is not as a good as his grandmother's. "She never gave me the recipe."

His version, which can be found below, is from his only English cookbook, Confessions of a Kitchen Rebbetzin by Rebbetzin G. H. Halpern (Toad Publishing, 2012; distributed by Modan Publishing House Ltd., Moshav Ben Shemen, Israel).

Hovav, who has written 10 cookbooks and three novels, said the authorship of the book is a hoax, because he is clearly not a rebbetzin. He reveals his true identity in the last chapter.

In an interview with Haaretz last November, Hovav said that Confessions of a Kitchen Rebbetzin was written in admiration for the many women in Israel who cook for their large families.

This kosher cuisine cookbook – it draws on kosher recipes from a variety of culinary traditions across Israel – is only sold in Israel.

ZEHOUG (HOT YEMENITE RELISH)

1 whole garlic bulb
1 tbsp. black pepper
1 tbsp. ground cardamon
1 tbsp. ground cumin
1 tbsp. salt

A latke is a latke is a latke…

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

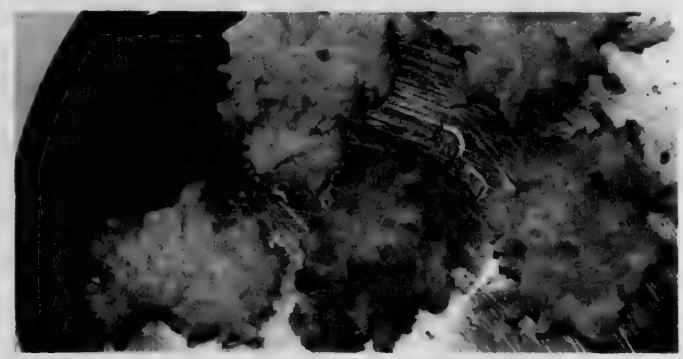
It's kind of a joke that if you ask 100 Jews the same question, you'll get 150 answers, and Chanukah fare seems the perfect topic to test that premise. Because we're lucky enough to have a holiday with a mandate to eat food fried in oil for eight days, we could conceivably serve eight different interpretations every night, right after we light the candles in the menorah.

Still puzzled by the question, how far afield from grandma's latkes folks really want to go, I asked several renowned chefs to enlighten us. The first question was, "Is it written in some tablet somewhere that latkes will be flat, dry and tasteless if we use any other potato than the sturdy, starchy russets?"

"It's all about the science," said Jeffrey Nathan, chef and owner of Abigael's kosher restaurants in Manhattan. "Russets and Yukon golds have the same high starch content, so you need less flour to bind the latke together. The less flour, the richer the potato flavour, and that's what we all want."

Nathan favours the Yukon's earthy flavour and creamy texture and, of course, there's that beautiful golden colour. But they're also considerably more expensive, so save them for intimate get-togethers or mix them with the russets, he suggests.

If you want to add different vegetables such as zucchini, cauliflower, carrots, yams or parsnips, you need to adjust the starch accordingly. Nathan recommends using 3/4 potatoes as a base and 1/4 of the other vegetables. When adding yams or parsnips, use no more than 50 per cent, as these root vegetables have almost no starch content and the latkes won't get crispy.



SWEET POTATO LATKES

From Michael McNally, chef/owner of London Grill in Philadelphia, Pa.

This batter can be made a day in advance, as sweet potatoes do not brown after they are peeled.

4 large sweet potatoes (3 lb.) peeled
1 large onion (1 lb.) halved
4 large eggs
1 cup flour
salt and pepper to taste
1/2 tsp. nutmeg
1-1/2 cups oil (combination of canola and pure olive oil) for frying

Grate potatoes and onions on a box grater. Add eggs, flour, salt, pepper and nutmeg. Mix well. Heat oil in cast iron pan.

With a measuring cup scoop out 1/3 cup of mixture and form into pancake. Slide into hot oil, and cook 8 to 10 minutes on each side.

in a food processor and pulse until the mixture becomes a coarse paste. Roughly chop the coriander and add to the food processor with remaining ingredients.

Process the mixture until it becomes a glossy green paste. Fill jars or other containers with the relish and store in the fridge. This condiment has a very long shelf life (one year, according to Hovav), as long as it is kept refrigerated.

HOT MOROCCAN FISH

7 boneless, grouper fillets, 8 oz. each (halibut or cod can be substituted)
1/3 cup olive oil
1 green pepper
1 red pepper
1 yellow pepper
1 fresh hot chili pepper, red or green
1 whole garlic bulb
3 cups crushed tomatoes
1 tsp. hot paprika
1 tbsp. sweet paprika
1 tsp. ground cumin
1 tsp. ground turmeric
3.5 oz. tomato paste
1 cup boiling water
salt and freshly ground pepper to taste
1 cup chopped coriander

Cut peppers into wide strips and discard seeds. Peel and roughly chop garlic cloves. Slice chili pepper thinly. In a large skillet heat olive oil on medium heat. Add peppers and garlic and fry for five minutes.

Carefully add crushed tomatoes. Bring mixture to a boil. Reduce the heat and simmer for 15 minutes, stirring from time to time. Season sauce with salt and pepper. Gently place fish fillets skin-side down in tomato sauce.

In a small bowl, mix together water, tomato paste and spices and pour over fish. The liquid should cover the fish. If it doesn't, add more boiling water. Bring the sauce to a boil. Reduce the heat, cover, and cook for 20 minutes.

Serve fish with plenty of sauce and garnish with chopped coriander. Makes 8 servings.

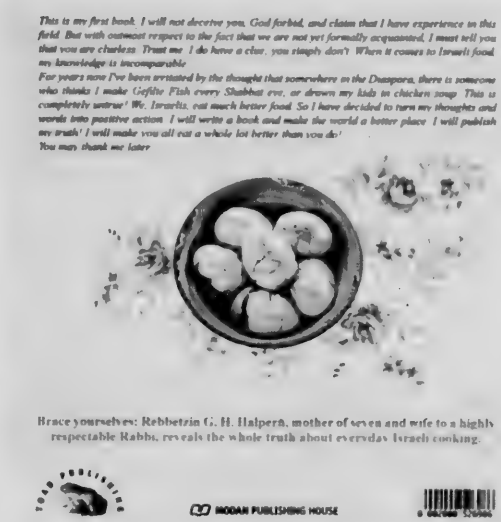
BEEF SOFRITO

2 lb. beef, cut into cubes
6 tbsp. vegetable oil
2 tbsp. sweet paprika
10 garlic cloves
2 carrots, roughly chopped
1 cup hot water
6 potatoes, peeled, cut into wedges
salt and pepper to taste

In a large pot, fry the cubes of beef in 1 to 2 tbsp. oil until browned. Add the paprika, garlic and carrots.

Add water and bring mixture to a boil. Cover pot, lower heat and simmer stew for two hours. Check intermittently to make sure the meat is covered with liquid.

After two hours, fry potatoes in oil. Add extra oil if necessary.



This is my first book. I will not deceive you, God forbid, and claim that I have experience in this field. But with outmost respect to the fact that we are not yet formally acquainted, I must tell you that you are clueless. Trust me. I do have a clue, you simply don't. When it comes to Israeli food, my knowledge is incomparable.
For years now I've been irritated by the thought that somewhere in the Diaspora, there is someone who thinks I make Gefilte Fish every Shabbat eve, or drown my kids in chicken soup. This is completely untrue! We, Israelis, eat much better food. So I have decided to turn my thoughts and words into positive action. I will write a book and make the world a better place. I will publish my truth! I will make you all eat a whole lot better than you do!
You may thank me later.
Brace yourselves: Rebbetzin G. H. Halperń, mother of seven and wife to a highly respectable Rabbi, reveals the whole truth about everyday Israeli cooking.
MODAN PUBLISHING HOUSE

Add fried potatoes to stew. Stir well so the potatoes soak in the sauce. Season with salt and pepper. Cook in covered pot for another half an hour. Makes six servings.

Festival of lights: a time to share in holiday spirit

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

Every November, the temperature drops and days become dreary, but this fall, families have something to celebrate earlier than usual. Chanukah, 25 Kislev, 5774, begins Nov. 27, at sundown and ends Dec. 5.

The Jewish festival of lights signifies the re-dedication of the Second Temple in Jerusalem at the time of the Maccabean Revolt. During that week, Jews recall how a single flask of oil found in the Temple lasted eight days. Potato latkes fried in oil have become a Chanukah mealtime favourite. Families gather around the menorah each night to recite a blessing and light the candles.

Exchanging gifts has become synonymous with Chanukah. Parents present the children with chocolate, gelt, dreidels and other items each night. In addition, grandparents and dinner guests join in the festivities. Besides toting tokens for the children, guests often purchase presents for their hospitable hosts. Gifts run the gamut from sweets and wine to flowers and novelty items. In addition, books are available for every age and interest group.

Yiddish Wisdom: Humor and Heart from the Old Country offers a compendium of timeless Yiddish proverbs and expressions for adults, whereas Bedtime Math: A fun excuse to stay up late features challenges for children from preschool through the elementary grades. Distributed by Raincoast Books in Canada, both titles are bound to become welcome additions to the family bookshelf.

Translator Rae Meltzer and illustrator Christopher Silas Neal achieved their goal in transcending all cultures and ethnic backgrounds in Yiddish Wisdom: Humor and Heart from the Old Country. The delightful, pocket-size hardcover text is chock-full of proverbs and expressions that embrace the philosophy and traditions of Jewish life. In its 99 pages, readers will discover 150 folk sayings expressed in Yiddish and English. Yiddish, which includes a blend of Hebrew fragments, German and other European languages, found a receptive audience in North America and other continents.

In recent years, numerous Yiddish words have become familiar entries in English dictionaries and media outlets. Whether surfing the net or watching television, one is likely to come across words such as maven, schlep and schmooze. Similarly, everyone, regardless of nationality or background, can relate to the significance of each expression.

Here's a sampling: "You can't sit on two horses with one behind" is the translation of a Yiddish saying illustrated in the book. People eager to find an expression to clarify a point or to recollect a family favourite will find Yiddish Wisdom a handy tool.

Bedtime Math: A fun excuse to stay up late is the brainchild of math enthusiast Laura Overdeck. The splendid illustrations by Jim Paillot add cheer and humour to the text. While the author, a mother of three, acknowledges reading is necessary to succeed, her prime mission is mesmerizing young minds with an everlasting penchant for math. Each math problem is categorized for "wee ones, little kids and big kids." The author avoids specifying grades and "correct" age levels.

Among the topics are food, pop culture, wild pets, extreme vehicles, sports and odd jobs. Since the author is attuned to children's interests, the situations covered in each exercise make good sense. In addition, illustrations, such as the one depicting a ketchup squeeze disaster, are amusing.

Educated at Princeton University and Wharton School of Business, Overdeck's affinity for math is shared by her husband, John. When their two-year-old started hollering for more math challenges, the couple was convinced their concept would intrigue other families. Bedtime Math is the result of their efforts.

Through friendly discussion, children will develop skills, Overdeck says, advising that we don't treat each exercise as a test. Bedtime math is an activity to be shared and enjoyed.

Chanukah dreidel cookies – give them a spin

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

The dreidel is the toy we look for at Chanukah, loved by adults and children alike. Dreidels are not only great fun, they also remind us that "a great miracle happened there." Cookies made into dreidel shapes reflect the importance of sharing food and watching children play during the eight-day festival of Chanukah. These dreidel cookies won't win you any gelt, and they are not made of clay, but they will certainly bring joy to your Chanukah celebration.

CHOCOLATE DIPPED ORANGE DREIDEL COOKIES

These golden melt-in-your-mouth cookies are a traditional Chanukah treat.

1/2 cup unsalted butter
1/2 cup icing sugar
1 egg yolk
1 tsp. pure vanilla
1/4 tsp. salt
2 cups flour
zest of one orange
3 tbsp. fresh squeezed orange juice

Decoration
1 cup bittersweet chocolate chips

In a food processor, cream together the butter and sugar. Add the egg yolk and vanilla. Combine in the salt, flour and orange zest.

Add the juice and run the processor until the dough forms a ball. Gather dough together and place into a covered bowl or Ziploc bag and chill several hours or overnight. Take dough out of fridge about one hour before rolling to allow dough to come down to room temperature. Roll to 1/2-inch thickness on a board sprinkled with icing sugar. Cut out shapes with a dreidel-shaped cookie cutter and place on a parchment-covered cookie sheet. Bake at 350 for 10-12 minutes or until bottoms brown lightly.

When cookies are cool, decorate with chocolate. Melt the chocolate chips in a 2-cup Pyrex measuring cup in microwave for one minute, then stir until smooth.

Dip each cookie halfway into melted chocolate (holding the cookie below the handle of the dreidel, not on the handle as it may break). Finally, place on parchment paper until chocolate hardens.

POPPY SEED DREIDEL COOKIES

The poppy seeds, or mohn, add an enjoyable crispy texture to these delicious cookies.

1/4 cup unsalted butter
1/2 cup sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. pure vanilla
2 cups flour plus up to 1 cup more
2 tsp. baking powder
1/4 tsp. salt
1/2 cup poppy seeds

Decorations:
1 tube blue decorating icing
1 tube blue decorating gel

In a food processor, cream together the butter and the sugar. Add in the eggs and vanilla and combine well. Add in the 2 cups of flour, baking powder, salt and poppy seeds. Place mixture on a floured board and continue to add in flour a bit at a time while kneading dough until it is no longer wet. Roll out dough on a floured board to 1/2 inch thick. Cut out shapes with a dreidel cookie cutter and place on a parchment-covered cookie sheet. Bake at 375 for 12-15 minutes or until bottoms brown lightly.

Cool completely before decorating.

Spice up Chanukah with new latke toppings

JNS.org

Mollie Katzen, an award-winning illustrator and designer, as well as best-selling cookbook author and popular public speaker, is back with a new round of recipes for Chanukah. With over six million books in print, Katzen is listed by the New York Times as one of the best-selling cookbook authors of all time and has been named by Health Magazine as one of "The Five Women Who Changed the Way We Eat."

Below are some of her ideas for how to freshen up your Chanukah table, without intruding on your latke loyalties. How about switching the toppings? You can always have the usual applesauce and sour cream on hand, but consider adding some intrigue and savoury twists – in addition to sneaking in vegetables, herbs, nuts, and olive oil – to the options on the menu. Add some lentil soup and a green salad, and your Chanukah celebration will be colourful and compelling.

CHIMICHURRI

Chimichurri is the "national sauce" of Argentina, and is also common in Honduras and other Latin American countries. It's a complex green paste, similar to a pesto, but containing a greater variety of herbs, and a tart taste from the presence of vinegar. Chimichurri is normally served with roasted or grilled meat or fish, but it's also delicious on cooked potatoes and vegetables, pasta, grains, and sandwiches. It's also a terrific dab of flavor for latkes, either directly on top, or as a green dollop on the sour cream.

This keeps for a week or two if stored in a tightly lidded container in the refrigerator. Just use as needed, as you would any condiment.

1 cup (packed) minced cilantro
1/4 cup (packed) minced parsley
1/4 cup minced scallions
1 tbsp. minced fresh oregano (or 1 tsp. dried oregano)
1 tsp. minced or crushed garlic big pinch of cayenne
2 tbsp. red wine vinegar
1/4 tsp. salt
6 tbsp. extra-virgin olive oil

Place the cilantro, parsley, scallions, and oregano in a food processor, and mince very finely. Add the garlic, cayenne, vinegar, salt, and process to a paste, with the food processor running until everything is fully incorporated. Drizzle in the oil at the very end. Transfer to a tightly lidded container and refrigerate until use. Yield: About 2/3 cup, preparation time: 10 minutes

CHIPOTLE CREAM

Chipotle chilies are smoked dried jalapenos. They most commonly come in cans, packed in a vinegar preparation called adobo sauce. A little bit of canned chipotles-in-adobo goes a very long way, both in terms of its heat and its powerful smoky essence. In this sauce, sour cream and/or yogurt create a soothing, luxurious vehicle for the chipotle flavour.

Serve this wherever it seems appropriate, on any egg dish, with beans, rice, cornmeal preparations, or drizzled onto soups or on latkes.

1 cup sour cream or yogurt (or a combination)
1/2 to 1 tsp. canned chipotle chilies, finely minced

Place the sour cream and/or yogurt in a small bowl and whisk until smooth. Whisk in 1/2 tsp. minced chipotles, and let it sit for about 10 minutes, so the flavour can develop. Taste to see if it needs more chipotle paste, and adjust as desired. Store in a tightly covered container in the refrigerator. Bring to room temperature before serving. Yield: 1 cup, preparation time: 5 minutes

RED PEPPER-WALNUT PASTE

Based on the Middle Eastern sauce called muhammar, this delicious paste is simultaneously pungent, slightly hot and sweet. I make it often and keep it around for many uses: as a topping for pilafs and other cooked grains, for spreading on pizza, toast, crackers, and sandwiches, and as a dip for cooked or raw vegetables. I also love it on latkes.

This keeps well for at least a week if stored in an airtight container in the refrigerator. In fact, the flavors deepen over time. For a California twist, you can use almonds in place of the walnuts.

2 heaping cups lightly toasted walnuts
2 to 3 medium cloves garlic
One 12-oz. jar roasted red peppers, drained
1 tbsp. cider vinegar
2 tbsp. fresh lemon juice
1/4 tsp. ground cumin
1 tsp. honey or agave nectar
1 tsp. salt (or to taste)
black pepper and cayenne to taste

Place the walnuts and garlic cloves in a food processor and pulse until they are finely ground, but not yet a paste. Cut the peppers into chunks, and add them to the food processor, along with the vinegar, lemon juice, cumin, and honey. Process to a fairly smooth paste, then transfer to a bowl, and season with salt, pepper and cayenne. Cover tightly and store in the refrigerator. Yield: 3 to 4 cups, preparation time: 10 minutes (after the peppers are roasted.)

App helps you enjoy the holiday

Jennifer Libman
Special to The CJN

When it comes to buying Chanukah presents for your children, it's easy to purchase the latest toys, books or electronics. However, for a gift that is more unique, and one that will help them learn and develop new skills, consider Appy Chanukah. This new application, available for $1.99 on iTunes for iPad users, is for parents looking for a fun and educational way to teach their children ages two to seven about Chanukah.

"As a mother of two young children, I am always looking for learning tools to teach my kids about the Jewish holidays," said Alin Wagner-Lahmy, the creator of Appy Chanukah. "When I was looking for ideas for teaching my children about Chanukah I was searching blogs, YouTube channels, and various websites to find the resources I wanted – there wasn't one comprehensive source."

Wagner-Lahmy, who has a background in digital and social media, decided to create Appy Chanukah to provide parents and children with a holistic learning experience. She consulted with friends Tzvia Bader and Julie Silverman to design the program.

The result is an application that provides everything from songs to holiday recipes, holiday key terms and a thorough understanding of Chanukah. The activities can be enjoyed either together as a family, or by the children sitting and learning on their own.

The team hired one the top animators in Israel to design the programs. "There is a real emphasis on the animation," said Wagner-Lahmy. "Children are exposed to amazing graphics today, so we wanted to make sure our programs would hold their attention."

Some of the activities include a virtual menorah that can be lit each night, interactive lessons about the main customs of Chanukah, games teaching children to read, speak and write common Chanukah words, as well as holiday puzzles. Children can also design and paint holiday greeting cards that can be emailed to friends and family.

Another component of the application teaches children to sing popular Chanukah songs such as Maoz Tzur and Mi Yemalel. Parents are able to film their children singing and post them to YouTube or Facebook.

The application also teaches parents how to celebrate Chanukah with their children offline. The Appy Chanukah blog is regularly updated to give parents fun ideas to get creative with their children like making edible dreidels or a menorah drip mat. "We don't want parents to think we're asking them to sit their children in front of their iPad all day," Wagner-Lahmy said. "Every day there's an idea for a recipe to make together, an arts and crafts activity, or a book recommendation."

Appy Chanukah was launched in mid-October and the response has been very positive. The team is already looking forward to the release of Appy Passover in March.

Homemade Chanukah desserts

Beverly Levitt
Special to The CJN

Every year we celebrate the first recorded war for religious freedom when the Jewish army defeated its enemies, took back its Temple, which had been defiled, and watched a tiny cask of olive oil stay lit for eight days, when it should have only lasted for one.

We hope that the no-fat proponents look the other way during Chanukah when the rest of us are relishing sufganiyot, fluffy fried doughnuts stuffed with sugary sweet fillings, Middle Eastern fried funnel cakes, fried apple fritters – any combination of flour, eggs and sugar that we can toss into a pot of bubbling, boiling oil and watch and wait as a few prosaic ingredients suddenly turn into crunchy, golden brown, melt-in-your-mouth addictive delicacies.

Although doughnuts are the most popular Chanukah dessert in the United States and Israel, where they are called sufganiyot, cookbook author Gil Marks says, "Jewish communities all over the world have their own regional version of these yeast fry cakes, which are made with yeast and shaped into round balls that become puffed when they are fried. They can also be powdered, glazed or sprinkled, but most people prefer them filled with jams for Chanukah. And these modern delicacies are prepared practically the same way today as they were 2,000 years ago."

In Germany and Poland, doughnuts were filled with plum and prune jams because these fruits were plentiful at Chanukah. A filling made of poppy seeds was also popular. Many people find Bismarks (presumably named after the first Chancellor of the German Empire) the crème de la crème of doughnuts. The small rim-shaped cakes are filled with generous helpings of custards and crèmes and often topped with chocolate or powdered sugar.

SUFGANIYOT

From Laura Frankel, author of Jewish Cooking for All Seasons, John Wiley & Sons

1 tbsp. dry yeast
1/3 cup sugar
3/4 cup room temperature dark beer (Guinness or Aventinus)
2-1/2 to 3 cups all-purpose flour
1/4 tsp. salt
1 tsp. cinnamon
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1/2 tsp. ground cardamom
4 egg yolks
2 tbsp. butter or canola oil
favourite preserves such as plum

Mix the yeast, 2 tbsp. of the sugar and the beer. Let sit until the yeast has proofed and is bubbly. Sift the flour and mix with the remaining sugar, salt, spices, egg yolks and the yeast mixture. Add butter or oil.

Knead the dough until it is smooth and forms a ball. Form into 2-in. balls. Place on a cookie sheet and let rise for about 30 minutes until they have doubled in size.

Heat oil to 350. Use a thermometer to make sure it stays at this temperature. If oil begins to smoke, it is too hot. Empty oil and start over.

Drop doughnuts into the oil about 5 at a time. Using chopsticks or tongs, turn to brown. When dark golden brown, remove to a plate lined with paper towels and drain excess oil.

Fill a pastry bag fitted with a small tip with the preserves. Pipe the preserves into the doughnuts and then roll the doughnuts in sugar to coat.

You may assemble the batter the day before and keep in the refrigerator in a Ziploc bag. The next morning, let it come to room temperature, roll out the balls, let them rise, and go through the steps until just before using. Makes about 24 doughnuts.

INSTANT DOUGHNUTS

Adapted from a recipe from allrecipes.com by chef/owner John Baylin of John Baylin Catering in San Diego. Baylin used lemon cake mix for this recipe.

1 18.25-ounce package cake mix such as Duncan Hines
1/2 cup flour
4 eggs
1-1/4 cups water
4 cups corn or peanut oil for frying
confectioners' sugar as needed

In the large bowl of an electric mixer combine cake mix, flour, eggs and water. On slow speed, beat batter until it is free of lumps. Heat oil in a deep pot until it reaches 375. Clip a candy thermometer to the side of the pot so you can monitor temperature throughout cooking.

Fill a soup spoon with batter and drop batter into the hot oil making sure not to overcrowd. Experiment until you find a size that you like.

Cook for approximately 5 minutes or until golden brown, flipping once so they are cooked evenly on both sides. With a slotted spoon carefully remove doughnuts from oil. Drain on paper towels. With a small sieve or sifter, dust with powdered sugar. Makes about 50 doughnuts.

APPLE FRITTERS WITH CHOCOLATE SAUCE

From chef and author Laura Frankel. She uses Saigon cinnamon, which gives a softer flavour.

3 crisp apples (such as Granny Smith), cored and cut into 1/2-in. thick rings
juice of 1 lemon
1 tbsp. cinnamon or less if you prefer
2 tbsp. sugar
For the batter
1 egg
4-1/2 oz. rice flour
6 oz. ice water
4 to 5 cups canola or other neutral flavoured oil for frying

Toss apples with the lemon juice. Stir together cinnamon and sugar; sprinkle over apples.

Whisk the egg. Add rice flour and water and lightly stir. Do not over mix.

Heat oil to 350. Dredge apple slices in batter and place, one by one, in the oil. Fry until batter is lightly browned and crunchy, about 2 minutes. Remove from oil and continue frying in batches. Cool apple slices on paper towels and sprinkle with more cinnamon and sugar if desired.

2013 seen as transition year to 'something better'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Economics can be an amazing thing – when it's not busy being the dismal science. It can link luxury purchases in China with manufacturing in Ontario. Or capital gains taxes in China with that country's rate of divorce. Or German exports to the very currency that its leader, Angela Merkel, has been questioning for years.

Recently, CIBC's deputy chief economist Benny Tal touched on developments in Canada, the United States, China, Germany and elsewhere in presenting an analysis of the state of the world economy that was nowhere near dismal. He was addressing a breakfast meeting of the Canadian Friends of Beit Issie Shapiro in their "Mornings with Movers" series.

All of the worrisome speculation of a year ago has not been borne out by developments, he said. The Chinese economy experienced "a soft landing," and not the hard crash that was feared; the U.S. economy bounced back and is on the road to recovery; the Euro was not ditched as a world currency; and in Canada, there is still some doubt as to the health of the housing market, but it is not set to collapse as it did in the United States in 2007.

All in all, 2013 proved to be "a transition year between something bad and something better – not good, but better," Tal said.

A specialist on economic developments and their implications for North American markets, Tal said the U.S. economy, which is growing by less than two per cent in 2013, is into a period of a "sustainable recovery. No question about it."

Although there are factors that could "drag" the economy down, "we might see some improvement in the United States in 2014 led by a lower degree of fiscal drag, continued improvement in housing, a significant pent up demand in consumption and, importantly, the reintroduction of credit to the system."

Likewise, the Eurozone is recovering despite the German government's concerns a year ago about its viability and of the future of its currency, the Euro; in fact, a healthy European economy is necessary for the export-oriented German economy. In addition, "the real estate market [in Germany] is the most attractive real estate market in the universe," Tal said.

As for China, the government is changing gears away from a high growth orientation – it could expand at 9-10 per cent "if they want," – to one where economic power is shifting to the consumer.

Some 250 million young Chinese people, who have never known poverty, are showing "a propensity to consume that is higher than the U.S. teen," he said.

What's more, they're not interested in cheap junk. "They want quality and brand names," Tal said.

That meshes nicely with developments in the U.S. manufacturing sector, which took the opportunity afforded by the recent recession to restructure and employ its capital to increase productivity. The American manufacturing sector is experiencing "nothing short of a renaissance" after 45 months of growth. It is moving from labour-intensive companies to those that are capital intensive and which can produce the type of high-end goods sought by Chinese consumers, he said.

That could be good news for Canada, as Canadian firms "try to integrate itself into the supply chain created by U.S. manufacturing."

Tal also pointed to a likely – and unexpected – repercussion of the Chinese move away from production to consumption. The Chinese government has imposed a 20 per cent capital gains tax on second properties for married couples, leading to lots of work for divorce lawyers.

As for the broader economy, the Chinese move from production, which supported commodity-intensive infrastructure projects, has taken some of the wind out of the "mega-cycle in commodities."

That period is set to elapse, not collapse. Tal said he expected commodity prices to "go up in 2014 as part of a recovery, as part of a mini-cycle, not a mega-cycle." There is support for $100 oil, he continued, but not at $150 or $170 as in the past, as demand for these goods continues, but does not accelerate.

Turning to the U.S housing market, whose collapse was at the forefront of American economic troubles in recent years, Tal said banks are again willing to lend. There is lots of pent up demand and "the matrix that banks use is total delinquencies minus those that are delinquent for 180 days or more." The delinquency rate for 180 days is back at normal levels, he added.

As for the cost of borrowing, there was talk of the Fed slowly raising interest rates and "the market went crazy."

Nevertheless, Tal suggested rates could climb by 40 to 60 basis points over the next year to 18 months.

On the Canadian scene, Tal said the U.S. delay in approving the Keystone pipeline, which would bring oil from Alberta to southern U.S. refineries, has led producers to search for other options.

"They're not waiting," he said. "I see a lot of activity, in infrastructure, pipelines, rail."

Canada's economy is tied to the world market, which Tal said is recovering. That's good news as "the Canadian consumer won't be able to lift the Canadian economy.

"Being a small open economy we need the global economy to improve. With the debt level held by households so high we cannot count on the consumer, and with the expectation that the global economy will do better, exports will do better."

Canadian investors should focus on the global economy for investment opportunities. A portfolio should retain "high quality dividend stock," but "high beta [cyclical] stocks will probably do better.

"I think Canadian long-term [interest] rates will move alongside the U.S. [rates] and short-term rates will not move until late 2014 or early 2015," he said.

Roth Unbound is a capstone to author's career

Norman Ravvin

Roth Unbound
By Claudia Roth Pierpont
Farrar, Straus Giroux

In the final episodes of the most recent season of Mad Men, familiar characters sit in a darkened room – most of them in New York high rises – and gaze at a droning television. It's the newness of the technology still, in the '60s, a fresh intrusion into the lives of people steeped in books and newspapers, which surprises. But the subject matter is notable too: Americans stare at the disaster unfolding in Vietnam, and at the melee on Chicago streets during the 1968 Democratic national convention. The unspoken message is that the 1960s brought heavy public and political burdens to an otherwise powerful and prosperous nation.

Philip Roth's oeuvre looks increasingly like the best window back into American life after World War II. His early books were attacked for their presentation of Jewish assimilation and navel-gazing. He tried satire as his weapon in response to Richard Nixon in Our Gang. Portnoy's Complaint defined a pop cultural moment in 1969, reigning as the year's best-selling book. The Nathan Zuckerman novels pushed further afield, in their examination of American literary life, the cult of celebrity and the transformation of an immigrant community as it gained mainstream success.

More recent novels, including The Human Stain and American Pastoral, are masterpieces of portraiture, as time and place, the weight of history and identity are brought into brutally precise focus.

Roth's own life is intertwined, hidden in transformed ways in many of his books, so that we feel in a strange way that we know him. A recent response I heard to the stories of Roth's youth, collected in Goodbye Columbus, was that the reader felt herself to be part of Roth's scenarios and his characters' lives in a unique way, no matter how they have receded in time. Something about the author's voice, his address to the reader, the topicality of his material is responsible for such a readerly reaction.

Unlike other major American writers such as Don DeLillo and Thomas Pynchon, the question of who Roth is matters to both those who like and those who viscerally dislike him. Claudia Roth Pierpont's new literary biography Roth Unbound is propelled and at the same time hindered by Roth's unusual familiarity. Pierpont bases her book on a long-standing friendship with him, on substantial visits she made to interview and follow him in his routines, and on her rich relationship with the books themselves.

Yet, issues related to the genre of literary biography arise. Pierpont is a friend and a fan, so she is on Roth's side. This is a better position to write from than that of the biographer who is out to sink an author's reputation or to unearth headline-worthy news. But one can't help feeling, even with the books that Pierpont is willing to view as weaker efforts, the goal of Roth Unbound is to celebrate its subject.

Roth Unbound is a kind of capstone to Roth's career, appearing as it does after his announcement that he has had it with writing and is happy, having stopped doing the thing to which he dedicated his adult life. Pierpont places her interviews with Roth in the background of her discussion, referring to them only anecdotally, but her efforts effectively give Roth a final word on himself, an opportunity to comment on his successes and failures, both personal and creative.

Many of the things Pierpont has to tell us have appeared in other sources, and in this way, her version of Roth's life is at times a little more familiar than readers may want it to be. Aspects of his creative habits are laid out in ways that may be news to readers. Roth says he writes everything "spontaneously, with one incident providing inspiration for the next. There was no initial plan and no outline... He doesn't produce more than a page or two a day – sometimes agonizingly less – but he works his way through several drafts."

Pierpont examines the personal context and experiences informing Roth's novels. We learn a bit more than we've known about Roth's involvement in Communist-era Czechoslovakia. Beyond his work as general editor of the Penguin Writers from the Other Europe series, which brought such figures as Milan Kundera to North American readers, he undertook substantial efforts to support and ease the daily lives of Czech writers whose work was banned, or whose international royalties were routinely stolen by the Communist bureaucracy. But because Roth Unbound covers a lot of ground – from the late '50s till today – these fascinating aspects of a writerly life get a less attentive examination than they deserve.

In one particularly startling passage, Pierpont includes transcripts from White House tapes in which Richard Nixon and H.R. Haldeman discuss the impact of Roth's 1971 Our Gang:

Nixon: Roth is of course a Jew.

Haldeman: Oh yes... He's brilliant in a sick way.

Nixon: Oh, I know –

Haldeman: Everything he's written has been sick...

Nixon: I think the anti-Semitic thing, I hate to say it, but it can be very helpful to us.

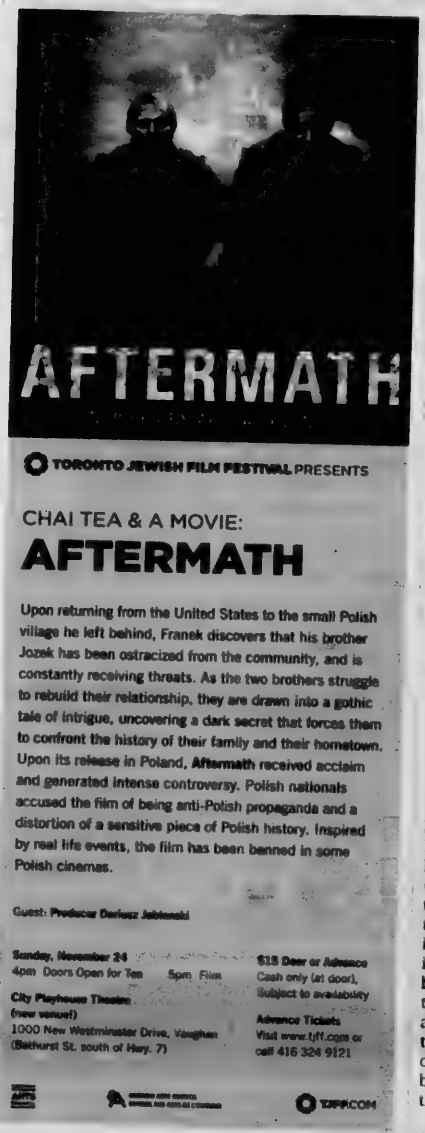
This is a short passage from a longer, grittier and grimly funny presidential back-and-forth that one might think Roth wrote himself.

Pierpont reminds us that much later in his oeuvre, in the 1997 masterpiece American Pastoral, Roth's fictional world "remains bound to history from its opening words: 'It was the summer of the Watergate hearings.'" Here Pierpont reflects affectingly on how Roth constructs a single scene – over 97 elegantly plotted pages at the novel's end – that sets his characters in counterpoint with the unravelling American social and political scene.

"The discussion that takes place," Pierpont tells us, "is about politics, pornography, and decency – carried on with all the urgency of argument and opinion that characterized those years, when the world seemed to be spinning away."

Here the contrast between Roth's fiction and the portrait of the American moment in Mad Men is glaring. The news of the day silences Don Draper as he sits with a drink in front of his droning TV. The impression one gets is that Americans did not know how to respond to the dramatic events they were watching. Roth Unbound, with its careful tour of four decades of fiction, brings to mind how Roth's characters talk, and talk, and talk in response to the events that envelop them.

Norman Ravvin's novels include The Joyful Child, Lola by Night and Café des Westens.



AFTERMATH
TORONTO JEWISH FILM FESTIVAL PRESENTS
CHAI TEA & A MOVIE:
AFTERMATH
Upon returning from the United States to the small Polish village he left behind, Franek discovers that his brother Jozek has been ostracized from the community, and is constantly receiving threats. As the two brothers struggle to rebuild their relationship, they are drawn into a gothic tale of intrigue, uncovering a dark secret that forces them to confront the history of their family and their hometown. Upon its release in Poland, Aftermath received acclaim and generated intense controversy. Polish nationals accused the film of being anti-Polish propaganda and a distortion of a sensitive piece of Polish history. Inspired by real life events, the film has been banned in some Polish cinemas.

Yemen Blues deserves all the attention

Jordana Divon
Special to The CJN

Something unusual was happening at Toronto's Koerner Hall.

To outside observers it might have looked like this: A mature, sophisticated audience, one that had started the evening by listening in its habitual, mild, sophisticated audience way, had suddenly risen to its feet mid-song, hands stretched over heads in a cacophony of clapping.

The architect of this raucous Royal Conservatory display was one Ravid Kahalani, a sinewy, braided, longhaired man in a shiny metallic suit who commanded the stage with such charismatic verve that almost everyone in attendance, including a few grandmother-aged participants, began to dance in their seats with enough energy to power a few windmills. A Brahms matinee performance this was not.

Kahalani is perhaps better known as the driving force behind Yemen Blues, an Israeli world music ensemble that has generated enthusiastic underground buzz since they made their debut at the Babel Med festival in Marseilles three years ago.

On Oct. 26, Kahalani and his dynamic five-piece band showed Toronto why they warrant the attention.

Though their music, a blend of original fusion sounds sung in Arabic, Hebrew and French, may not be suited to everyone's tastes, the 35-year-old front man's gifts as a live performer – the incredible energy he manages to create and the connection he builds with his audience – position him as an artist worth watching in any language.

It's no surprise, then, that the former dance student pays close attention to the more theatrical elements of his show.

"Many things that I do on stage are very thoughtful and I enjoy seeing the result of it," he explains in a pre-show interview, fresh off a 12-hour flight from Ben Gurion airport.

Ravid Kahalani is the driving force behind Yemen Blues. The son of Jewish-Yemenite parents, he cut his musical teeth on the songs and prayers of his ancestral home, but quickly found that his appetite extended far beyond familiar sounds.

"When you can control the situation and give people something, bring something out of them and they enjoy it in a special way, it's very exciting to see."

With Yemen Blues' debut album making the rounds and a second one currently in the works, the former protégé of Israeli superstar Idan Raichel appears to have finally hit his musical sweet spot.

"I wouldn't say that I found my sound because it's not only my sound even though it started from me," he says with modesty, acknowledging the contributions of his fellow band members. "[But] I took the album as my first solo project and I would say that I found myself in music when I created Yemen Blues."

Though Kahalani's natural talent made performing an inevitable career, his fascination with world music shaped him into the artist he has become.

The son of Jewish-Yemenite parents who came to Israel in order to escape political unrest, Kahalani cut his musical teeth on the songs and prayers of his ancestral home, but quickly found that his appetite extended far beyond familiar sounds.

"With time, I started to listen to blues and jazz and Bob Marley and Pink Floyd and I totally left the Yemenite music," he says, noting that he even spent time mastering Serbian Orthodox liturgical singing in his teens.

"I later met a friend who introduced me to West and North African music and this changed my life musically. I began to understand the connection between blues and Yemenite music, and Moroccan music and West African music, and all North African music, and so many other genres that came out of it like jazz and blues and funk and rock n' roll."

Instead of experimenting with one sound, he began to experiment with all of them, singing in whatever language his music demanded. In his youth, he even invented language to suit a song's particular rhythm or tenor when no existing words would do.

This sensitivity to what the melody and instrumentation demand has led industry types to label Kahalani as a fusion artist. It's a label he rejects.

"I don't think to frame music [in genres] is the right thing. I think that comes from a business place that people need to place music in categories, but these day when you see all kinds of fusion and culture music that combines many things, it's getting harder and harder [for executives] to put this music into boxes, so I don't really spend too much time thinking about it," he says.

The business end of the industry is often the necessary evil for artists who would rather be focused on creating and performing, but Kahalani isn't exactly complaining about the opportunities the industry has provided him.

At the same time, he says he doesn't feel any pressure to strive for a more mainstream sound in order to increase radio play at home in Israel.

"I don't think a musician creates music because he wants to be on the radio. He creates music because it makes him feel something. He thinks that this thing is beautiful and he loves it and thinks it works well," he says.

"[If anything,] my fame gives me strength to create more and feel more comfortable because it gives [me] the feeling that [I'm] good, that [I'm] bringing something that is true."

While that creative energy continues to burn, Kahalani is busy honing his onstage craft and enjoying the chance to play for international audiences on an increasingly frequent basis.

Last month's show marks Yemen Blues' third time in Canada, a country whose multicultural tapestry makes him feel at home.

"Canada is great. It feels kind of like home to play here," the jet-lagged performer concludes before heading to rest up before his big show. "People are really open and really into what they love with no borders. They very much respect the music in a professional and a spiritual way and those two things are the most important."

His love for Canada mutually affirmed, those who missed the opportunity to see him live this time shouldn't have to wait too long for another chance.

Thriller strips away hidden post-Holocaust layers

Joseph Serge
Interim Editor

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is presenting the Toronto premiere of the award-winning, controversial movie Aftermath on Nov. 24.

Although it is a work of fiction, this gothic Holocaust thriller was inspired by the 1941 Jedwabne massacre in Poland and was banned in several cinemas in that country.

It takes place in 2001. Franek returns to his native Poland after living in Chicago for around 20 years, to visit his estranged younger brother, Jozek who lives alone on the family farm since his wife suddenly took the kids and left for America.

The farm is in an isolated village. Franek has to take a taxi from the airport to the train station, and then a bus to the village from which the nearest stop is a long walk through winding country roads. He arrives at the family farm late at night and is greeted by his brother wielding an axe. He immediately gets into a heated debate with Jozek, accusing his older brother of abandoning their parents and not returning for their funerals.

Shortly thereafter a rock is thrown through the windows, and we quickly learn that Jozek is not well-liked by the local villagers.

The film, tightly written and directed by Wladylsaw Pasikowski, takes a creepy, suspenseful turn, similar in tone to the 1971 (and its poor 2011 remake) Straw Dogs. Franek sees that his brother is harassed at every turn and beaten up by drunks in a pub. At harvest time, the harvester doesn't come to their farm as scheduled, and soon Franek himself is being followed.

Curious, Franek discovers from the one friendly soul in town, a young woman who works at the clinic, that Jozek is collecting Jewish tombstones. She tells him that during the war, the Nazis ripped the gravestones from a Jewish cemetery and used them to pave a road. After the war, a new road was placed over them, but when a flood washed the new road away about 10 years ago, the gravestones were unearthed.

Since then, Jozek has been collecting them and erecting them on his farm. The villagers are especially upset that he plans on taking the stones from around the church bell tower.

Jozek admits this to his brother, telling him he's not sure what compels him to do this, only that it seems wrong to him that people are using these gravetones to walk on or as work benches.

"There's no one left to look after their dead," he explains, revealing in the process that he has learned to read Hebrew. He meticulously cleans these gravestones, reciting the names written on them.

Franek, whose language occasionally displays ingrained anti-Semitism (he calls Jews "Yids"), thinks his brother is crazy, but, as the older brother, feels the need to protect him.

Curious that no one seems to want to talk about what happened to the village's Jews during the war, he continues digging, at one time quite literally, despite the physical threats from the villagers. He soon discovers a big secret about the village's wartime past, one that, like the gravestones, the townspeople would prefer remain buried.

Aftermath is a fast-paced, suspenseful thriller inspired by a 2001 book, Neighbors, in which historian Jan T. Gross revealed that it was Poles who massacred the Jews in Jedwabne and not the Nazis, as the official government account reported.

Aftermath won the Yad Vashem Chairman's Award at the 2013 Jerusalem Film Festival.

It is screening at The City Playhouse Theatre, 1000 New Westminster Dr., Vaughan. Doors open for tea at 4 p.m. Screening at 5. Producer Dariusz Jablonski will be in attendance and a Q & A will follow.

For advance tickets: www.tjff.com. 416-324-9121.

Józek (Maciej Stuhr), left, and Franek (Ireneusz Czop) sit in shock after unearthing their family's secret in the Polish thriller Aftermath.

DJ takes part in new 'democratic' approach to radio

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Getting back on the Toronto airwaves this fall after an eight-month hiatus was like riding a bike, said radio veteran Dave Bookman, who has been part of the Toronto rock radio scene since 1991.

After 21 years at 102.1 the Edge, Bookman – or Bookie, as he's known on the radio – was ready for a change. He knew a new radio station, Indie88, would be starting up this summer, and he wanted to be a part of it, so he stepped down from his position at the Edge last December.

"Without getting too technical, the Edge and all stations have a lot of restriction on what they can play and when they can play it, and then you have the whole business of broadcasting. All these factors come into what makes a playlist," he said.

Being part of a brand new station meant he could help build something new, he said. "It's an opportunity to really stretch my legs and open up my record collection and play a wide variety of types of music."

Indie88, broadcasting on 88.1, has emphasized its "democratic" approach to radio, with the listeners voting on what the station should play. Someone listening to the online live stream can upvote or downvote each song that comes on, and the station regularly sends out surveys to determine what audiences want to hear.

Bookman called it an exciting new approach that has helped resolve some of the frustration he's felt with the radio industry in the past.

"The audience wasn't given enough intelligence," he said. "The way it's set up [at Indie88] is, we're trusting each other. If we go somewhere, they're going to come with us and we're all going to figure it out together."

Bookman said he has dreamed about being on radio ever since he was a little kid in Ottawa listening to the radio at night.

"I love the fact you could lie there and listen and put the pictures in your mind," he said, describing it as a magical platform for storytelling.

That magic still comes through today. Even though the technology has evolved to the point where everyone can be his or her own personal DJ, there's still something special about listening to the radio, Bookman said.

"I think it's a little bit of wonderment. I believe people like the fact that there's somebody else creating something for them. They want to laugh and have a good time and want to discover things."

It can be hard to find good bands out of the plethora of music releases today, he said. There have never been so many bands to choose from, but with lots of bands come lots of bad music.

"The one thing about today is, it's not as hard to create something, and I'm not sure that's a good thing," he said.

Just 10 or 15 years ago, musicians had to give up everything for the chance to put their music out there. "So, when someone did something, you knew there was a certain level of dedication to their craft," he said.

Not so today. Any kid with a computer can make music, he said, and only with time will we see the fallout from technology.

Even after so many years in the industry, Bookman said it's still an exhilarating and thrilling job, but he has other ideas he hopes to try as well. He hesitated to speak about some of the projects he worked on during his eight-month hiatus, but he mentioned an online venture called "Breakfast with Bookie," where he interviews people over a coffee or meal setting.

He's also continuing his weekly Nu Music Nites at the Horseshoe Tavern, which feature up-and-coming rock bands, showcasing 30 minutes of material each – about the length of his own attention span, Bookman joked. The idea is, if you don't like the band, just wait 30 minutes and something new will come up.

Dave Bookman

No matter what medium Bookman ends up in, he hopes to continue to deliver new music and make his mark on Toronto's music journalism scene.

Dave Bookman is on the air Sunday nights from 6 to 10 p.m. on Indie88.

Kids have fun learning about holidays with books

Lauren Kramer
Special to The CJN

The Jewish holidays present a great opportunity to explain Jewish history, customs and traditions through kid-friendly literature, and this year's Chanukah books from Kar-Ben take three very different approaches to the Festival of Lights.

In Esther's Hannukah Disaster ($7.95), author Jane Sutton introduces Esther as a lovable gorilla who is intent on purchasing Chanukah gifts for her animal friends. Trouble is, her gift choices aren't all that thoughtful.

The massive socks don't fit her mouse friend Sarah, her zebra friend Zack admits to not liking the red sweater she gives him, Josephine the turtle can't use the jogging suit, and Oscar the elephant is not amused by his book, 100 Jokes About Elephants. To rectify the situation, Esther invites her friends to a Chanukah party and asks them to bring their gifts and swap them for other items. This way, everyone goes home happy.

Andy Rowland's illustrations add mirth and entertainment to this Chanukah jungle tale, which highlights the importance of choosing gifts appropriate to the recipient. It does, however, place the bulk of its emphasis on Chanukah gifts rather than on less materialistic traditions associated with the holiday.

In Sadie's Almost Marvelous Menorah ($7.95), Sadie and her Hebrew school friends prepare for Chanukah by crafting their own menorot. They mould clay into candle-holders, paint and decorate and practise the Chanukah prayers in preparation for the first night. But before she can even light the candle Sadie's new menorah gets broken. The only surviving piece is the shammash, which gets used to light the candles on the other menorot in her home.

The ABC Hannukah Hunt ($7.95) is a book of rhymes and quick activities for preschoolers, offering a very brief description of the history of Chanukah interspersed with games, spot-the-difference activities and a maze. The rhyme scheme does not always work perfectly and feels forced at times, but nevertheless, there's enough in this book to hold a preschooler's attention to the end and to deliver an overall message that Chanukah is a fun holiday about great food, attractive candles, gifts, songs and visitors.

While it has nothing to do with Chanukah, Don't Sneeze at the Wedding (Kar-Ben, $6.95) is a delightful read for three-to-six-year-olds that describes the traditions involved in a Jewish wedding through the perspective of Anna, a flower girl at her aunt's nuptials. She loves the fancy dresses, makeup, flowers and fuss, but as she develops the first signs of a cold, she's anxious she will sneeze and interrupt the wedding. As the book references the chupah, the ketubah, the shared cup of wine, the Seven Blessings and the breaking of the glass, Anna tries to follow advice she's been given on how to prevent a sneeze from happening at the crucial moment.

On the final page, author Pamela Mayer goes into detail about what those traditions actually mean. Martha Aviles lends her extremely talented hands to the illustrations of Don't Sneeze at the Wedding, making this book a fun, entertaining and pictorially magnificent read for kids. It's an especially relevant one for children who have a wedding to attend but have no idea what to expect.

Interior designer has a flair for the dramatic

Gelman turned this bachelor pad into a stunning, sophisticated space for a young professional living in the Toronto Hunt Club in 2011.

House of Design founder Erica Gelman

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Interior designer Erica Gelman loves nothing more than an opportunity to turn a bland, boring house drowning in a sea of various shades of beige, into a posh, show-stopping dream home worthy of a magazine cover.

In fact, at just 29 years old, Gelman, who founded her business, House of Design, with her husband, Eric, in 2008, has made a successful career out of doing just that.

"I've always loved design. As a kid I used to ask my mom if we could go to open houses because I always loved walking through and seeing what they had done," said Gelman, a graduate from the International Academy of Design and Technology in Toronto.

"I'm talking back before I was even 10, back when sponge painting was the biggest thing. I remember saying to my mom 'We have to have sponge paint in our house too,'" she said, laughing.

But it wasn't until she was working as a contractor with another design firm in Toronto that she got the urge to go it alone.

"I was doing mostly commercial design and... I just knew that that wasn't going to be my creative avenue," she recalled.

Although some of her peers might be intimidated by the idea of running a business in addition to working as a designer, Gelman said that concept appealed to her.

"I've always been very business oriented," she said, adding that her family has been running its own business in the automotive industry for 20 years.

"I'm a Libra, so to me, that's always been my balance; the creative and the business aspects... I really don't feel balanced until I have both of them under control."

Another important aspect of her job is being able to understand and connect with her clients, develop a trusting relationship with them, and ultimately deliver a space they'll love.

"A lot of the times you might know that something is right for the space, and the client will say to you, 'No, that's not what I want,' and it's either because they're afraid to come out of their own comfort zone, or they can't envision it," Gelman said.

"Sometimes it becomes a really big struggle."

While the clients ultimately have the final say in how they want their space to look, "if you know that something is so right and so perfect for a space, usually the client will feel that from you," said Gelman, who describes her style as tailored and classic.

"I don't really like to stay too much on trends, I'd rather create spaces that feel timeless, and... it's just really personal."

Gelman isn't afraid to take risks and go for a dramatic look. Featured in the Spring 2013 issue of Canadian Home Trends Magazine, Gelman designed a dining room using a mix of texture and dark high gloss colour.

In a blog entry she wrote about designing that space, she described how she put it together.

"Lush velvets and silks create an instant air of luxury within the space... The walls are painted in a matte finish dark charcoal, and the ceiling is done in the same colour, but with a high gloss finish. Contrasted with the white mouldings, eyes are instantly drawn up, into and around the space."

Coming up with a bold, dramatic idea is one thing. Getting the client to give her the green light to go ahead with her design is quite another.

"You might have this brilliant idea walking through a space, but if it's not how the client wants to ultimately live at the end of the day – it's a matter of them being at their happiest in the environment that you created. It has to be a reflection of the homeowners," she said.

Another challenge is being completely invested in a project and confident about your design. Otherwise, it could reflect negatively in the execution.

"My confidence level has grown immensely since coming out of design school, but I knew that that I had to 'fake it until you make it,'" she said.

"Confidence level is huge, you really need to believe what you're telling people."

For those who dream of a design job, and think of it as little more than spending other people's money on glamourous home décor, Gelman warns that her career is a lot harder than it seems.

"Unless you love it 100 per cent whole-heartedly, it's a business that will really play on your emotions. Because design is really personal, and you have to be completely invested... you have to almost develop a thick skin about it as well."

The countless number of reality design shows might give viewers the wrong idea about what her job really entails.

"It's nothing like you see on TV. There is so much more organization and detailing... That's something they don't teach you [in design school]," Gelman said.

"You're taught all the principles, and you're taught elements. A lot of the times, people come out of school and they can formulate a really nice room, but to actually execute it is two totally different things."

On the other hand, Gelman said she would love an opportunity to showcase her talent on an interior design show.

"My ultimate goal is to build an entire house from the ground up, and if somebody wants to document that, I would love for that to happen. That's where my ultimate goal lies."

Trust is key in marriage

Ask Ella
By Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

I'm sure you've heard this story a thousand times, but it's blown my whole world apart.

Maddy, a close friend of mine, informed me about my husband Jack and one of his associates getting a little too close.

Every year, Jack and Maddy's company has a three-day conference in Chicago. Apparently, after one of the evening programs, Maddy went looking for Jack and heard that he has been seen going into the hotel room of one of his female associates from the Chicago branch.

Maddy couldn't believe it – she's known Jack for so long – so she went and knocked on this woman's door.

Jack was there, they had wine glasses in their hands and although they were dressed, she was wearing a robe and he had part of his shirt open and shoes off. Maddy asked Jack if she could speak to him for a second, and Jack told her to go to bed and he would see her in the morning.

Maddy told me she didn't sleep all night and didn't know what to do with this information. It wasn't until a month after the incident that Maddy finally let it all out. Knowing how this would affect me, she struggled with what the right thing to do was.

Of course, I'm glad she told me, but part of me wishes she hadn't. I already have so much to deal with raising two young boys while working and running our home.

Have I been as attentive to Jack as I should have been? Probably not. Do I look as good as I did when we first got married 15 years ago? Definitely not. Am I angry? Madder than a bull in a rodeo.

I haven't done anything with this information. I can't confront Jack, because I don't want to hear the words from his lips. Our family will be torn apart, and keeping my head buried in the sand means everything can remain status quo.

I realize deep down that it's anything but normal, but I'm afraid to ruin our family's routine. The boys will be devastated if we separate. I have no idea how I'll manage financially. I can't do this. Why did he do this to us? I hate him for this. Can you give me any advice at all?

Broken Trust

Dear Broken Trust

Let's examine what you've told me. Jack went into a hotel room of a female associate. He was seen fully clothed – sans shoes, relaxing and having a drink. He didn't seem to panic when he saw Maddy, but instead told her he would talk to her the next day. Why are you jumping to the worst possible conclusion?

You need to have a conversation with Jack. Be honest and tell him exactly what Maddy told you, and ask him for an explanation. My guess is that he will say he was relaxing with a colleague after a long day of seminars. Can you trust that to be true?

This is where the crux of the problem is. Do you trust your husband? That's a loaded question that you must think long and hard about. Has Jack given you any reason in the past not to trust him, or are you feeling insecure because you say you're not as attentive and maybe don't look the same as you did 15 years ago? Is this your problem or Jack's?

You are already thinking about separation without so much as a word between you.

Whether Jack has had an affair is a significant question, however the more important point is that you can't discuss this with your husband of 15 years. Marriage is not always bliss. Couples need to have difficult conversations. A successful marriage is hard work and trust is the solid foundation on which you can build the rest of the relationship. If you don't have that foundation, everything you build on top will remain shaky.

It's time to seek professional help to work out your trust issues. If in fact you find that your suspicions were correct, you have a difficult road ahead of you and a life-altering decision that will affect many people besides you and Jack.

Please don't put this off for one more day. You have two children who will be affected by how you conduct yourself through this situation. Take charge of your anxiety and deal confidently with whatever the outcome is.

Knowledge is power. Get to the root of the problem, whether it's yours or his, and deal with it, preferably together.

Don't give up the battle before it even begins.

Cookbook captures culinary diversity

Elaine Cohen
Supplements Co-ordinator

The title of Women's Philanthropy Mosaic: A cookbook celebrating Montreal's Jewish Culinary Diversity clarifies the contents and cultural significance of this beautifully bound coffee-table tome. The dedicated volunteer contingent of women's philanthropy, an initiative of Federation CJA, began brainstorming in 2010 and launched their brainchild in April 2013. All proceeds from sales of this not-for-profit cookbook benefit vulnerable women in the community.

The top five chefs – Gail Adelson-Marcovitz, Etty Bienstock, Rhonda Leibner, Debby Newpol and Heather Paperman – gathered recently at federation headquarters to discuss the project they conceived as members of the committee of women's philanthropy. They praised more than 200 astute chefs and members of the community who worked with them to bring it to fruition. They schlepped, shopped, chopped, cooked, tasted, tested, fine-tuned and re-tested every recipe. They also played a role in the staging and photo shoots, along with photographer Jean Longpré. The photo presentations are exquisite.

Now, they are busy with marketing and distribution, delighted with the positive feedback, and have continuously received book orders from here and abroad.

Initially, the project got underway by sending a request to people on Federation CJA's mailing list. Recipients were asked to submit recipes that had been in the family for generations as well as those emanating from their countries of origin. From more than 1,000 responses, the list was whittled down to 110 winners. Bylines are not attributed to recipes because many are a fusion of winners that were adapted and re-evaluated. The chefs were careful to avoid duplication and plagiarism by discarding unsuitable submissions.

"The concept is more than a cookbook," said Adelson-Marcovitz, who presided over women's philanthropy when the project was initiated. "We wanted to expose more women in the community to what we do at CJA. Through their participation in Mosaic, many more now have a personal connection."

Mitzi Dobrin and Leesa Steinberg underwrote the cost of the book in tribute to their community-minded mothers, Helen Roth Steinberg and Gertrude Dover Steinberg.

Women's philanthropy achieved its multi-faceted mission by creating a tangible literary heirloom. Proceeds ($50 per book) benefit vulnerable women in the community. Mosaic serves as a great addition to the home, regardless of the recipients' nationality, ethnic origin, beliefs or level of cooking expertise. The 110 diverse recipes cover appetizers, vegetarian, dairy, beef, fish, poultry, salads, fruit, hot and cold soups, desserts and brunches that hail from every corner of the globe. The succinct wording of each recipe serves as a key tool, and the team deserves credit for ensuring preparation runs smoothly. The recipes conform to kashrut laws and complement Jewish customs. Moreover, they incorporate fresh herbs and wholesome ingredients. An artist handpainted each component of the stunning mosaic on the cover.

Newpol noted a Toronto connection. One of the guest chefs, Carolyn Cohen, who runs a cooking school in Toronto, conducted a series of classes using Mosaic. And Newpol's longstanding supper club also incorporated the book in one of their evenings. "I suggested the theme and prepared the main course and everyone prepared one of the recipes from the book, and I was very proud," she said.

Thanks to Bram Paperman, iPhone owners can download a free app through the app store, which enables them to click on their phones while shopping to see ingredients needed for each recipe. The Women's Philanthropy Mosaic is available online and at Linen Chest, selected boutiques and 21 locations in Montreal. Also available online and at select Linen Chest stores in Toronto. It is also available in Ottawa. For further information, go to www.womenphilanthropy-mosaic.org.

PAPPARDELLE WITH TUNISIAN SHORT RIB RAGOUT

Slow-braised flanken, a strip of beef from the chuck end of the short ribs, was characteristic of eastern European food preparation. Inexpensive and easy to prepare, it was a favourite Jewish holiday dish. This recipe for slow-cooked short ribs takes its inspiration from this classic and adds a Tunisian flavour with the addition of figs.

3 tbsp. vegetable oil, divided
4 lb. beef short ribs, cut between the bones
2 tsp. salt
1 tsp. pepper
1 large onion, diced
2 medium carrots, peeled and diced
3 garlic cloves, minced
1 (1-in.) piece ginger, grated
1 cinnamon stick
1 cup cubed dried figs
2 cups dry red wine
2 cups chicken broth
1/4 cup soy sauce
1 (14 oz.) can fire-roasted tomatoes
3/4 cup tomato purée
1 lb. pappardelle pasta
4 cups arugula
1/2 cup pine nuts, toasted

Preheat the oven to 350. Heat 2 tbsp. of the olive oil in an 8-quart Dutch oven. Season the ribs with the salt and pepper. Place as many ribs as will fit in the Dutch oven without overlap. Sear until browned, turning with tongs, 3 to 4 minutes per side. Transfer the seared ribs to a plate and repeat with the remaining ribs. Pour off all but a thin layer of fat from the pan.

Add the remaining 1 tbsp. of the olive oil to the Dutch oven and sauté the onions and carrots until the onions are translucent, stirring and scraping up any browned bits on the bottom of the pan. Add the garlic, ginger, cinnamon stick and figs and sauté for 2 minutes.

Add the wine and cook for an additional 5 minutes.

Transfer all the ribs and any accumulated liquid back into the Dutch oven. Add the broth, soy sauce, tomatoes and tomato purée. Bring the liquid to a simmer, cover, and place in the oven.

Cook the ribs, turning them every 40 minutes, for about 3 hours. Allow the ribs to cool, remove the meat from the bones, discard the bones, and shred the meat. Refrigerate overnight.

Take the rib ragout out of the refrigerator and remove the fat.

Cook the papparedelle according to the package instructions. Heat the rib ragout in a saucepan on medium heat, stirring gently. Add the cooked pappardelle and arugula to the ragout and toss to coat the pasta evenly. Garnish with the toasted pine nuts and serve. Yield: 8 to 10 servings

Iran deal a 'historic mistake': Netanyahu

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, calling an interim deal with Iran on its nuclear program a "historic mistake," said Israel "has the right and the obligation to defend itself by itself against any threat."

"What was agreed to last night in Geneva is not a historic agreement, it is a historic mistake," Netanyahu said Sunday at the beginning of the regular cabinet meeting, several hours after the agreement was announced. "Today the world has become much more dangerous because the most dangerous regime in the world took a significant step to getting the most dangerous weapon in the world."

U.S. President Barack Obama reportedly called Netanyahu on Sunday to discuss the deal, under which Iran will freeze some of its nuclear activity in exchange for some sanctions relief.

The United States and five other world powers signed the deal with Iran late Saturday night.

"Iran is committed to Israel's destruction, and Israel has the right and the obligation to defend itself by itself against any threat," Netanyahu said. "Israel is not obligated by this agreement. I want to make clear we will not allow Iran to obtain military nuclear capability."

According to a White House statement, Iran will stop enriching uranium to 20 per cent, but will be able to continue enriching to five per cent. Iran will neutralize its existing stockpiles of 20 per cent enriched uranium and will not install or build any new centrifuges, except to replace damaged machines.

Five per cent is well below the enrichment level needed for weaponization. But Netanyahu has warned that allowing Iran to continue enriching uranium even at low levels brings it too close to a breakout capacity for nuclear weapons.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu says Israel is not bound by the agreement reached between Iran and six world powers. Please see more coverage on page 44. [Haim Zach/GPO/Flash90 photo]

Plan limits day school tuition to 15% of income

Federation hopes to expand pilot program beyond Robbins

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In an effort to make Jewish education more affordable for "middle income" families with three or more children, Robbins Hebrew Academy is offering a pilot program called iCAP that will limit tuition fees to 15 per cent of a family's gross income.

The program will apply to new and existing RHA families, not those transferring from other day schools. But UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, which is backing the idea, said it hopes to expand iCAP to other schools in the future.

The initiative, jointly funded by RHA, Avi Chai Foundation and the federation, will provide financial assistance starting next fall to parents with a gross income between $200,000 and $300,000 who have at least three children in the school.

"Even in that income bracket, it's very difficult if you have three or more children [in the Jewish day school system]," said RHA head of school Claire Sumerlus. "In order to try to keep those families or encourage them to come to Jewish day school and make it affordable for them, we've designed a program we think will help them."

RHA is the first and only school in the Toronto Jewish day school system to test out the program, modelled after a similar one launched at Solomon Schechter Day School of Boston in 2011.

A Chanukah Reminder from Steeles Memorial Chapel
For many of us, Chanukah is a time to recall memories of time spent with family and loved ones.
Unfortunately, some seniors are left with only that ... memories.
If there's an elderly person whom you care for, visit, and light a candle with them. Make sure they're in good health, eating nutritionally and taking medication as prescribed.
It's amazing how a little love and caring can make such a big difference.

Killer Executed

ST. LOUIS — A white supremacist was executed in Missouri for killing a man at a St. Louis-area synagogue in October 1977. Joseph Paul Franklin, 63, was executed Nov. 20 for the sniper shooting of Gerald Gordon, who was killed outside of the Brith Sholom Kneseth Israel synagogue as he left a bar mitzvah. Franklin was convicted of seven other murders throughout the United States and claimed responsibility for 20 deaths from 1977 and 1980. Franklin also bombed a shul in Chattanooga, Tenn., in July 1977.

New Labor Head

JERUSALEM — Israel's main opposition party chose veteran MK Isaac Herzog as its new leader, replacing former head Shelly Yachimovich, who served two years as Labor's head. Herzog, 53, is a former cabinet minister, a high-profile lawyer, and the son of former Israeli president Chaim Herzog. He won 58 per cent of the vote in the leadership primary versus Yachimovich's 41 per cent. In total, 28,473 people voted, out of 60,392 registered Labor voters. Under Yachimovich, jobs and the economy were prominent on the party's agenda, an emphasis some argued came at the expense of the party's traditional policy of promoting land-for-peace deals. In elections this year, she led the party to a disappointing third-place finish with only 15 seats out of 120 in the Knesset.

OTTAWA — Israel's new ambassador to Canada, Rafael Barak, a 36-year career diplomat at Israel's Ministry of Foreign Affairs, was due to arrive in Ottawa before the end of the month.

Rafael Barak

Born in Montevideo, Uruguay, and fluent in four languages – Hebrew, Spanish, French and English – Barak arrives after serving for almost three years as the ministry's director-general.

Barak succeeds Miriam Ziv, ambassador from 2008 to 2013 and officially assumes his post when he receives his official accreditation from Gov. Gen. David Johnston. His appointment was approved two months ago by a Foreign Ministry committee that hadn't met for months before that due to labour problems at the ministry.

His previous posts have included a 2000 posting as the No. 2 diplomat at Israel's embassy in Washington, D.C. Prior to that, he was deputy director-general of the Foreign Affairs Ministry and from 1993 to 1996 served as chief co-ordinator for talks with the Palestinians after the Oslo agreements were signed.

Before that, Barak served as a press attaché with Israel's mission to the European Communities in Brussels and was then deputy chef de mission at the Israeli embassy there. He has also served as first secretary at the Israeli embassy in Lima, Peru.

He immigrated to Israel in 1969 and has three children with his wife, Miriam.

Rabbi discovers $100,000 in second-hand desk

Cash returned to grateful owner

Diane Koven
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — The world is thirsting for a good-news story and Rabbi Noah Muroff has quenched that thirst. The international media descended upon the young rabbi once word of his exciting discovery of nearly $100,000 in a second-hand desk – and his subsequent and immediate decision to return the cash to its rightful owner — "went viral" on the Internet.

Rabbi Muroff, a native of Ottawa, has been living and teaching high school in a small yeshiva in New Haven, Conn. Shortly before Rosh Hashanah, he and his wife, Esther, picked up a desk they had purchased on Craigslist and brought it home to use in his study. They ran into trouble when they tried to get the desk through the door. "It missed being able to pass through the door by a quarter of an inch," Rabbi Muroff said.

Unwilling to admit defeat, the couple decided to take the desk apart and re-assemble it on the other side of the door. After removing the drawers, they found a plastic bag containing cash – in fact, to their astonishment, the total came to $98,000.

Because the woman who sold him the desk had told Rabbi Muroff that she purchased it from Staples and assembled it herself, he knew that the money belonged to her. He and his wife called her without a moment's hesitation and arranged to return the money to her as soon as possible.

The grateful woman explained that the money had been an inheritance from her recently deceased parents, which she had

Sunni Turkey cozies up to Shia Iran

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

The Nov. 19 double suicide-bombing attack on the Iranian embassy in Beirut, carried out by an Al Qaeda affiliate, "appears to be a direct result of the Syrian civil war and the fact that both Iran and Hezbollah are involved in the conflict in support of the regime in Damascus," Ha'aretz reported.

The attack also appears to be a sign of the growing sectarian clash between Saudi-backed Sunni and Iranian-backed Shia forces, especially those engaged in the bloody battle over Syria.

Sunni-dominant Turkey, which has absorbed 700,000 Syrian refugees fleeing the carnage, is bitterly opposed to President Bashar Assad's continued rule in Syria, but against initial expectations, Turkey has not been part of a desired, but unsuccessful, unified Sunni alliance against Iran for its support of the Assad regime.

On the surface, this state of affairs is counter-intuitive. After all, Turkey would seem to be the natural power to counter Iran's aggressive ambitions in the region including, prominently, Iran's arming of Hezbollah, its proxy force in Lebanon and now also in Syria. Thousands of Hezbollah fighters, along with Iranian Revolutionary Guard troops and Shia forces from Iraq, are all crucially involved not only in propping up Assad's Shia-offshoot Alawite forces, but also in making gains against an array of Sunni rebel fighters, some of whom are also busy fighting one another, thereby inadvertently aiding Iran's cause.

The net effect is increased pressure on Turkey, which shares borders with Syria, Iraq and Iran.

However, instead of joining Saudi Arabia and other Gulf states in supporting rebel fighters, Turkey is busy these days cozying up to Iran.

Against Saudi interests, Turkey supports both the Muslim Brotherhood and Hamas in Gaza. The Nov. 9 Economist, which calls Recep Erdogan "Turkey's increasingly paranoid prime minister," argued that Erdogan's "strident calls for Mohamed Morsi to be returned to power have angered Egypt's new leaders and chilled the friendship with Saudi Arabia." Among other things, by blaming Israel for Morsi's overthrow, Erdogan has even alienated U.S. President Barack Obama, who had prevailed upon Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in March to apologize for the Turkish citizens killed in the 2010 Mavi Mamara incident, a gesture for which Israel received no benefit whatsoever.

Iranian leaders have recently visited Ankara, and (as this column appears) Ahmet Davutoglu, Turkey's foreign minister, is scheduled to be in Tehran, further bolstering relations recently compromised by the Syrian conflict.

In fact, both Turkey and Iran are visibly promoting their renewed friendship as an indication of their espoused commitment to reduce sectarian strife – even as Iran fuels it in Syria!

Turkey has an economic interest at stake: despite UN and other sanctions against Tehran, Turkey is Iran's biggest natural gas customer. While private gas companies in Turkey would like to draw upon gas from Israel's huge offshore finds in the Mediterranean, they are stymied by hostility to Israel from Turkey's political leadership.

Turkey's Hurriyet newspaper reported earlier this month that intelligence co-operation between Turkey and Iran is strong.

In the Nov. 18 issue of the Jerusalem Report, under the title "Turkish betrayal," veteran intelligence reporter Yossi Melman expounded on a story originally broken by the Washington Post in October: that Turkey (a NATO member) deliberately leaked the names to Iran of 10 Iranian spies working for Israel, spies whom Israel's Mossad operatives used to meet on Turkish soil.

Melman described this leak as "an egregious, even unprecedented, act. In fact, this is the basest act of betrayal imaginable," but it's evidence of Erdogan's personal, visceral antipathy toward Israel and that of his U.S.-educated intelligence chief Hakan Fidan, who is reportedly close to his Iranian counterparts and oversaw the leaks.

Meanwhile, in response both to Erdogan's anti-Zionism and his anti-Semitism, evident in his repeated calls that the "interest rate lobby" (i.e., Jews) was to blame for Turkey's widespread social unrest last summer, according to the Times of Israel a growing number of Turkey's 15,000 Jews are leaving, many joining the 80,000 Turkish Jews already living in Israel.

Unreasonable non-accommodation

In the 18th and 19th centuries, governments faced questions about integrating Jews, members of a minority religion, into general society. Would they be loyal citizens? Could they wear traditional clothing in public? As Canadians debate Quebec's proposed charter of values, we again ask similar questions about the limits of religious freedom and multiculturalism. Are religious distinctiveness and cultural differences good or problematic? If we draw lines, what and where should they be? As Yogi Berra once said, "It's like déjà vu all over again."

Guest Editorial

Western thought points to a progression from the particular to the universal in our quest for truth. The desire for oneness has led to equality of citizenship and universal rights. However, as Isaiah Berlin noted, the monist quest for the ideal also led to a totalism within medieval religion and modern politics that diminished diversity and brought great suffering to many. The latest manifestation of this pursuit of the universal is the proposed charter of values.

In contrast, the Bible begins with the universal Creation and then shifts to the specific saga of Abraham. Martin Buber contrasts the platonic desire for universal truth with the prophetic call for individual justice. The Torah often reminds us about the stranger, because to dignify the other is difficult. In the terminology of Emmanuel Levinas, we are called to see the visage of the other and to respond with moral responsibility.

If a contemporary challenge for religions is whether they can dignify difference, liberal democracies are similarly tested. Charles Taylor observes that the quest for human dignity is expressed in two ways: as the protection of basic, common human rights, the politics of equality, or the acknowledgement of the particularities of individuals and groups, the politics of difference. Nations committed to the politics of equality want procedures and laws to be the same for all, regardless of race or creed, while countries that emphasize the politics of difference have substantive views about what constitutes a good life.

In theological terms, the commonality of what Rabbi Jonathan Sacks calls a "covenant of fate" leads to the secular concept of equal citizenship, a commitment to act with fairness, while the distinctiveness of a covenant of faith generates a particular perspective about what constitutes the good life. Taylor thinks English Canada generally focuses on equality and individual rights, accepting cultural diversity as a private decision, but ignoring issues of group cultural survival. In contrast, French Canada affirms individual human rights and respects diversity, while allowing for collective national goals.

In Canada, we enshrine both expressions of human dignity. It is, therefore, quite contrary that Quebec, which demands distinctiveness for French culture, should legislate against minority expression of religious identity. The proposed charter of values would enshrine unreasonable non-accommodation.

In Canada, we should continue to seek both the protection of universal rights and the reasonable accommodation of individuals and groups. We must recognize and respect distinctiveness, so long as it does not harm or cause significant hardship to others. Quebec should seek to cultivate difference, even as it affirms the cultural values that enable it to remain a distinct society. The proposed charter of values is not the way to go.

Harper honours not deserved

On Dec. 1, the Jewish National Fund will be holding an event to raise funds for the Stephen J. Harper Hula Valley Bird Sanctuary Visitor and Education Centre in Israel. The facility itself sounds like a wonderful place to visit and an important and safe refuge for migrating birds. Yet it is ironic that a prime minister who is responsible for making it more difficult for families to find protection in Canada would have this facility named for him.

Consider, in 2012, the Stephen Harper Conservative government significantly altered more than a half century of progressive policy regarding Canada's treatment of refugees. Included among the changes:

- New rules that discriminate between individuals based on their country of origin and how they arrived in Canada;
- Measures creating serious challenges in the refugee determination process, which could lead in some cases to the deportation of individuals to their home countries and a real risk of persecution or worse;
- Unreasonable limits on certain humanitarian protections;
- Drastic cuts to health care coverage for refugees (including ill children and pregnant women).

How Canada treats the most vulnerable among us – particularly those fleeing violence, war, and persecution – is of particular concern to the Jewish community. Because of our own history, we share a special bond with refugees. The federal government's current policies, and its resulting treatment of the Roma people in particular, are inconsistent with Canada's postwar tradition of compassion and tolerance. Policies regarding the treatment of people seeking refuge should be guided by humanitarian values, not crass political calculations.

We recently helped form the Jewish Refugee Action Network (www.jran.ca) to advocate for a reversal of the government's agenda on refugees. Our concerns are shared by legal experts, settlement workers, and health professionals from many faith and cultural communities. A key element of our work will be educating Canadians, including within the Jewish community, about the harmful effects of the government's policies towards refugees.

We hope that the prime minister will reflect on these concerns and engage in a dialogue with us to rectify this injustice.

Charter incites anti-Semitism

I am outraged and extremely concerned about the proposed charter of Quebec values and how this could potentially impact the Jewish community, and other religious communities, in Quebec and across Canada.

I feel that Bill 60 is shocking, given our country's history of freedom of religion. Anti-Semitism and xenophobia will always exist, but when a government, such as the government of Quebec, not only condones but incites these activities, the acceptability of giving voice to these virulent thoughts, increases exponentially.

This charter has the potential to take away jobs for Jews and for other religious communities, force Jewish and children of other religious communities out of public schools, and discriminate against businesses of Jews and other religious communities.

Where does it stop? What religious freedoms and freedoms in general, are next on the chopping block? Have we learned nothing from history?

Saying that this charter affirms "secularism" is misleading because Christian people and Christian traditions are not affected.

As far as I am concerned, if this is what Quebecers want, then let them separate from Canada and be their own country. Then Canada can impose sanctions on them for violating human rights.

I call on all Canadians across the country to vigorously protest this potential violation of religious tolerance and human rights in our precious country.

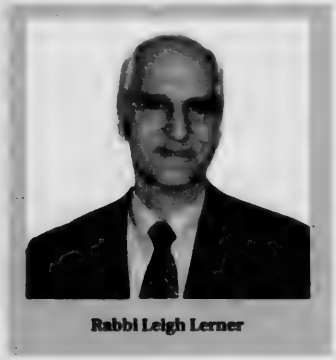
A Jewish view on euthanasia and assisted suicide

Rabbi Leigh Lerner

Quebec is the first province to propose allowing a dying patient with an incurable disease "at an advanced state of irreversible decline" and suffering "unbearable physical and psychological pain" to decide their own moment of death. What does Jewish tradition say about euthanasia?



Rabbi Leigh Lerner

1. Human life and divine grandeur

Jewish ethicist J. David Bleich thinks of humanity as a symphony orchestra. We all have parts to play, even if only resting, and even if we've played all our notes. When the drummer finishes her task, does she leave the symphony? No. Her presence enhances the majesty of the orchestra before the audience, which, in our comparison, is God. Thus human life itself praises God's greatness.

2. Humanity as God's chattel

Judaism maintains that God has a prior right or interest in our bodies. We do not own ourselves and cannot do whatever we wish with our bodies. This viewpoint understands humanity as God's chattel, an unpleasant thought for autonomous moderns, but it reflects our tradition that "the soul is Yours and the body, too."

3. Moral effect on health-care providers

Jewish law forbids a negativist policy about life. A positive relationship with a physician may only be possible when the patient believes that doctors will do their utmost and not abandon the patient as beyond hope.

4. Quality of life issues

Quality of life decisions are subjective. Some people live every painful day with positivity, while others in less pain want to end their lives. Of those requesting euthanasia in Holland, five per cent list physical pain as their reason, and typically, when that pain is controlled, they change their mind. Loss of autonomy is the major reason the Dutch choose euthanasia, and this concern, too, can be met. Also, can a patient put trust in a physician who must weigh the quality of life to be preserved?

Quality of life issues

5. Conflict of interest issues (Nogeah badavar)

Since the province provides medical care, suicide relieves it of a financial burden: the expensive last days of the dying. Because the state gains financially by an early end of life, it has a conflict of interest. Will the suicide law degrade the nature of Quebec's commitment to quality end-of-life care because suicide is a cheaper solution than pain management?

6. Emulation of Divine love

Judaism sees human life as a demonstration of God's love. God loves us without requiring that we have a utilitarian value. Just as we love ourselves for our mere existence, not because of some reason, so God loves humanity in a unique way, unmotivated by any consideration. When caring for others sick unto death and in great pain, we express our endeavour to make our love like God's love.

Emulation of Divine Love

7. Halachic problems for Orthodox Jews

Halachah, traditional Jewish law, opposes suicide. Orthodox Jews who committed suicide used to have no eulogy, with their burial in the cemetery's farthest corner. Some rabbis decided that a person who commits suicide is temporarily insane and died of their disease, and is, therefore, entitled to normal burial.

Suppose a Jew asks for assisted suicide. An ethical board or supervising physician oversees the decision whether to act or not. They only consent if the individual is of sound mind. However, a suicide adjudged mentally competent is not insane. Traditional cemeteries may revert to the old, embarrassing practices. Many non-traditional Jews hold plots in Orthodox cemeteries that would be unusable for assisted suicides. Their families may face a sudden, sad, unforeseen problem in making final arrangements.

8. A vehicle for mitzvah

Jewish tradition posits that a person can become an instrument for the expression of something worthwhile. It's a Jewish tradition that after someone asks for a charitable donation, when we give, we thank the asker. Jewish tradition views the one who requests tzedakah as providing the giver with an opportunity to fulfil a commandment, a mitzvah.

So it is with the terminally ill. They provide opportunities to fulfil many commandments, and thus to express the way that humanity is unique in this world. At the same time, by doing a mitzvah, we express our relationship to Torah and to God, thus affirming our values. Assisting in a suicide amounts to depriving the giver of the opportunity, hardly a Jewish way of acting.

9. Human life as a bonum per se.

Human life is a good in and of itself. Sheer human existence is endowed with moral value.

Human life as a bonum per se

Is human life an instrumental good or a good in and of itself? If human life is only an instrumental good, then it follows that life becomes worthless when it no longer leads to some higher good. If human life is only an instrument toward some greater good, when that good can no longer be attained, then life has no value, so why not destroy it, plain and simple?

Further, if human life must be utilized to achieve some higher good, then it is necessary to state what that higher good shall be. Who among us is ready to do so, and who would want any government to legislate that fact?

Jews believe that life is good in itself. We respect each human being as a child of God and do not snuff out the life that God has given.

10. Suicide and assisted suicide.

Jewish tradition, therefore, tells us not to assist in suicides. We are fortunate to have palliative care resources in Montreal and should enhance them, rather than turning to assisted suicide.

Jewish tradition does not demand ever more sophisticated treatments for a life clearly ending. We can let an illness take its course and control its pain. Jewish tradition wants a health-care ethic that promotes life and relieves suffering. Let's debate how to cure day-long waits at emergency rooms, delayed surgery, doctor shortages, and more. These, not euthanasia, are the real medical issues in Quebec.

He said, she said: the travesty of the agunah

Sara R. Horowitz
in Toronto

I'm not easily shocked, but I admit to being shocked by the current and much-publicized case of a young American woman denied a Jewish divorce by her husband. The basic scenario is too sadly common to have shock value: a marriage dissolves, but after a civil divorce, the man refuses to provide a get, (a Jewish bill of divorcement), and the woman remains halachically married.

The husband does not withhold a get from his wife (or ex-wife, under American law) because he cannot bear to let her go. Rather, he uses his control of the get as the ultimate negotiating weapon, denying it until she meet his financial and custodial demands – claims that have already been adjudicated, but not to his satisfaction. What has brought this case into the public realm is the (ex-)wife's unusual decision not to silently put life on hold, but to hire a publicist in order to pressure her (ex-)husband to free her.

Millions now know some version of the inner workings of a marriage of two people they've never met. Details of the couple's courtship, marriage and its dissolution appear in the international press and on the web: her version in her own voice and through relatives and friends, and bits and pieces of his version through relatives and supporters. I won't rehearse the details here, because my purpose is neither to dish dirt nor to evaluate a couple's marital journey. At the end of the day, the details don't matter here.

The crux of the matter is the unscrupulous use of Halachah – the wielding of the demands of Jewish law to render one party all-powerful and the other powerless. I and others have written before on these pages and elsewhere about the tragedy and travesty of women caught by the inequity of the halachic divorce. The ability to control, in near-absolute terms, the marital status of his wife places a nuclear weapon in a husband's hands. For women who care about this – and, ironically, the more attached a woman is to Jewish practice and community, the more this can ruin her life – this nuclear weapon trumps all other aspects of divorce negotiation and adjudication, potentially outweighing even the views of civil or religious courts.

Here is the utter separation between Halachah and ethics. Regardless of the justness of the husband's demands, or the level of anger that fuels his behaviour, the nuclear weapon is his alone to deploy.

Still, while deplorable, there is nothing shocking about this story. What stunned me were trending responses in cyberspace – yeshivish websites, comments to news articles, religious blogs – that side not merely with this particular man or divorcing men generally, but with the very use of the get as a tactical tool.

If these postings are to be credited – and they exist in sufficient numbers to indicate they represent a significant opinion – there is at least some chunk of the Jewish community that regards the get as a legitimate means to forcibly gain one's way: if Halachah is so constructed as to give you power, use it. Some even see this tactic as theologically sanctioned – what HaShem must want. I would consider this a "fringe" opinion, representing a few bitter or misogynistic outliers, except that I come upon some version of it so frequently.

Yet the rabbinic regulation of divorce procedures was not aimed at giving a man unbridled control over his wife, as though she were chattel. The Talmud's ample discussion of gittin (divorce contracts) traces a move to eliminate the fuzziness in a divorcing woman's status, removing possibilities for her get to be invalidated or rescinded retroactively or at whim, leaving her in limbo. If ethics and empathy motivated our ancestral sages, should it not have some currency now?

In what I have written above, I have refrained from naming the parties in order to focus on an issue that transcends an individual couple. But I recognized that publicly naming a get withholder is one of the few means of persuasion available to women, and I do so here: Avrohom Meir Weiss of Staten Island, N.Y., and Lakewood, N.J.

Jews should talk to Muslims

Rabbi Dow Marmur
in Toronto

The reason for the recent marked increase in anti-Semitic incidents in Europe is usually ascribed to the growth of the Muslim population there. For example, Sweden – where I grew up and where I lived among Holocaust survivors who were helped to a new life by the then Swedish government – has gained international notoriety because of the re-emergence of overt anti-Semitism there. Radicalized Muslim immigrants are said to be the primary cause.

Through the ages Christians and pagans needed neither Muslims nor the conflict between Israel and the Palestinians to voice and act on their hatred of Jews and Judaism. Some spokespeople of ostensibly peace-loving contemporary Christianity are still trying to express their disdain with the pretext of only opposing government policies in the Jewish state, not the Jewish People or the Jewish faith. Of late, a growing number don't even seem to bother to cite this lame excuse.

At the same time, many responsible Christian leaders are making valiant efforts to mend fences with the Jewish people. The pronouncements and actions by Pope Francis aptly illustrate this wholesome trend. Fruitful interfaith encounters between Jews and Christians have become important elements of religious life.

In recent years, despite political complexities and growing religious extremism, similar efforts to bring about Muslim-Jewish relations are beginning to bear fruit. Unlike Christians, Muslims are more likely start at the grassroots level, perhaps in the hope of thus influencing their often-reluctant leaders.

I've witnessed some of it myself. For example, last April I attended the annual international interfaith conference in Doha, Qatar, where the emphasis seems to have been more on local encounters than on generalities. Though cynics will always find ways to suspect and debunk such initiatives, the results are often very beneficial.

I've also experienced promising encounters with Muslims in Canada. Thus I spoke recently at a conference on world religions in Guelph, Ont., sponsored by the Ahmadiyah sect of Islam. Participants included the local rabbi. Some Jewish delegates came from the United States.

A couple of weeks later, I spoke, together with an imam and a Christian academic, about Muhammad. The occasion was a symposium hosted by the Waterloo Lutheran Seminary in Waterloo, Ont. Local Jews and Muslims attended and participated.

Recently I was invited to address a congregation at a Friday service at the Noor Islamic Centre in Toronto. Bearing in mind the Arab-Israeli conflict, I suggested to the Muslim worshippers that it's not for us here to fight the battles there. Our purpose should be to promote peaceful coexistence, mutual respect and fruitful interaction between adherents of all faiths as a way of sharing God's teachings, all for the good of Canada.

Interfaith organizations where exponents of Islam and Judaism meet and exchange ideas exist in many countries. In Canada, the Association of Jews and Muslims has been at the forefront. In Israel, the Interreligious Co-ordinating Council has developed a network for Jews, Christians and Muslims to meet and learn from each other in an effort to help shape a society that transcends wars and enmity.

It's a welcome antidote to the mutual demonization that takes place in many settings around the world and is often fuelled by unscrupulous clerics and politicians. They misleadingly depict the Jews in Israel as colonizers who had come to displace the indigenous Arab population. In defensive responses to the wild accusations, members of our own community often succumb to pointing to Muslim extremism. Some even erroneously maintain that terrorists are the most authentic exponents of contemporary Islam.

Jews had lived under Muslim rule since the beginning of Islam. On the whole they've fared better than in Christian countries. Jewish literature, Jewish thought and even Jewish law have been greatly influenced by the great medieval teachers of Islam. Much of what some today consider to be normative Judaism is the result of the interaction.

It's as equal citizens in a free and democratic Canada that we seek to encounter the Muslims of our time, not by focusing on extremist and lethal manifestations of their faith – or ours - but by the mainstream teachings of both.

The late Krister Stendahl, former dean of Harvard Divinity School and bishop of Stockholm, arguably the most significant exponents of contemporary interfaith dialogue, has taught us always to compare our best with their best, not our best with their worst. It's the golden rule of interfaith dialogue.

Reform, Orthodox Jews in U.S. met similar challenges

Conservatism can learn from others: historian

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Conservative Jewry faces great challenges, but it can learn from other North American Jewish movements that faced similar threats and emerged stronger, says a leading U.S. Jewish historian.

Conservative Jewry is too important to disappear and can provide a spiritual home to the many Jews who don't currently have one, Jonathan Sarna, a professor of American Jewish history at Brandeis University and chief historian of the new National Museum of American Jewish History, told an audience at Beth Torah Synagogue Nov. 17.

"[Conservative Jewry] has been one of the greatest sources of scholarship in American Jewish life," Sarna said, adding, "We need to create new ways to reach [unaffiliated Jews], and Conservatives should lead the way. Without a strong centre, North American Judaism runs the risk of dividing into two camps and two Judaisms. We need a strong centre committed to compromise for the sake of Jewish unity. A huge opportunity awaits the Conservative movement. It has to seize it and run."

Sarna's lecture was sponsored by the Canadian Council of Conservative Synagogues and co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. The evening was moderated by former CJN editor Mordechai Ben-Dat.

Fifty years ago, Sarna said, the Conservative movement was the largest of the three Jewish denominations, representing 42 per cent of U.S. Jews.

Today, according to the recent Pew survey on U.S. Jewry, it comprises only 18 per cent of U.S. Jews, and only 11 per cent of those ages 18 to 29, he said.

He recalled that in 1963, the movement's flagship Jewish Theological Seminary – where his father, Nahum, taught – held a memorial service when U.S. president John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

"This service was seen as the official Jewish community service. To a child like me, in 1963, it felt like the Conservative movement was the centre of Jewish life," Sarna said.

The Pew survey found that Reform is now the largest denomination in America.

"In the United States, [Conservativism] is half [the size] of the Reform movement, and a little larger than Orthodoxy. [At age 55], its median age is higher than any other religious movement. Conservative Jewish households have fewer children than Orthodox or Reform. Conservative households have .3 children [compared to 1.7] in Orthodox homes."

Jonathan Sarna

These numbers don't bode well for the Conservative movement, he said, and "too many believe that its moment has passed. They have expressed to me a deep fear of Conservative survival."

Few people realize, however, that these changes are neither new or unparalleled, he said. "Reform and Orthodoxy faced similar [situations] at the beginning of the [20th] century and have had their strength renewed."

Reform, which was big in the 1870s, had its challenges in the early 1900s, he said. "By World War I [there was a traditionalist revival], and [it] shattered Reform hopes."

By 1918, the Conservative movement was ascendant and it looked like Reform would decline, because its tenets ran counter to the beliefs of many eastern European Jewish immigrants.

"Too many found it church-like and too English," Sarna said

In 1926, he said, Reform rabbis decided the movement was in need of revitalization. "Reform [had to] be reformed, and today it is the largest movement."

The way it revived itself can be a lesson for any movement, Sarna said. "It saw the handwriting on the wall, and it heeded its critics.

"Once-discarded rituals were brought back, and it changed its women's and youth movement to make it more alluring. It moved to strengthen its Jewish institutions, and it opted to become a tent, embracing a wide range of practices and ideologies. It agreed to accept differences as precious."

Diversity was once the goal of the Conservative movement, he said, but since 1968, it has narrowed, as products of the Conservative movement left rather than find space within the movement.

"Reconstructionists departed, and in Canada, several synagogues departed. Recently, non-denominational minyans have attracted young Jews."

Religions need to widen their circle, he said, "and in [the past] 50 years, the Conservative circle has narrowed."

Orthodoxy also faced a grave crisis in the 20th century, but it defied prophets of doom, "just as I hope Conservatives will today," he said.

"We can learn from Orthodoxy. It shaped its survival through its birthrate, and through its investment in schools.

"The Orthodox [movement] did what no investment counsellor would ever [recommend]: it bet the house on day schools. Education is its rank and file, and it became the backbone of revitalization."

If the Conservative movement wants to win over the next generation, it has to invest in education, and not only in elementary and high school. Half of the 18-to-29-year-olds don't identify as Conservative, and whoever captures that market will determine the future of American Jewish life.

Conservatives can learn a lot from Orthodox structure, he said. "Orthodoxy embraces an enormous spectrum. It is not controlled from the top down, but through disparate groups, which cloak themselves in Orthodoxy.

"I think when historians look back, they will say that this big tent is the key ingredient in Orthodox growth."

B'nai Brith, federation sign 'historic' deal

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and B'nai Brith Canada met at a late-afternoon reception at the Lipa Green Centre Nov. 19 to sign what they called a "historic" agreement to strengthen ties and work together.

Few details were given about the new deal, nor was the document made public, but it was stressed at the reception that the two organizations would be creating new working relationships.

Ted Sokolsky, president and CEO of the federation, said later in an email interview that the two groups have been working on the agreement for a number of months, with the goal of finalizing it before the end of 2013.

"The agreement speaks to closer ties between the organizations, particularly in the area of capital fundraising for seniors' housing, while at the same time respecting the individual autonomy, history and contribution of each organization," Sokolsky said.

"Both organizations have committed to consult with the other on issues of community concern, but leadership, of course, remains separate and independent."

Frank Dimant, CEO B'nai Brith Canada, said in an email interview that although informal talks began about two years ago, serious negotiations started this year.

The agreement calls for each organization to maintain its own advocacy entities and to continue with its own leadership and philosophy, he said.

Dimant said the critical component calls for a "very well co-ordinated fundraising effort whereby specially designated staff will work together to ensure very specific objectives such as naming opportunities for B'nai Brith facilities and the fufilment of the commitment by B'nai Brith to create the Stephen Harper Human Rights Centre, as well as B'nai Brith's very public support for the UJA campaigns and projects."

It's anticipated that new programs and projects will be reviewed and perhaps embarked upon collectively by the organizations, he added.

He said the federation will also be more visible in the Jewish Tribune, B'nai Brith's newspaper, "through advertising and communications."

The agreement appears to signal an end to public sniping between B'nai Brith and Canada's other major Jewish advocacy network.

Over the summer, B'nai Brith was criticial of a visit by Gilad Schalit, which was sponsored by the Jewish National Fund and endorsed by the federation-linked Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA). B'nai Brith's newspaper, the Jewish Tribune, published a story intimating that Schalit was a poor soldier and not deserving of hero status.

B'nai Brith's paper also ran a story earlier in the year that was critical of CIJA's Size Doesn't Matter PR campaign, saying its use of sexual imagery to promote Israel is inappropriate.

Dimant said the new agreement will strengthen both B'nai Brith and the federation because "in public there will be no recriminations, one against the other, although each may voice their own independent views relating to advocacy and issues affecting the Jewish community with respect towards one another."

Rabbi Daniel Korobkin, spiritual leader of Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto, spoke at the signing event and said "there are times when the moon and sun and stars all align. This is a win-win situation for both organizations.

"The two great brands [are coming together], and no one is giving up who they are. They will work together to be better."

Eric Bissell, B'nai Brith's national president, called the agreement "a milestone in the Jewish community. B'nai Brith makes a difference in people's lives. [It] fights anti-Semitism and [provides] social service programs."

He added: "This historic [agreement] captures the voice of the grassroots of the community. [It allows for] full autonomy, but joint effort. It means [we have a] stronger community while maintaining our own institutions."

Rev. Meshoe leading fight against BDS movement

South African MP refutes Israeli apartheid lie

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Rev. Kenneth Meshoe, a black South African who lived under his country's oppressive apartheid regime until 1994, was in Toronto last week to speak out against those who make the "improper and wrong" claim that Israel is an apartheid state.

Rev. Meshoe, president of the African Christian Democratic Party (ACDP), a political party based on biblical principles that has three seats in South Africa's Parliament, was the keynote speaker at two events sponsored by Israel advocacy group StandWithUs Canada: one at Beth Sholom Synagogue and another at Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto.

Speaking with The CJN in advance of his lectures, Rev. Meshoe, who is on leave as a South African MP, said he planned to talk about the "seven acts of Parliament that formed the basis of apartheid. And I argue that without those acts of Parliament, there is no apartheid.

"It is improper and wrong and for anyone to make the suggestion that Israeli is an apartheid state when there is no such acts of Parliament in Israel, no segregation based on race."

In May, the San Francisco Examiner published an opinion piece by Rev. Meshoe that he wrote in reaction to anti-Israel ads approved by the city.

He wrote that under the South African apartheid system, he couldn't vote, travel freely throughout his country or hold government office.

"The races were strictly segregated at sports arenas, public restrooms, schools and on public transportation," he added.

But in Israel, which he has visited a number of times, Israeli citizens of all races and religions "mingle freely in public places, universities, restaurants, voting stations and public transportation. All people have the right to vote. The Arab minority has political parties, serves in the Israeli parliament (Knesset) and holds positions in government ministries, the police force and the security services."

Meryle Kates, executive director of StandWithUs Canada, and Rev. Kenneth Meshoe

He said the term Israeli apartheid "trivializes the word apartheid, minimizing and belittling the magnitude of the racism and suffering endured by South Africans of colour."

As a political leader, Rev. Meshoe is leading the fight against the boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS), which was endorsed in 2012 by the ruling African National Congress.

Rev. Meshoe said the government's decision to boycott Israeli goods and technology puts politics before the health of its own citizens. For example, earlier this year, 30 South African men were killed by infections brought on by botched circumcisions performed during traditional initiation rites.

"In their culture, when a young man enters into manhood, there are some rituals that are done that include circumcision. At times, it is done by people who are not properly trained," he said.

He said that when South Africa's department of health approved the use of PrePex, an Israeli-made, World Health Organization-approved circumcising device that's a cheap and safe alternative to the controversial Malaysian-made Tara KLamp, leaders of the BDS movement urged the government to reverse the decision.

"We are saying that these are lives that the government is trying to save. And we have people who don't care about the lives of their people. They're saying, 'We don't care how many people are going to die… Because it comes from Israel, it should not be used,'" he said.

"We want to… ensure that BDS does not deny the people of Africa. Africa has millions of people who are drinking polluted water. And Israel has the technology to purify their water. But the politicians don't care how many people get diseases, how many people die from the polluted water.

"We also have a huge problem of drought," he said, adding that during his visit to Chicago where he also spoke before arriving in Toronto, he learned about Israel's Netafim technology – a drip irrigation system that uses very little water to hydrate crops.

"The government should allow us to have access to this system, this technology that can help."

Rev. Meshoe also commented on his country's deputy foreign minister, who openly advised South Africans last year not to travel to Israel.

"I believe one of the reasons they don't want us to go is because they are scared people will see the truth. I know a number of people who did go to Israel with the mindset of Israel being an apartheid state, but when they went to Israel, they came back changed.

"I have challenged members of Parliament and people I know who are anti-Israel, and I have said, 'I will sponsor your ticket. Let us go to Israel and you will show me where there is apartheid, and I will show where there is not.' But they don't want to accept the challenge. In their heart of hearts they know that it is not the case."

Rev. Meshoe accused BDS promoters of "deceiving people by using the apartheid allegation, and they are not giving people the opportunity to benefit from the technology that comes out of Israel."

In response to the BDS campaign, Rev. Meshoe founded a non-governmental organization called Deisi – an acronym for "Defend Embrace Invest Support Israel."

"This is mainly going to be a student movement. We want to take students from our country to Israel to see that there is no apartheid in Israel."

He said by 2015, he wants to send a team of South African students to North American universities that host Israeli Apartheid Week in order to enlighten students about what apartheid really is.

Rev. Meshoe believes that if black South Africans were given the same rights in South Africa as those that exist in Israel today, "there would never have been an armed struggle. (Anti-apartheid revolutionary and former South African President) Nelson Mandela would not have gone to prison. Everything he fought for is already available in Israel."

Rev. Meshoe's message for Jewish communities in North America and abroad, who oppose the BDS campaign against Israel, is "to join StandWithUs in being more outspoken and maybe even aggressive in coming out against the BDS campaign, because the BDS campaign is robbing those who are suffering in other parts of the world from benefitting from the technology that comes out of Israel."

Haifa mayor seeks to expand high-tech industry

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Newly re-elected Haifa Mayor Yona Yahav was in Toronto last week on a mission to entice entrepreneurs, community leaders and politicians to invest in the rapid development of Haifa's high-tech industry.

Yahav, who secured a third term in office in October, having won 50 per cent of the votes, said he has ambitions to develop Haifa's high-tech centre to resemble San Francisco's Silicon Valley, and he wants Toronto's help.

"I want to try to set up a support group, which we want to lean on," Yahav said in an interview with The CJN. "I offered them to be a full part of the development of Haifa and to be full partners to invest and to help."

During his three-day trip to the city, accompanied by Haifa Foundation executive director Cobie Brosh and Canadian Committee For The Haifa Foundation executive director Lisa Gardner Plant, Yahav's family in Toronto, Irena and Avi Greenspoon, hosted a dessert reception in his honour at their Thornhill, Ont., home last week.

Yahav also met with a number of Toronto city councillors to discuss economic and cultural development opportunities between the two cities.

"Haifa is known throughout the world as a city of business, culture and innovation. Speaking with Mayor Yahav, it quickly became clear that there is enormous potential for investment between our two cities," Coun. James Pasternak said. "I look forward to working together in the future on cultural and economic initiatives."

Established in 2008, Haifa is home to Hi-Center, which is an accelerator for late-stage startups. Last year, Top Start-Up was established as an accelerator for new start-ups. Top Center, Hi-Centre's sponsor, is an incubator that currently hosts about 20 companies, Yahav said.

Yahav said the startup he is most excited about is Lexiphone, a Hi-Center alum, that got a $2-million investment from a Toronto-based technology incubator called Intertainment Media Inc.

"Lexiphone, the first company that became ripe, is a cellular company that... allows you to talk to someone in China in English and he will hear it in Chinese, and he will speak to you in Chinese and you will hear it in English," he said.

Through Haifa's high-tech accelerators and incubators, the number of inventions of medical devices and technologies that come out of the city is on the rise.

Haifa's future looks a lot brighter than it did the last time Yahav spoke with The CJN in 2006, during the Second Lebanon War.

"The economy is in a hole, most of the businesses are closed. And people are instructed to stay behind walls because the rockets that are being shot at us contain thousands of bullets [shrapnel], which are being scattered around in a radius of kilometres," Yahav said in 2006.

But Haifa recovered quickly, he said, thanks to the rapid reconstruction effort and financial help from the Israeli government.

Today, the population in this growing city is about 300,000 – up from 270,000 in 2006.

"The unemployment rate went down to four per cent, which is the lowest unemployment rate in Israel. You have to bear in mind that when I started in 2003, we started with an unemployment rate of 12 per cent," Yahav said.

"We're in the midst of a very rapid development in the city... We changed the whole setup of the city with regard to the infrastructure... We are now considered the most modern city in Israel these days."

But Yahav isn't content to rest on the laurels of his city's high-tech sector.

"The second thing we're doing is turning the entire downtown Haifa into a university campus. This is the only project of its kind in the world because this is a city renewal through high education."

Yahav said he is also working with his government to expand the Port of Haifa, the largest of Israel's three major international seaports, to accommodate shipments from China and India. The 4-billion-shekel (almost $1.2-billion Cdn) expansion is scheduled to be completed in 2018.

"Through that, the whole economy of the city will change. Once it happens we should be able to carry out our huge project on the waterfront of Haifa," Yahav said.

"Once we succeed in building the waterfront of Haifa, this will attract about two million or more tourists to Haifa and this will finalize our aim to turn Haifa, which is the most beautiful city in Israel, into a tourist site."

Teens learn about hunger on trip to Detroit

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Five Canadian teens spent three days learning about hunger as part of an 85-person BBYO trip to southeastern Michigan.

The theme of the BBYO Stand UP summit was encompassed in its title, "Hunger is not a Game: A Teen Issue Summit on Hunger Awareness and Advocacy." From Nov. 10 to 12, participants travelled to volunteer and learn in the city of Detroit, which filed for bankruptcy earlier this year.

Vaughan Secondary School student Dylan Nowogrodski has gone on BBYO trips before, including one last year to help people suffering after Hurricane Sandy. But despite what he's learned about poverty and suffering in the past, this trip was an eye-opener.

"I found it really astonishing that 48 million people in the United States are food insecure," Nowogrodski said. "That's more than the population of our country."

According to the World Health Organization, food security is "when all people at all times have access to sufficient, safe, nutritious food to maintain a healthy and active life."

A July report from the University of Toronto concluded that in 2011, 3.9 million Canadians faced some level of food insecurity, with the biggest concentration found in the north.

The teens took part in simulations in which they could experience the challenges of making ends meet. For example, the local United Way ran a workshop in which each student was given a character and a budget, and they had to determine how they would allocate their funds over the course of a month.

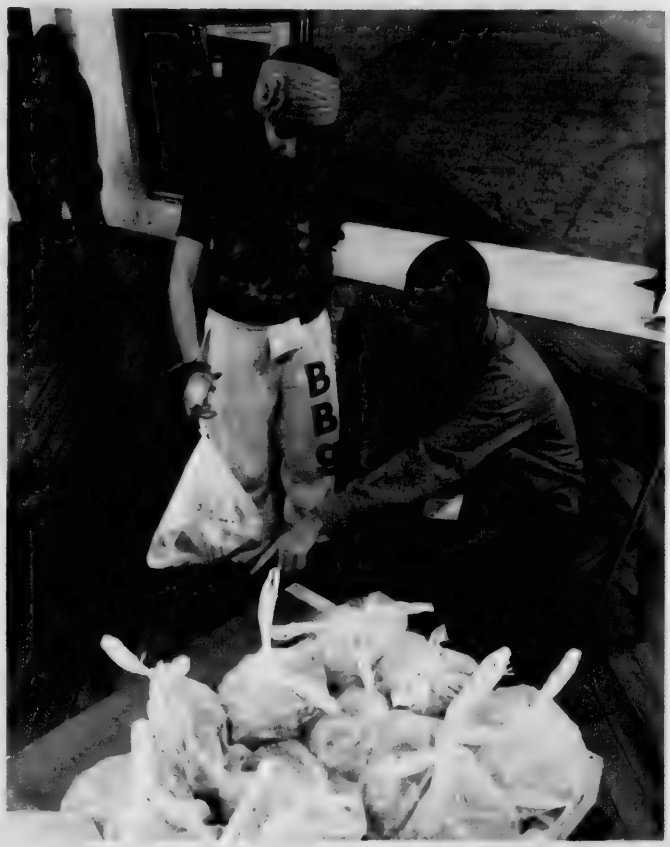
Nowogrodski, for example, was given the role of a grandfather. He said it was challenging enough to make ends meet, but then organizers threw him a curveball – his character was mugged for $100 – and he had to find a way to make it through the month.

Ben Sterlin, a student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, said this simulation was one of the highlights of the trip.

"It was really eye-opening because I don't pay any of the bills in my family – my parents do. When I did the simulation, it really showed me how much work parents have to go through, and how not easy it is to pay these bills," he said. "It really made me more grateful for the fact that my parents go through the work to pay these bills, and now I'm more appreciative of that."

What made the trip so effective was that it featured workshops and volunteer work rather than lectures, he said.

For example, he spent time at the Gleaners Community Food Bank of Southeastern Michigan packaging snack bags filled with granola bars and cookies for kids to eat after school.



Toronto students Amanda Freedman and Ben Sterlin pack snack packages at a food bank. Teens packaged more than 20,000 pounds of food in total.

In total, teens participating in the summit donated 400 pounds of food to Detroit food banks, and they packaged more than 20,000 pounds of food to distribute to food insecure families.

Nowogrodski said he found it interesting to learn that food banks don't just focus on the homeless.

"It's not only homeless people who are hungry," he said, adding that your neighbour could be facing food insecurity and you might not know it.

"Just because someone looks like they're living an easy life and look like they're doing well doesn't mean they are," he said.

Although the trip focused only on the United States, Sterlin said he's able to take what he learned from the trip and apply it to Canada. He said he was planning to help food-insecure people locally by holding a screening of The Hunger Games: Catching Fire.

"We're partnering with the Daily Bread [Food Bank] and Mazon Canada," he said. "We're asking people to come in and bring cans of non-perishable food items, and 10 per cent of the proceeds we get from the tickets are going to Mazon."

He also plans to run a local campaign based on one he discovered on the trip. American students were sending letters to U.S. President Barack Obama on paper plates, expressing their feelings about hunger issues in the country.

Sterlin said he hopes to do the same here, but send the letters to Ontario Premier Kathleen Wynne and Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

He said it's so important that people understand that hunger is not just an issue in developing countries in places such as Africa.

"Hunger is actually really prevalent in our society, and it hits way closer to home a lot more than many people think, which is why us teens and community leaders need to become advocates for this really pressing issue," he said.

Program unites Reform, Conservative, Orthodox shuls

Out of the Cold holds Chanukah party

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

This week's Chanukah party sponsored by Temple Har Zion's Out of the Cold program on Nov. 27 is a model of co-operation.

Har Zion, a Reform congregation is providing the venue and the soup, Shaar Shalom Synagogue, which is Conservative, is providing the meals, and the Orthodox synagogue Beth Avraham Yoseph is providing the latkes.

"Everyone is involved. It is co-operation at its best," said Steve Borlak, a former co-ordinator of Har Zion's Out of the Cold program, which runs Wednesday nights during the winter.

Borlak, who was part of the group that spearheaded Har Zion's participation, said that although he has stepped down as co-ordinator, he still helps out. "I love this program. It's in my blood."

It started at Har Zion, he said, because of the efforts of Mosaic Interfaith, an umbrella organization in York Region that promotes understanding, education and dialogue among different religions.

"About 17 years ago, the group wanted to have a meaningful expression of their views, and they were taken by the Out of the Cold program. It spread from there," Borlak said.

Unlike similar programs in the City of Toronto, he said, guests can't get to the temple easily by public transportation, so volunteers pick them up at the Finch subway station at about 4:30 p.m. and shuttle them in.

"We wait for them inside the station, and meet them with a coffee or hot chocolate and an energy bar," said Borlak, whose wife, Marie, prepares the drinks. "When they arrive at the temple, they're treated to a first-class meal."

Guests can also consult with a nurse, take part in an art program, bingo or a movie, and choose some clothing.

"Some guests stay the night, and others who are not homeless, go home. When their evening is over, they're shuttled back to the subway. The guests who sleep over have breakfast before they go, and they take away a bagged lunch."

The program does have Jewish guests, Borlak said, although he can't recall a Jewish guest spending the night.

"For Chanukah, we always invite a Jewish guest to light the candles."

Nobody running the program is judgmental, he said.

"It's just meant to get guests out of the cold, and feed and clothe them. It's a boost to their self-esteem, because some are never treated as guests," Borlak said.

"We get to know all of them. Some live on the fringe, and come for a good meal and some socialization. There is very little turnover. When a new guest comes, we know right away."

Borlak said he realizes that this is a Band-Aid response to the problem of homelessness, but he noted that some guests who have improved their situation have come back to say thank you.

Even after being involved with the program for almost 17 years, he said he still gets excited about it.

"By the Tuesday evening before, I start to feel the energy."

Temple Har Zion volunteers Linda Slavner, left, and Ruth Altman prepare dinner for the temple's Wednesday night Out of the Cold program.

Four Seasons founder anchors Shaarei Shomayim renovation drive

Shul honours Sharp for $1M donation

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

On Dec. 3, Shaarei Shomayim Congregation will celebrate the success of its year-long capital campaign – called "Retire Rebuild Renew" – at a gala dinner with keynote speaker Isadore (Issy) Sharp.

Isadore and Rosalie Sharp and family have donated $1 million to the campaign, which has exceeded its original $1.5-million goal and raised close to $4 million, allowing it to undertake a major renovation. At the dinner, the main sanctuary will be dedicated in memory of Isadore's parents, Max and Lil Sharp.

Isadore Sharp, founder and chairman of Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts, and his wife, Rosalie, are prominent Canadian philanthropists who have received numerous awards for their contributions to the community.

"The Shaarei Shomayim Synagogue has always been an important part of my parents' life," he said. "They were instrumental in helping the synagogue to grow from the first basement-only building on St. Clair Avenue to become one of the largest Orthodox synagogues in North America. It is a privilege to have this opportunity to honour them in such a meaningful way."

The modern Orthodox shul was established in 1928 at 563 Christie St. It moved to 840 St. Clair Ave. W. in 1937 and acquired its present location at 470 Glencairn Ave. in 1966.

Michael Goldrich, co-chair of the campaign along with David Mansel, said the drive, whose full name is "Retire our Debt, Rebuild our Building and Renew our Commitment," has received almost $4 million so far, and the shul's 750 member families are still coming forward to participate.

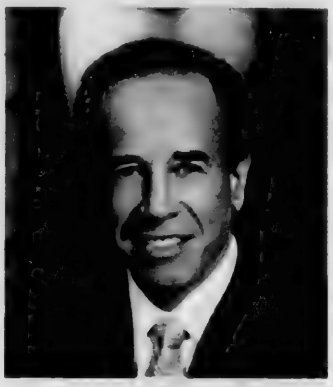
The original $1.5-million goal aimed to help pay off a debt incurred for repairs to the shul's lower level after a flood in 2010 caused by a burst city pipe, as well as repairs to the roof and a new heating and air conditioning system, said shul president Benny Osher.

But thanks to the Sharps and shul congregants, the synagogue hit its orginal target after only six months, so "we got more ambitious," Osher said.

"The flood was a blessing in disguise," he said, because it led to much-needed renovations to the lower level, such as new office space, a new beit midrash/chapel, a new wing of classrooms for the southern campus of Netivot HaTorah Day School and a reconfigured social hall.

But the extra money allowed the shul to go even further.

"This has been a phenomenal campaign, and we are overwhelmed with the generosity of our members and friends. Not only have we raised enough money and pledges to cover the debt from previous renovations, but we can now move forward with other important renovations to our sanctuary, lobby and exterior," he said.



Isadore (Issy) Sharp

"When complete, our shul will be a beautifully renovated space for our members and for the wider Jewish community for generations to come," he added.

"The Shaarei Shomayim family has rallied together to achieve something very special and very lasting," Goldrich said.

Rabbi Chaim Strauchler, who played a prominent role in the campaign, said, "We are the inheritors of a great tradition at Shaarei Shomayim, both in terms of the spiritual and physical legacy that has been left to us.

"We are grateful to God for the opportunity to extend this legacy to those who will follow our lead."

New Bnei Akiva head aims to revitalize campuses

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The new head of Bnei Akiva Schools – Yeshivat Or Chaim for boys and Ulpanat Orot for girls – says he's working hard to rebrand the two campuses.

"I'm trying to revitalize the schools and bring in a new energy," said Rabbi Seth Grauer, a native of New York City.

Most recently he was assistant principal for Yeshiva University High School for Girls and associate rabbi at the Fifth Avenue Synagogue, where one of his congregants was author Eli Wiesel.

In Rabbi Grauer's application to Bnei Akiva, Wiesel provided the search committee with a glowing reference.

Rabbi Seth Grauer

"I spoke with him often, and he became a type of mentor in terms of decision making, goal setting and priorities," the rabbi said."

Grauer, 35, who is married with three children, told The CJN that as part of the restructuring he has become head of both schools.

"Administration is now campus specific, because I recognized that it was inefficient to have staff who travel back and forth between schools. It doesn't lead to an effective academic environment."

Although this is his first year at the school, he was hired in December 2012 and worked behind the scenes.

"I told the board in January that the administrative structure is not sustainable," he said.

Grauer's teaching career started almost by accident. "I was in rabbinical school in New York, and at night I was taking courses for law school. To finish my rabbinical ordination I had to take part in a work study, and I met someone who told me he needed someone to teach an 11th-grade Talmud class once a week.

"I loved it, and at the end of the year the school offered me a job. I was supposed to start work at a law firm but I stayed at school."

He eventually went on to become assistant principal, but never stopped teaching.

"I'm continuing that policy here. All administrators have to teach. If they don't get into the classroom, they lose the pulse of the school," he said. "The classroom motivates you to think of new ideas, and be innovative. You can't be an effective administrator if you're not a teacher."

Grauer said Bnei Akiva Schools give students a top-rate education. "Classes are challenging and engaging, and about 99 per cent of the students go on to university. The vast majority spend time in Israel when they graduate."

He said that he's trying to encourage teachers to become mentors to their students.

"A formal Judaic studies curriculum is based on best practices and making intelligent decisions. We raise our standards of instruction through mentoring. I'm very excited about it."

As a born-and-raised New Yorker, he said that coming to Toronto has been a big change, "but in a positive way. There is a wonderful community here, and I'm proud to be part of it."

Toronto educator honoured

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A Toronto woman has been named one of five recipients of the Pomegranate Prize, an award designed to recognize and encourage educators who have been working for less than 10 years.

Risa Alyson Cooper, executive director of Shoresh Jewish Environmental Programs, was the only Canadian among this year's group of winners. Although she's not a teacher in the traditional sense, she has spent years working as an environmental educator both in Connecticut and in her native Toronto.

Risa Alyson Cooper with a pattypan squash

The prize is bestowed annually by the Covenant Foundation, which aims to recognize the diversity of strengths in North American Jewish education. Created in 2011, the award comes with $15,000 distributed over three years to help fuel the winners' projects.

"Our goal with this prize is to provide the means for these already remarkable educators to further develop their skills and interests, and have the chance to get to know others who, like themselves, are bringing fresh new ideas and abundant energy to the field of Jewish education," Keating Crown, a member of the foundation's founding family, said at the awards ceremony in Chicago on Oct. 28.

Cooper wasn't able to attend the ceremony, since she had given birth a month earlier.

Through Shoresh, Cooper, 32, has created the Shoresh Kavanah Garden at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

The garden is home to more than 100 kinds of organic vegetables, fruits, herbs and wildflowers. There's also a compost demonstration site, a rainwater catchment system, a Havdalah spice garden, raised wheelchair-accessible garden beds, a greenhouse, and an outdoor kitchen and bicycle-powered blender.

Signs in Hebrew, English and Russian allow people from a variety of backgrounds to learn about the garden

Shanghai Holocaust survivor inspires children

Marvin Glassman
Special To The CJN

Lily Toufar Lash of Toronto was one of 20,000 Jews who fled Europe in 1938 to find refuge and safety in Shanghai, China, but not for a life without its own horrors.

Toufar joined author Kathy Kacer during Holocaust Education Week to speak to some 50 young students at the Spadina children's library about Toufar's personal experience in Shanghai, which Kacer described in her new book Shanghai Escape.

Toufar, only four at the time, and her family escaped from Vienna on the night of Kristallnacht in 1938, fleeing to Shanghai, where they lived until 1948. She and her family immigrated to Toronto that year and have remained ever since.

"At first, things were not bad for Lily, as Shanghai represented freedom, even though Japan was in control of Shanghai. But, after the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbor in 1941 when America declared war, the Japanese army rounded up the Jewish refugees (called stateless refugees) to a ghetto in Hongkew," Kacer told the children.

"The Hongkew ghetto had deplorable conditions, Hongkew was overcrowded, many of the Jewish refugees were starving, and most were not able to leave the ghetto to work without a daily pass from the Japanese."

"My family was so lucky to have escaped Europe," Toufar said, "because I soon learned that other families were not as lucky. I feel so privileged to live in Canada, where everyone is free to practise religion."

Shanghai Escape is the latest of Kacer's children's books about Holocaust survivors. The author met Toufar through a mutual friend, and wanted to share her story to draw attention to the plight of the Jewish refugees in Shanghai.

"I wanted to share the innocence and confusion of a young girl's perspective on what happened in Shanghai. Children read and learn more about history when it's told from the vantage of a child. Most of the children attending the talk knew little about Japan and how they were involved with the Nazis," Kacer said.

Shanghai Escape describes some of the experiences of young Lily, her parents and extended family that put their lives in danger while they were forced to stay in Hongkew. The incidents include a dramatic account of Lily's mother being violently beaten by a Japanese official for failing to show a pass allowing her to go to work outside the ghetto.

The book has mystery and drama, as the reader is unsure of the fate of Lily and her family. A recurring passage has Lily's father stating, "We will always be together, Lily, no matter what," which comforted the child, no matter how uncertain and dangerous the years in Shanghai were.

Although Japan did not send Jews to concentration camps as the Nazis did, there was speculation in the book that the Japanese were planning to send the Jews in Hongkew to prison camps if the war had not ended in 1945.

When the Toufars immigrated to Toronto in 1948, Lily's extended family owned a grocery store on Eglinton Avenue before buying a farm in Richmond Hill, north of the city.

In 1958, Lily met and married Jimmy Lash, who survived the Holocaust in the Lodz ghetto of Poland and the Auschwitz concentration camp. They live in Toronto and have two children and two grandchildren.

Kacer and Toufar will talk about Shanghai Escape again on Dec. 5, 6:30 p.m., at the Kiever Shul, 25 Bellevue Ave. For more information, call 416-593-9702 or go to www.kathykacer.ca

Kacer and Toufar will also be speaking about the book Dec. 4 at the Kiever Shul.

Cooper called a visionary

Harlene Appelman, executive director of the foundation, said the panel of judges selected Cooper for the prize because she shows such promise so early in her career.

"She's a pioneer. She's a visionary," Appelman said. "She's accomplished a lot in a short time."

Appelman said she hopes that the five winners will be able to rely on each other for support and new ideas that will improve Jewish education in North America. There will be webinars throughout the year, and the winners will come together for a meeting in New Jersey in February.

Cooper said she found out she had won the prize on the first day of her maternity leave.

"I was completely floored, and just so humbled and grateful," she said. "It was a sweet way to transition out of Shoresh."

Shoresh means, "root" in Hebrew, which Cooper said is perfect in describing the group's projects.

"Shoresh is helping community members get back to their Jewish roots," she said. "The idea is that through interacting with our land with the earth, we're able to access and understand a part of our Jewish heritage."

She said it's a blessing when she's able to teach someone and watch them have an "aha" moment.

"What I love about being a educator is helping to create points of connections… whether it's offering them an opportunity to connect with a kind of tree or a particular Jewish text or even other community members," she said. "I feel these other kinds of Jewish connections deepen our understanding of not just ourselves, but our community around us."

Group suspected of child abuse

Extremist Jewish sect flees Quebec

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — About 280 members of a cult-like Jewish sect left their enclave in Ste. Agathe des Monts, Que., overnight Nov. 17-18 for Ontario, reportedly fleeing because they were under investigation by the Youth Protection Department.

Citing Sûreté du Québec (SQ) sources, La Presse reported that the Lev Tahor (Hebrew for pure heart) group, consisting of about 40 families and led by self-styled chassidic Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans, left in a convoy of cars and buses.

Their departure was observed by the SQ, but its officers did not intervene, according to La Presse sources.

They went to a motel in Chatham-Kent, near Detroit. At the end of last week, police there had been in touch with Quebec authorities.

Numerous allegations of neglect and abuse of children, as well as women, have been made over the years, but no charges were ever laid. The women wear headscarves and long dark cloaks.

There have been accounts that Rabbi Helbrans exerts tyrannical control over his followers.

They left behind the houses and institutions they had built in Ste. Agathe since Rabbi Helbrans established the group in the Laurentian town more than 10 years ago.

The Israeli-born Rabbi Helbrans (also known as Elbarnes) was convicted of kidnapping in 1994 in New York for holding a boy at his yeshiva for two years. Facing deportation to Israel upon his release from prison, he fled to Canada.

Despite being a convicted felon, he was granted refugee status in 2004, after he claimed to be in danger if he was sent back to Israel because of his extreme anti-Zionist views.

Although the group was insular, its members did occasionally burn the Israeli flag in public.

The Times of Israel on Nov. 20 quoted Oded Twik, an Israeli whose sister and eight children had lived with Lev Tahor for the past eight years, as saying the group feared the authorities were about to remove children because of an impending youth protection case.

Twik said she urged Canadian authorities to remove all of the children – 137, according to her information – from the group.

She said the group hoped to go to Iran. Another website, FailedMessiah.com, citing an unnamed source, said the group wants to go to Sudan or any country that would not extradite them to Canada or Israel.

The Times of Israel reported that dozens of family members and supporters held a demonstration outside the Canadian embassy in Tel Aviv on Oct. 14 to raise awareness of the danger they believe their relatives are in by staying with Lev Tahor.

Lev Tahor also has a branch in Beit Shemesh, Israel. Last year, two teenaged girls from that community were sent back to Israel when they arrived at Trudeau airport in Montreal, apparently on their way to visit the Ste. Agathe community. Immigration officials were complying with an Israeli court order issued after the girls' grandmother petitioned it out of fear for their welfare. Lev Tahor had apparently been planning to decamp for some time. On its website (levtahor.ca) is a lengthy message written in poor English and dated Feb. 17, 2013, that they had left for a place within "driving distance of several hours from Quebec." (Most of the website content is in Hebrew.)

"The reason that the community left Quebec is the education decrees in Quebec… Some of our people were called to court because of the education decrees, and they were faced to a fact: 'If you would not surrender to the education decrees, we would take your children from you.'"

This may be a reference to the province's prescribed curriculum, as well as other laws obligating children to attend school and that those schools be licensed and the teachers certified.

The message denies that any child protection laws were violated, as was "said again and again for years and years against the community."

"The community invited the local social services to examine, to discuss and to investigate each and every person in the community, adults and children. This is to show again that the blood libels that are said by liars on the community have no connection to reality."

A garbled update dated Nov. 21, 2013, reads: "The children of the people that were called to court today due to the decrees of education, informed the social service, in the country where they live, that they do not want, to go to trial today at all, because they are afraid that they will be taken from their parents against their parents' will and against their will."

A plea is made for donations to help with the group's move and setting up of a new enclave, "not to mention the recent legal expenses stemming ultimately also from the struggle for education."

Jewish community helps to rebuild Haiti

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Former governor general Michaëlle Jean is lending her support to a joint project of the Montreal Jewish and Haitian communities to develop sustainable agriculture in Haiti.

Jean, who is now special envoy to that Caribbean island for UNESCO, thanked the Kanpe Foundation and the Canadian Friends of the Hebrew University (CFHU) for their initiative at the project's Nov. 14 launch at the Montreal Science Centre.

The organizations hope to raise $1 million for the 10-year, two-phase project. The first phase is to send experts from the Hebrew University's agricultural department to Haiti to train people there in how to improve farming techniques in the most ecological way.

The second phase will provide scholarships for Haitians to study at Hebrew University's Rodney H. Smith faculty of agriculture, food and environment, which since 1986 has run an international program for students from developing countries.

Kanpe (Creole for "stand up") is a Montreal-based organization that seeks to end the cycle of poverty by equipping Haitians with the skills and means that lead to economic independence.

Jean recalled that the Jewish presence in Haiti goes back to 1830 when Jews started finding refuge there from pogroms in the Middle East and later Europe. She noted that the Haitian government, unlike most others in the world, issued visas to those fleeing Nazi persecution in the 1930s.

The community grew to 300 families, before eventually dispersing by the 1960s.

Growing up in Haiti, Jean said she was well aware of the community through its commerce and institutions, such as a synagogue and two cemeteries.

It's a relationship she is happy to see flourishing once again, something positive that has come out of catastrophe: the earthquake in January 2010.

She thanked Israel for rushing to the aid of Haitians and setting up the first field hospital after the devastation.

"My grandmother and mother taught me that education is the key to freedom, the freedom to make better choices," said Jean, who is also University of Ottawa chancellor.

Jean hopes for a true partnership among Haitians, Israelis and Canadians in helping to rebuild the country, with Haitians not only on the receiving end, but able to share their knowledge as well.

In December, she plans to meet with representatives of the Université Roi Henri Christophe in the northern part of the country to gain their co-operation in the project.

"Haiti wants to learn, but it also has a lot to offer," she said.

Jean believes this project will encourage Haitians to stay in their country after they have completed studies abroad. Unfortunately, she said, too many educated elsewhere don't come back.

The earthquake brought the Montreal Jewish and Haitian communities (the latter numbers about 120,000) closer, and raised awareness of their historic ties.

Simon Bensimon, executive director of the CFHU, Montreal chapter, had the idea of extending the generosity the Jewish community had shown to earthquake relief over the longer term.

Hebrew University's agricultural faculty was working in Africa, Asia and Central America, but a connection with Haiti back in the 1980s had lapsed, he said.

The project took shape after Dominique Anglade, Kanpe co-founder, who Bensimon had known when he worked at Concordia University, came on board. Her parents, both political activists, died in the earthquake.

The evening, called Terroir: Two Communities, Three Countries, One Goal, was hosted by television and radio host Isabelle Racicot, whose father was Haitian. She visited Israel last year.

Israel an 'eye-opener' for university rector

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Université de Montréal rector Guy Breton says he learned more in Israel than he did during a similar academic mission to China.

The superpower is eclipsed by the tiny Jewish state, in his view, when it comes to the dynamism of its universities.

When Breton became rector in 2010 he vowed to expand the UdeM's already extensive ties with hundreds of academic institutions around the world. Three countries were in his sights: China, Brazil – as the economic leader of Latin America – and Israel.

In October, he led an intensive 10-day trip to Israel, the first UdeM mission to the country, visiting all seven major universities. The 10 delegates included vice-rector for international relations Hélène David and professors and researchers from departments as diverse as pharmacy, biology, political science, music and medicine. Breton is a former vice-dean of medicine.

Breton said he received no opposition to making Israel a priority, but plenty of questions as to why. Today, he feels vindicated.

"It was an incredible eye-opener," he said of the mission. "We have a folkloric image of Israel. If you are not close to it, you do not understand the reality. Much more is going on there than we think."

Breton makes clear he is not interested in entering into political disputes, and has no patience with boycotts. His first job is to educate people, and he is convinced a greater connection with Israel will help him do that.

"I want students to be better trained. Period. Don't bother me with politics," he said.

When he speaks of dynamism, Breton means Israeli academics' ability to "think outside the box; they try to find a solution to a problem, that not only is good for Israel, but could be exportable, that could help others.

"This is what we should be doing everywhere."

Breton was impressed with the universities' technology transfer companies, which seek markets for products and ideas coming out of research.

Israel is far ahead of Canadian universities in this regard, he said. He terms it "snobbish" to rigidly hold to the view that the academic and the commercial should not mix.

"If a I find a good molecule, a better way to teach math, why shouldn't it be made available to society?" Breton wonders.

That does not mean industry should direct what research a university conducts, he added, acknowledging the legitimate concern that research that doesn't lead to the marketplace may be shunned if universities get too cozy with business.

As long as the direction comes from the university, and not the company, this fear is exaggerated, he believes.

The UdeM is the second largest university in Canada in terms of enrolment, and its annual research budget of $525 million is surpassed only by the University of Toronto and University of British Columbia.

The UdeM visitors learned that Israeli universities are not "swimming in money" from donations from Jewish communities abroad as they had perceived.

The revenue from commercialization is a significant source of revenue, Breton found out, something cash-strapped universities here could use.

Breton stressed that the UdeM, which was founded 135 years ago to educate the French-Canadian elite, has throughout its history been open to everyone. There were never quotas on Jewish students as there were, notably, at McGill University, and many Jews were able to enter the professions because they were admitted by the UdeM.

Université de Montréal rector Guy Breton with identified friend in Jerusalem

One of Breton's pet projects today is to find a way to persuade chassidic Jews – his neighbours in Outremont – to study at the UdeM.

"We have a long, long history of positive relations with the Jewish community," said Breton, but he felt that contact had been allowed to lapse in recent years. Therefore, he more than welcomed the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs' offer to help organize the Israel mission.

He was also glad that Rosalind and Morris Goodman, who graduated in pharmacy from the UdeM 60 years ago and is a major benefactor of his alma mater, accompanied the group, providing them with an insider's perspective on life in Israel.

The UdeM had some earlier connections to Israeli universities, notably Hebrew University of Jerusalem, but they had never been formalized. Now, memorandums of general agreement have been reached with Technion and the University of Haifa, and there are discussions for collaboration with the five other universities.

The delegation made a brief visit to Ramallah on the West Bank, at the suggestion of their CIJA escort Myriam Azogui-Halbwax. Because there was a university strike, the Montrealers met with two representatives of Birzeit and Al-Quds universities at the Canadian delegation, rather than on campus.

Breton found they were not at the level of the Israeli universities, and no future partnership is envisioned, although the UdeM may help them, perhaps in the field of medicine.

Personally, Breton said he found the trip emotional; although not "a religious fanatic," it was moving to walk in the footsteps of Jesus Christ.

He was also gratified to see how peacefully, Jews, Muslims and the various Christian denominations live together in Jerusalem.

Breton was impressed with how much Israel has accomplished in its 65-year history, and its "capacity to change."

"The Israel of 2013 is not the Israel of 1993 or even 2003," he said.

Israeli university students, compared to their Quebec counterparts, are more mature – in years because of their military service – but also in outlook.

"They do not want to waste time. They are keen to learn well and fast, and to have a good life."

One of the first fruits of the new relationship will be a concert organized by the music faculties of UdeM and Tel Aviv University next fall in Montreal. It will be conducted by the Israeli Yoav Talmi, who was artistic director of the Orchestre symphonique de Québec from 1998-2011 and is now music director of the Israel Chamber Orchestra.

Canadian, Israeli defence ministers meet

CJN Staff

OTTAWA — Defence Minister Rob Nicholson and his Israeli counterpart, Moshe Ya'alon, met Nov. 22 for the first time to discuss how to enhance co-operation and build on a growing defence relationship between Canada and Israel.

"I am proud to say that Canada and Israel enjoy close military relations at all levels," Nicholson said.

"The strong ties between Canada and Israel are based on our shared values, including democracy and the rule of law. Our co-operation in terms of defence is continually improving, and I am confident that we will find avenues to expand our defence relations even further in the near future."

Nicholson and Ya'alon also discussed the Principal Memorandum of Understanding signed by Canada and Israel in January 2011, which laid a foundation for Canadian-Israeli defence co-operation in counter-terrorism, training, search and rescue, intelligence, command and control and the sharing of new technologies.

Since being signed, it has shaped and added momentum to the development of the two countries' defence relationship, and is the basis of future co-operation between their two militaries, the federal government said in a statement.

While in Canada, Ya'alon joined Nicholson in Halifax for the fifth annual Halifax International Security Forum, which took place from Nov. 22 to 24.

While there, Ya'alon also met with U.S. Defence Secretary Chuck Hagel, who was also attending the conference.

Guard your tongue

Family Matters

According to Rabbi Israel Meyer Hakohen, also know as the Chofetz Chaim, one of the greatest Torah sages of all time, God requires caution in speech even more than in sight or hearing because speech can determine life and death: "Life and death are in the hands of the tongue" (Mishlei 18:21). The Torah's dim view of slander or gossip (even if true) is that evil words not only lead to evil deeds, but character assassination is in itself murder, albeit murder of someone's name and reputation.

Prior to the murder of Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin in 1995, many Rabbis in Canada denounced the language of animosity and warned of catastrophic results if the name-calling within the Jewish people, from every political stripe, did not stop. Several weeks before the assassination, Orthodox Rabbi Baruch Taub of Toronto — the founding rabbi and Rabbi Emeritus of Canada's largest orthodox congregation — publically admonished his kehilla and Jews everywhere to debate their differences with civility and kindness, and denounced the slanderous portrayal of Jewish leaders of both the right and left, whether in Israel or in the diaspora. He specifically warned that if the bad language continued, Jewish history would repeat itself.

Causeless hatred among Jews not only accounted for the destruction of our ancient Temple but was the basis of the in-fighting from Herod's time thorough the schisms of misnagdim vs. chassidic Jews and the lack of serious dialogue between Zionists, Socialists (Bund) and observant Jews in the period between World War I and II. All Jews ultimately paid the price for such slanderous behaviour.

When unified, the Jewish people, with God's help, can create amazing wonders against all natural odds; witness the Six Day war ("and on the seventh He rested") and the survival of the Talmud and our people after so much persecution, the raid on the Entebbe airport, the Exodus of Russian and Ethiopian Jews, the freeing of Syrian Jewry.

When we raise our disagreements to the level of slanderous name-calling, we invite our own destruction. As the children and grandchildren of Holocaust survivors, how can we now face the few remaining survivors or, if deceased, our relatives in the next world when, after Auschwitz, a Jew can even think of using heinous language against another Jew, whether from the left or right, whether with or without a kipa on his head? Did over six million really die for nothing? Do we still refuse to learn?

At the very least, we who were spared the Holocaust must carefully consider every word before it leaves our mouths, not only in political debate, but — let's be honest — within our immediate families. I have seen more Jewish divorces than I would care to count result from an in-law who refused to withhold scornful criticism from their married child about the child's spouse; too many insensitive souls who insult their wives/husbands or belittle their children with hurtful language; too much gossip. The courts are crowded with the consequences of missed opportunities to withhold one's tongue and act with tact.

And I'm the only one who profits.

Master Cork was one of the greatest and wisest Judicial officers in Ontario's history. He made countless family law rulings over several years and was obliged to read innumerable affidavits where parents, with their lawyer's assistance, detailed terrible allegations of child abuse and neglect against each other. Almost every time I appeared in front of him in open court with other lawyers, he would beg counsel to have their clients cease making such claims if they were exaggerated, as they often were (and are today). Why? In his experience, the children would become aware of these written diatribes, if not at the time, then as adults, many years later. The hurt and pain such statements then caused had catastrophic consequences.

So the next time you are tempted to call your spouse an idiot or tell your child that he's stupid or complain about your elderly parent's eccentric behaviour, remember what happened to Rabin. Remember it in your home; remember it in the synagogue; remember it when you light your Chanukah candles. And yes, remember it even when separating from your spouse. Let its lesson not be lost on you. Murderous language leads to discord and, on rare occasions, murder itself. If you catch yourself and learn to guard your tongue, then such exemplary conduct will be part of Rabin's true memorial: the preservation of your Jewish family and ultimately, the Jewish community.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a freylich Chanukah.

Quebec city faces similar challenges

Israeli envoy seeks ties with Rimouski

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Following a two-day visit to Rimouski, Israel's consul general in Montreal, Joel Lion, said he sees the potential for co-operation between his country and the lower St. Lawrence city.

"Rimouski's international strength in maritime research is of interest to Israel, and a source of potential collaboration at the academic and industrial levels," he said.

Israel, which is situated between the Mediterranean and Red Seas, faces many similar challenges that Rimouski is dealing with, especially those related to the environment, he said.

Consul General Joel Lion

Rimouski, a city of about 47,000, is home to the Institut Maritime du Québec (IMQ) and several ocean sciences research centres.

Lion met with many of Rimouski's political, economic, academic and cultural leaders, and toured its research facilities.

He was the guest of honour at a luncheon hosted by the Société de promotion économique de Rimouski (SOPER), where he gave a presentation on Israel's economy. Among those present was Mayor Eric Forest and Guy Caron, MP for Rimouski-Neigette-Témiscouata-Les Basques, as well as local business people.

SOPER director Raynald Bourassa welcomed the opportunity to show the diplomat his region's economic opportunities.

Lion's visit was part of a series he has made to the province's regions, with which he hopes to create greater ties. He has previously been to Rouyn-Noranda, Alma and Chicoutimi.

"My hope is that the Quebec government will organize economic missions to Israel from the various regions of Quebec," he said, with the framework of the economic co-operation agreements in place.

He invited the area's business people to visit Israel to meet with their counterparts.

Lion also met with the rector of the Université du Québec à Rimouski, Jean-Pierre Ouellet, and toured laboratories at the Institut des sciences de la mer de Rimouski and the IMQ.

Lion's visit culminated with a cocktail featuring Israeli wines and local gastronomy. The municipal officials and industry representatives were introduced to Israel's vibrant cultural scene.

"Israelis and Quebecers have many common values," Lion told the local media, "not only in the industrial and commercial sectors, but also on the side of the arts and culture.

"Innovation is just one of Israel's strengths."

Rimouski has a rich cultural life as well, organizing an annual jazz festival and book salon, as well as being the site of a music conservatory.

Jewish jurists says it is discriminatory

Holocaust centre warns charter fans prejudice

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre (MHMC) has come out against Quebec's proposed secularism charter, saying it will encourage prejudice against religious practice.

In a Nov. 14 letter to Democratic Institutions Minister Bernard Drainville, MHMC president Helen Malkin and executive director Alice Herscovitch say Bill 60 "legitimizes discrimination and will entrench ignorance of minority religious practice and communities through lack of exposure, and negate their contribution to Quebec society. It will push difference out of the socially acceptable public sphere."

The discussion surrounding the charter "generates... fear and questioning" among the many Holocaust survivors still living in Montreal, who are particularly sensitive to signs of prejudice and discrimination.

"Is this our place? Will stigma and the unwillingness to respect signs of religious belief cause new prejudice against minorities? Will it act to counter the integration which has already taken place?" they ask.

Malkin and Herscovitch say the charter has "already had a distressing impact on some Muslim women."

They warn of the "incremental nature of discrimination and the development of stigmatization of groups," saying "this charter is one such step."

On the same day, Premier Pauline Marois demanded that Liberal house leader Jean-Marc Fournier apologize for something he said in the National Assembly about the duty to learn from history.

Fournier repeated an anecdote he heard Rabbi Reuben Poupko relate during the Jewish community's commemoration on Nov. 10 of the 75th anniversary of Kristallnacht, intended to illustrate how important religious symbols are to Jews.

The story is about a man who lost his kippah, when he was accosted by German soldiers during World War II.

"He wanted to pick it up, but a soldier was stopping him," Fournier said. "He did it anyway. That day, between the kippah and life, he chose the kippah."

Marois asked Fournier to apologize for his "completely inappropriate comments that leave the impression that there could be a similarity between the horrible events of the Holocaust, of Kristallnacht, and the charter of secularism project."

Fournier later told the media he was not comparing what the Nazis did with the Parti Québécois' plan. What he was trying to convey was that, "for some people, their symbol has a meaning that those who do not wear it cannot understand to the same degree."

Meanwhile, the Lord Reading Law Society, a 65-year-old association of Jewish lawyers and judges, says the Parti Québécois' proposed secularism charter compromises fundamental freedoms enshrined in the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights, as well as the Canadian and Quebec rights charters.

In a Nov. 19 statement, the society says it is "disheartened and dismayed" that the Quebec government with Bill 60 is proposing limits on the freedoms of conscience, expression and religion, "although no harm to society has been shown that would justify any such limitations."

The separation of religion and state and the equality between women and men are already part of the law, the society points out.

The bill would discriminate against people who are required by their religion to wear certain attire, excluding them from the public service, including the judiciary, the society says.

Judges, who would be among the employees subject to the law, do not "represent" the state, the society maintains.

"A judge represents the 'rule of law.' If a judge 'represented' the state rather than the law, no judge could adjudicate cases involving the government because of conflict of interest," it states.

"How does what a judge, a police officer, a health professional or any other public servant wears diminish their impartiality or ability any more than the colour of their skin, their nationality, their language, their sex or any other ground upon which the law prohibits discrimination?"

Furthermore, the society thinks that the present debate "provides, to those who would be so inclined, false reasons and a cover to attack their neighbours."

The society applauded Quebec Human Rights Commission chair Jacques Frémont and Montreal Mayor Denis Coderre for their "acerbic" criticism of the charter.

The society notes that its statement was adopted by its board of directors without the participation of any member of the judiciary or a quasi-judicial tribunal.

Rabbi protests charter with 'Quebec kippah'

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Rabbi Yisroel Bernath, director of Chabad of NDG, has come up with an imaginative way of peacefully protesting Bill 60, the proposed charter of Quebec values: "the Quebec kippah."

The cap is festooned with the province's blue-and-white Fleur-de-lis flags.

"It's selling really well," said Rabbi Bernath. Available at qkippa.com, they cost $10 each. Handmade in Quebec, a limited run of 400 is available, each individually numbered.

Rabbi Schachar Orenstein of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue is one of the enthusiastic customers, and has made a point of wearing one on his visits to hospitals.

"I bought 60 and distributed them to my congregation. Many doctors at the Jewish [General Hospital] are wearing them. If I had the budget, I would purchase for the entire hospital staff," he emailed.

"I like to think of it as the Marois protest kippah and would like to see if the government will force people to take off the Quebec kippah."

Another Chabad rabbi, Rabbi Dovid Weinbaum, is putting up a spiritual resistance to the charter.

The program director of Living Legacy said the "Share the Light for Religious Freedom" campaign coinciding with Chanukah is meant to dispel the "gloom and despondency" the bill is creating among people of all faiths.

A law that "seeks to curb religious freedom adds to the darkness" in the world, he said.

"The festival commemorates the victory of the Jews over the Greeks," he explained. "While the Greeks were happy for the Jews to live in Israel, they did not want them to practise their religion –sound familiar?"

The organization is encouraging everyone to perform a mitzvah, no matter how small, in the belief that such collective action may generate "a glorious floodlight that will show Quebec as a beacon of religious tolerance in an increasingly dark world."

A number of community and civic leaders, Jewish and non-Jewish, have been invited to lead the way by declaring they will do a good deed, including Anthony Housefather and William Steinberg. The mayors, respectively, of Côte St. Luc and Hampstead appear in a video that is to be posted on YouTube.

The campaign is being run in conjunction with the YM-YWHA, where Living Legacy sets up its Chanukah Wonderland installation for children each year.

Charest lauds JGH as great Quebec institution

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Jean Charest has bolstered the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) in its stance against Quebec's proposed secularism charter.

The former Liberal premier and his wife Michèle Dionne were the honorees at the JGH's annual fundraising gala, held Nov. 19 at the Arsenal in Griffintown.

"The JGH represents what we love about Montreal, Quebec and Canada. Differences are a part of who we are," he said. "Contrary to those who think we should erase those differences, they are something to be celebrated."

They were welcome words at a time when the JGH is not only taking the risk of openly challenging the Parti Québécois government, but is having to justify its Jewish character in some quarters.

The JGH board said earlier this month it will not seek any exemption foreseen in Bill 60 that would allow it a "transition period" to comply with the law, because it believes prohibiting its employees from wearing religious attire is discriminatory.

The JGH was also unnerved by Internet comments made by the PQ candidate in the Dec. 9 byelection in Viau that flippantly endorsed removing the word "Jewish" from its name and banning circumcision there.

Tania Longpré has since explained that it was an off-hand remark that doesn't represent her views, but never unequivocally retracted them.

Charest said he and his wife did not hesitate when former JGH president Steven Cummings invited them to be the event's honorees.

Charest said the JGH provides the highest level of care to everyone, and is "a great institution of Quebec that plays an important role in our society."

He experienced that first-hand when his father-in-law, Philippe Dionne, was a patient at JGH during his final illness, for which the family is very grateful. He died at the JGH after a long illness at age 90 in July 2011.

Michèle Dionne spoke movingly of how well her father, a surgeon who practised for many years in Sherbrooke, was treated by doctors, staff and volunteers, first in the cancer department and then in palliative care.

Another former premier, the PQ's Lucien Bouchard, was also among the 600 guests. His former wife, Audrey Best, was a cancer patient at the JGH, where she died in January 2011.

The JGH also received support from one of Quebec's emblematic institutions, the Mouvement Desjardins, the largest association of credit unions in North America.

Desjardins gave a $1-million donation, making it the lead sponsor of the evening.

RHA aims to lure non-day school families

"We've been hearing community comments about the need to encourage, support and incentivize and enable families to say, 'I can afford a Jewish education and that the cost of education won't deter me,'" said Ed Segalowitz, executive director of federation's Julia and Henry Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Education.

Ed Segalowitz

"If you make between $200,000 and $300,000, and you think, 'By the time my third kid comes along, it'll be too much...' If you knew that it was going to be capped at 15 per cent, you'd think, 'Maybe I can do it.'"

RHA currently has a student body of about 380. Tuition varies from year to year: fees for full-day junior and senior kindergarten are $13,785; grades 1 to 5 cost $15,325, and grades 6 to 8 is $15,475.

Parents with three children at RHA who are paying full tuition pay about $45,000 a year, a cost that might deter middle income families.

But under the iCAP program, payments for a family that brings in $250,000 a year could be reduced to about $32,000 a year once the 15 per cent cap is applied.

Sumerlus said that when considering the cost, parents should also factor in an annual federal tax deduction worth about 50 per cent of tuition, which, combined with the cap, means families "benefit a fair bit."

However, if parents are considering leaving a Toronto Jewish day school to take advantage of the RHA program, Sumerlus and Segalowitz said they wouldn't be eligible.

"We're not poaching from other schools. If families are already enrolled at another Jewish day school, they can't come here. This is for new families," Sumerlus said.

"This project is to entice families who have not yet entered the Jewish day school system, or those who may be interested in switching from public school to Hebrew school," Segalowitz added.

But Segalowitz anticipates that other Jewish schools will follow suit and offer the iCAP program in the near future.

"Our plan is to expand beyond RHA," he said.

Arnie Zar-Kessler, head of school at the Solomon Schechter Day School of Boston, where the iCAP program was born, said that the cost of subsidizing three-child families at her school resulted in "a larger-than-usual across-the-board tuition increase."

Both Segalowitz and Sumerlus insisted that won't be the case at RHA.

"For the families that are already in the school, for the next three years, Avi Chai, Federation and RHA are sharing the cost of the implied lost revenue that comes from those families that are already in the school," Segalowitz said.

Sumerlus said that there are between six to 12 families with three or more children currently enrolled at RHA that might be eligible for the program next year, depending on their income.

She said RHA is not yet able to determine how iCAP will affect the families' tuition fees or the school's cash flow.

"The idea is that the new families will come and they will generate new revenue. Those new revenues will be sufficient to cover the cost of educating the children [at a reduced tuition fee]," Segalowitz said.

"We feel that we can draw more families in who wouldn't otherwise come, and the sheer volume makes a difference. One washes out the other," Sumerlus added.

Segalowitz said the iCAP program will also not affect federation's existing tuition assistance program, which provides financial relief to families that make less than $200,000 a year.

He said federation plans to establish a separate fund for the iCAP initiative.

"We want to get the research first, understand what the actual costs are, and then, when we figure it out, we'll be able to speak to donors to support this effort," Segalowitz said.

"So all the funds available to people through the financial assistance program is still available for families of lower income levels.

"We've been listening to the community's concern and we've been trying to think about what we can do. We're experimenting," Segalowitz said.

"We believe in doing whatever we can to make our community and program available to people. We're trying something innovative and hoping it will work," Sumerlus added.

report to the

Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life

Holocaust exhibit extended due to popular demand

Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life, Baycrest's unique photography exhibit featuring 180 Holocaust survivor photographs of Baycrest residents and program participants, has been extended to the spring due to an overwhelming response from the public.

The exhibition, which features the striking black and white photography of Elliot Sylman, child of a Holocaust survivor, features portraits of participants in Baycrest's Café Europa program as well as residents at the Terraces of Baycrest and the Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged.

"More than 500 people have been through the exhibition since its opening on Nov. 3, as part of Neuberger Holocaust Education Week 2013," says exhibit co-organizer Bianca Stern, Executive Director of Culture, Arts and Innovation at Baycrest. "The response from our participants, their families and the Jewish community has been overwhelming. We've also welcomed school, educational, and multifaith groups from across the GTA."

The title of the exhibit refers to the collection of Judaica from the Jewish Museum in Prague, which toured selections from the more than 200,000 objects, books, artistic artifacts and printed material collected by the Nazis from Jewish communities across Europe during the Second World War. It was an anti-homage to Jewish life in what the Third Reich had intended as a "Museum of an Extinct Race."

The Baycrest exhibit, Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life, reveals not the symbols and objects of Jewish life, but the actual survivors who carried their culture with them on their backs and in their hearts to a new world in North America. Here, despite the trauma they endured, the families they lost and their fears in starting anew, they went on to establish legacies of their own.

"It really has become a collaborative Baycrest community project," says co-organizer Corinne Rusch-Drutz, Director of Digital & Donor Communications at the Baycrest Foundation. "It draws on all areas of Baycrest expertise, the experiences of residents and program participants, and creates a significant and powerful shared narrative. It also speaks to the engagement of our donor community that understands the importance of supporting specialized programs like Café Europa." (story continued on page two)

My Virtual Dream ranks in top five at Scotiabank Nuit Blanche 2013

"Think of it as artistic groupthink in the name of science." – Toronto Star

On Oct. 5, 2013, Baycrest and the University of Toronto showed the world the exciting possibilities of combining science, technology and art in a way that could revolutionize the study and understanding of the human brain.

The My Virtual Dream installation at the Scotiabank Nuit Blanche drew more than 1,600 spectators during a 12-hour period, showcasing the incredible power of The Virtual Brain technology being developed at Baycrest's Rotman Research Institute.

Using brain-computer interfaces (BCIs) linked to The Virtual Brain, participants were able to synchronize their brain waves and create stunning dreamscapes of visuals and sound inside a 60-foot dome at the corner of College and University. Over the course of the evening, nearly 600 participants had the opportunity to try the headsets and their brain data will now help further develop The Virtual Brain - made possible through founding donors Dr. Max and Gianna Glassman.

The Virtual Brain simulates how the brain functions under various normal conditions, how it changes with the aging process and how it responds to damage from trauma or disease. In the future, The Virtual Brain can be used to test experimental brain therapies on a computer before being tested on patients. This is another wonderful example of how Baycrest is improving care for older adults by placing research and patient care on a holistic continuum that also includes art, culture and innovative technology.

Straight talk - A message from the Baycrest Foundation's Interim President

Since taking up the helm at the Baycrest Foundation I've had an opportunity to personally spend time with many of our donors. In having these conversations, a couple of themes have emerged that I thought would be interesting to share. I'm struck by both the passion and commitment in the way people speak about Baycrest. It's clear in the language people use to describe their relationship with us that they feel deeply and personally about Baycrest. And I'm touched by the forward thinking and longevity that many of our donors express through their giving.

In the past few months we have celebrated a number of donors who through their gifts have created a meaningful and lasting difference: Fran Sonshine for her longstanding commitment to Baycrest, the Shore and Gorman families for their commitment to education and employee excellence, the Freeman family for their support of the Day Centre, Joseph Gottdenker and his many contributions to our programs and events, and the Justein family for their lasting contribution to culture and heritage. We will soon celebrate all of our 2013 endowment holders and Sam Ruth Legacy members. Each time I speak with donors, I am struck that the common denominator in our discussion is the legacy they wish to leave to Baycrest by furthering our ability to continue to support and nurture the community.

As you will read in the stories that follow, our donors tell us that supporting Baycrest conveys strong cultural values, the importance of meeting community needs and a shared goal for the future. It's quite exciting to be energized by a group of like-minded visionaries who see the possibilities for healthcare as we see them and create special connections between philanthropy, innovation and growth.

I'm inspired by the exchanges I've had since taking on this new role – and appreciate the many constructive suggestions. But all of these discussions share a connection to the place Baycrest holds in so many hearts – including my own. Stay connected. I encourage you to reach out and let me know your thoughts. Email me directly at gfoster@baycrest.org, visit our website or find us on your favourite social media channel. I look forward to hearing from you.

With the largest cohort of Holocaust survivors in Canada, Baycrest offers a range of programs for survivors and their families including drop-ins, specialized services for child survivors and second-generation support groups. Baycrest also produces a series of unique publications focused on caregiving for survivors.

"Holocaust education and commemoration is a central focus for the Azrieli Foundation," says Dr. Naomi Azrieli on behalf of the Foundation, which supports a wide range of initiatives in the Jewish community and which recently donated $150,000 in support of Café Europa. "Through our Memoirs program, we have had the privilege of working closely with many Holocaust survivors who now call Canada home. It is our pleasure to support the many survivors who participate in the Café Europa program."

As photographer Elliot Sylman notes: "This special collection of black and white photographs tells an important story. Though I've been photographing survivors across the country since I was 14, this is the first time I've been able to take so many portraits at once. It's a powerful experience. Our time to create this kind of exhibit is running out as survivors age and it's been great to work with Baycrest on this project."

Precious Legacy: A Celebration of Life is generously co-sponsored by Marilyn and Stephen Sinclair, and the WordCheck Translation team in honour of Honey and Barry Sherman for their outstanding leadership and commitment to Holocaust education.

The exhibit can be viewed at Baycrest's Bathurst Street entrance and will be on display until Jewish Heritage Month in May. Entry is free. It can also be viewed online in its entirety, along with curatorial information and artistic statements at baycrest.org/preciouslegacy or on Pinterest by searching Baycrest.

Barrie2Baycrest bike ride raises $1.1 million

On Sunday Sept. 8, more than 160 cyclists hit the road in an effort to raise critical funds for Baycrest. The Barrie2Baycrest (B2B) Chai Ride, which spans more than 110 kilometres, took participants from Barrie's Coronation Park to Baycrest's 22-acre campus in midtown Toronto.

Now in its 18th year, the B2B Chai (the Hebrew word for life) Ride has raised more than $10 million for health and fitness programs at Baycrest, with 2013 as one of the ride's most successful years ever.

"When it comes to aging well, fitness is key," says Garry Foster, Interim President of the Baycrest Foundation and supporter of the B2B 2013.

Each rider was charged with raising a minimum of $2,500. Those who raised $10,000 or more were entered into the prestigious "Stan's Club," which honours founding member Stan Feldman who retired as B2B event organizer following this year's ride.

Post ride, participants had the chance to meet residents of Baycrest's long-term care and retirement homes at a finish line barbeque. After the event, a gala dinner celebrated a year's worth of training, fundraising and dedication to Baycrest.

Special thanks to Ruth Schacter

The Baycrest Foundation wishes to thank the late Ms. Ruth Schacter for her generous legacy gift of $1.5 million.

Ms. Schacter was a staunch believer in Baycrest's mission and her donation history dates back to 1977. She is survived by her niece, Andrea Wayne von-Königslöw, nephew David Wayne and goddaughter Karen Hirschfeld. Ms. von-Königslöw said her Aunt Ruth's last gift to Baycrest is emblematic of how she always took the time to stand up and fight for those in need of support. Her gift will help our clients, their families and our healthcare professionals to change what it means to age.

Nancy Posluns

Memory Link volunteer: On board from the beginning

Nancy Posluns has a unique perspective on Baycrest's valuable teaching program for people with severely impaired memory. She is the only volunteer who has been on the Memory Link team since its inception and has witnessed from Day 1 how the "amazing" program has utilized technology to help individuals adapt and function in society.

"People who never thought that they would be able to be independent – people who lived with family members for years – reached the point where they could go out on their own," she marvels. "They would still have memory issues, but they knew how to deal with them."

Posluns began volunteering at Baycrest in the WA Café more than 25 years ago, but realized that her background in psychometric testing could be useful elsewhere. She was matched up with Dr. Brian Richards, whom she describes as "a visionary."

"I was really so privileged to have the opportunity to help him work on the development of the program and to watch his dream become more than a reality. It has changed people's lives."

In the early days, clients used a timer to remind themselves to check a notebook for appointments and tasks. Later, Palm Pilots and ultimately smartphones were incorporated. Dr. Eva Svoboda, a neuropsychologist and clinician lead at Memory Link, says Posluns "has tremendous insight and wisdom pertaining to the psychosocial experience of amnesia" and the team is fortunate to have her.

Posluns has played a variety of roles, but is mainly involved now with support groups. "We simply could not have made the advancements we have without her effort, input, and financial support," says Dr. Richards, who recently retired.

He adds, "Nancy conveys an unquestioning respect for the strengths and intelligence that each Memory Link client brings, despite their severe memory impairment."

Posluns says that volunteering has "done a lot more for me than it has for anybody else. It's been a way to be active at this stage of my life, which is not always so easy. It's kept me well."

History on display at Baycrest's Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum

Ever wish you could step back in time and see what Jewish life was like before you could shop for Passover seder plates online or reference a bible chapter through the iTorah app?

The Morris and Sally Justein Heritage Museum at Baycrest displays Jewish artifacts for clients and visitors to enjoy as a link to our community's history. The museum is a place for people of all ages to discover the beauty of Judaic heritage. Its permanent Judaica collection - numbering more than 900 items, with some dating back more than a century - preserves these treasures for generations to come, and has been enjoyed and admired by thousands of visitors for more than 40 years.

Through a generous endowment by Morris Justein and the Justein family in 2006, the museum was refurbished and its educational activities augmented through the hiring of a new museum coordinator, giving visitors informed glimpses into the past. Exhibits change on a yearly basis. Each is carefully researched and creatively designed by the museum coordinator in collaboration with a museum committee of dedicated and hardworking volunteers.

"Endowing the museum meant a lot to me," Morris Justein says. "I hope people visit it and see the heritage that brings a little bit of Yiddishkeit back in their lives; to see how our people lived back in the old days."

Bianca Stern, Executive Director, Department of Culture, Arts & Innovation, calls the museum a "small gem" on Baycrest's campus. "As a hub of cultural learning it delves into topics that stimulate the brain, challenging our elders to increase their knowledge and share their wisdom. Through its exhibits it maintains an ongoing dialogue and connection to both the Jewish community and the non-Jewish community, bridging areas we all have in common."

On display for 2013-14 is the Origins of Judaic Symbols: Artifacts from our Collection 40th Anniversary.

Event celebrates Fran Sonshine's legacy and support

Rabbi's parents proud of their son put in the drawer in the midst of her emotional distress. When she didn't see the money in the drawer, she assumed she had simply misplaced it and would find it elsewhere in her home.

The rabbi's parents, Faigy and Zachary Muroff, are extremely proud of their son, though not surprised by his actions.

"He didn't want to tell anyone about this, but was encouraged to go public to present a positive image of Judaism and for tikkun olam," said Faigy. "We feel so blessed that he was given the opportunity to do this."

The repercussions of Rabbi Muroff's actions have been – and continue to be – far reaching. "To me, the most important thing about the story is the unbelievable impact this story is having on people around the world. People are talking about it everywhere," Zachary said.

Besides being interviewed and featured on Fox TV, BBC, most major Canadian and U.S. networks, on radio and in print and especially on the Internet, Rabbi Muroff is the topic of conversation in schools and among friends and neighbours.

"We have had calls from Hillel Academy teachers in Ottawa saying that they remember Noah and his ever-ready smile, and that they are using his story as a discussion point in their classes," Faigy said.

The former student of Hillel Academy, Yitzhak Rabin High School and Ottawa Torah Institute (OTI) credits his upbringing for his values.

"I am so appreciative of my upbringing in Ottawa, from my parents and from my rabbis... and grateful for the opportunity I have been given," Rabbi Muroff said.

On a lighter note, representatives of Staples, grateful for the publicity, have approached Rabbi Muroff and offered to provide him with supplies for his new desk. As well, he will be receiving a year's supply of tea from a company called Honest Tea, which felt his actions perfectly illustrate its brand.

Rabbi Noah Muroff credits his upbringing for his values.

Postal historian wins SIP award

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Collect postal history and you learn not just how mail has travelled in years past, but also how people lived and functioned.

Just ask Ed Kroft, a stamp collector and historian of postal history from Israel who was recently awarded the 2013 Leslie Reggel Memorial Award by the Society of Israel Philatelists for his outstanding contributions to Israel philately.

Kroft is a Vancouver tax lawyer and ardent collector of postal history who started collecting stamps at the tender age of 10.

"My teacher at Associated Hebrew Day Schools in Toronto, Ed Deutsch, would bring his stamp collection to school to show us, and he focused on the stamps of Israel," he recalls. "We formed a stamp club at school and later, I worked at a stamp store to put myself through university."

Stamp collecting has changed significantly over the years, as many people have moved from soaking stamps off the paper they were used on to collecting postal history and learning to understand the postmarks and information on the envelopes that contain those stamps.

"Postal history tells a story about how mail has travelled, which requires you to learn about the area, the population, how to read postmarks and envelopes," he explains. "The beauty of collecting postal history as opposed to collecting stamps is that you're collecting different pieces of mail and trying to describe the history of the postal services."

Ed Kroft

In a room filled with bookshelves containing the vast collection he's amassed, Kroft has binders containing mail that originated in Israel, but was destined for many different corners of the world, from New Zealand and Australia to South Africa, Argentina, the Caribbean Islands, Brazil and Chile.

"As a Jew, I care about this because it's interesting to see where Jews were at that time," he says. "This collection gives me connections to Jewish culture and identity, Jewish history, geography, events, places, buildings and customs. This is part of our heritage, and we can't let this history disappear."

Kroft's collection of mail from the Holy Land dates from the 1870s to present day. From one binder, he pulls out an envelope inscribed by Revisionist Zionist leader Ze'ev Jabotinsky to one of his relatives in 1918, and another written to Jabotinsky by his mother.

There's an envelope written by Capt. Joseph Trumpeldor and another by Sir Moses Montefiore. While the letters are often no longer in those envelopes, the envelopes offer evidence about the passage of mail, he says.

The Society of Israel Philatelists is a non-profit dedicated to studying and promoting Israel philately, with members all over the world. Kroft joined the SIP in the mid-1970s and has been an active member ever since, currently serving as its president.

"My collection of Holy Land philately has helped me make many friends around the world who have common interests," he says. "It's taught me a lot about Judaism and brought to life things I learned when I was much younger."

His collections include the history of Rishon LeZion from settlement through statehood, 1882 to1948, a history of prisoners of war in 1948-1949, and the history of the Carmel Wine Company, among others. Each one tells a story through postal history, a story about which Kroft is passionate, eager to learn more about and committed to teaching others.

"I'm honoured to win the award," he says. "The people who preceded me were extremely knowledgeable and great collectors."

For now he is intent on keeping the future of the SIP bright by spreading information about its members and their work and hoping to attract new collectors to its ranks. The Toronto chapter of SIP, which meets twice a month at the Antibes Community Centre, is actively looking to grow its ranks. To attend a meeting, call Morty Wagman at 416-879-4298.

Economist predicts rising prices south of the border

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Although he's an accomplished economist who's widely recognized for the accuracy of his prognostications, David Rosenberg played the part of a lecturer in Economics 101 last week.

He started with employing a graph you might find in any text, displaying aggregate supply and demand curves. The point at which they meet is... Class? Anyone? Bueller? "The price," he explained.

And while for years in the 1980s and '90s, thanks to an elastic supply curve, price was stable despite rising demand, that is changing, he suggested.

Breaking from the kind of conventional wisdom you'll find on the front covers of magazines that warn of potential deflation, or lower prices, Rosenberg suggested that an inelastic supply curve, which won't react to increased demand, means prices – of labour to start with –are set to go up.

There's a pent up demand for labour in the United States, despite record high joblessness, he noted.

Rosenberg, chief economist and strategist at Gluskin Sheff + Associates, provided his analysis of the economic landscape at a session held during last week's

David Rosenberg

Taking Care of Business program. The event is a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto get-together, which featured keynote addresses from business leaders W. Brett Wilson, Seymour Schulich and Ken Tanenbaum, as well as seminars in a variety of fields.

Examining conditions south of the border, Rosenberg said, "This goes down as by far the weakest recovery, despite all the stimulus." GDP growth stands at only 1.6-1.7 per cent per year. "For this stage of the cycle, it's substandard growth.

"The corporate sector is struggling from not enough clarity in terms of policy."

The Affordable Care Act – popularly known as Obamacare – is more than 2,000 pages long; the Dodd-Frank Wall Street Reform and Consumer Protection Act checks in at 800 pages; there's been no budget passed for five years and small business complains about government regulation.

"If you're a business, how do you plan for the future when the guys in Washington can't do that?" he asked.

Looking at the labour participation rate, which stands around 63 per cent, Rosenberg said "it's important to assess why people are leaving the labour force in droves."

Currently, "90 million [people] reside outside the traditional labour force." That's up from 80 million.

There are 140 million people at work, another 10 million looking for a job. But 90 million are in limbo. "That's like a country." Are they all living downstairs watching Breaking Bad? he quipped.

A new socio-economic situation is developing, Rosenberg said. People are being subsidized to not work. Federal disability benefits have grown at five times the population growth. A record number receive food stamps. You can spend 99 weeks on unemployment insurance.

"That would make a guy from Newfoundland blush," he said.

In 39 states you can make more on benefits that you could working as an administrative assistant; in 11 states, your income on assistance is higher than that of a teacher.

While many have taken themselves out of the labour force, demand for workers has gone up. Companies can't find skilled labour, so the number of firings has dropped to record low levels. Companies compensate for the lack of workers by asking current employees to work more. After a time, people get fed up and look for other jobs, at which point, employers raise their wages. With salaries going up, prices follow as companies try to retain their profit margins. Referring back to the supply/demand curve, Rosenberg suggested that as labour supply continues to constrict while demand increases, the prices – wages – will go up. And as consumers are more likely to spend than corporations, the result will be a "wonderful multiplying effect on the economy," he said.

Wishing you and your family a Happy Chanukah

Census data raises questions in Winnipeg

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The 2011 census, also known as the National Household Survey (NHS), has raised more questions than it answers concerning the size of Winnipeg's Jewish community.

While the community leaders had been working on the assumption that the population is about 16,500, the 2011 NHS, released last spring, recorded just 10,735 Winnipeg respondents who identified themselves as Jewish by religion – compared to 12,045 in 2001 – and 12,000 Winnipeggers who identified themselves as Jewish by ethnicity, down from 14,440 in 2001.

Now, after several months of having the NHS data reviewed by a demographer, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's board recently had a look at a preliminary analysis of the numbers and what they imply for the community.

"In 2009, we asked the demographer who analyzed the 2001 census figures to project what 2011 would look like," said Faye Rosenberg Cohen, the federation's planning and community engagement director.

"His estimate then was 16,500. We asked him to analyze the new NHS numbers, factoring in a rough estimate of Jewish seniors in nursing homes (who weren't counted in the census) and Israeli immigrants who don't list a religion in the surveys. Our figure comes out to about 15,000."

In her report, Rosenberg Cohen noted the voluntary aspect of the most recent NHS. "We can't have any data on people who didn't reply," she said.

While more data may be available from Statistics Canada later on, she notes, the 2011 NHS did confirm some trends that the federation was already tracking and raises some questions that may require further investigation.

First, looking at the Israeli immigrant community here, which includes many Russian Israelis, Rosenberg Cohen confirmed that the NHS figures are close to the number of Israeli arrivals here that have been numbered among Jewish Child and Family Service clients in recent years.

"The Israeli responses to the NHS regarding religion and ethnicity reflect intermarriage and a lower level of religious identification that would be common among some Jews from the former Soviet Union," she said.

"Preliminary analysis indicates that 57 percent of Israelis who came to Winnipeg identified themselves as Jewish. But, in our community, all of the Israelis here who are served by our agencies are considered part of our community. Many of them send their children to our Jewish schools, come out to our programs, attend holiday dinners and are more visibly active in the community than some of their Winnipeg-born peers," she added.

"It's a harder sell reaching out to people who are born and raised here."

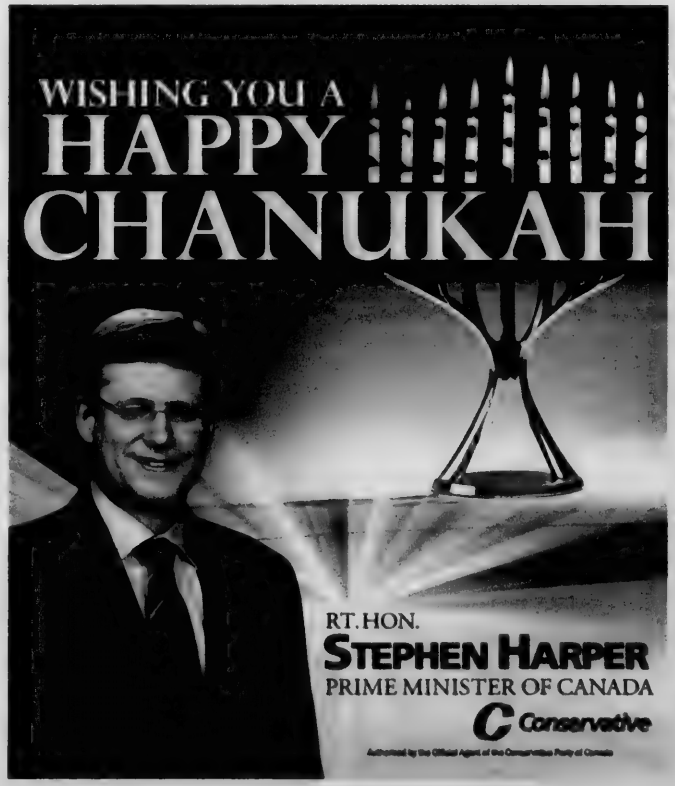
As for younger members of the community, Rosenberg Cohen points out that young Jews often identify themselves on demographic surveys as "Canadian." "Does the NHS exclude many younger Jews here who may still be interested in Jewish communal life, but don't show up in the census numbers?" she asked.

Another question she raised is how to count and engage intermarried families in the community. She cited the recent Pew study in the United States that reported a 58 per cent intermarriage rate among Jews who have married within the past eight years. The number for Winnipeg within the same age group would be similar, she said.

One positive figure is a slight growth in the number of Jewish high school- and university-aged students here since the 2011 census. Does this mean more members of that age group are staying in Winnipeg, Rosenberg Cohen asked, or is it a reflection of more recent immigration?

And the lower number of kids in the community, she said, may reflect an out-migration of people of child-bearing age, a low birth rate among Canadians or intermarried families not listing their children as Jewish.

As to the geographic dispersion of Winnipeg's Jewish population, the decades long decline of the Jewish population in north Winnipeg and concurrent growth in south Winnipeg is continuing. Whereas 40 years ago, just over 50 percent of the population lived in north Winnipeg – the former centre of Winnipeg Jewish life - and just under 40 per cent lived in south Winnipeg, today just over 10 per cent live north and about 65 per cent live in traditional south Winnipeg Jewish neighbourhoods. More than 20 per cent now live elsewhere in the city. Those living in non-traditional Jewish areas include recent immigrants, younger couples and Jewish Winnipeggers who do not identify with the community.



Israelis flock to fast-growing Winkler, Manitoba

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Jewish immigrant merchants played a prominent role in the founding and economic development in the early days of Winkler and Morden in southwestern Manitoba, about an hour's drive southwest of Winnipeg.

Now, more than 50 years since the last Jewish family left the area and more than 20 years since Milton Rabinovitch closed the last Jewish-owned business in Winkler, a wavelet of Israeli immigration is creating a new Jewish community in the economically booming region.

Within the past year, four Israeli families have settled in Winkler and one in Morden and more are on the way.

"Winkler now has the largest Jewish community in southwestern Manitoba," joked Dima Elyason.

The Elyason family – Dima, his wife, Evgenya, 15-year-old Daniel and 11-year-old Alis – came from Sderot, the southern Israel community that has taken the brunt of missile fire from Gaza over the past few years.

"We are used to living in a smaller city," said Dima Elyason, who immigrated to Israel from Ukraine when was he 19 to go to school. "Winkler is nice. There is no rocket fire.

"We see Magen Davids on some of the buildings in Winkler that used to be Jewish-owned."

Two of the other three Israeli families in Winkler, he says, come from Haifa the third from Jerusalem. The Israeli family in Morden is from Ramat Gan.

In Sderot, Dima Elyason was an assistant manager in a department store. Evgenya was a hospital lab technician.

The Elyasons and the other Israeli families came to Winkler and Morden over the past year through the auspices of immigration counsellor Adele Dyck and her company, Star 7.

"We didn't recruit the Israeli families," Dyck said. "They contact us and we just try to find a way to assist them in their desire to come to Manitoba. I have been in Israel a few times meeting the families that had contacted us and trying to understand why they would like to leave. I find their skills and willingness to learn amazing. Manitoba can only gain by welcoming these families in to our province."

The Elyasons learned about Star 7 from Israeli friends who came to Canada four or five years ago. "We spoke to Star 7's manager about our interest in coming to Canada," Dima Elyason said. "She came to meet us in Jerusalem."

Dima Elyason came to Winkler seven months ago. The rest of the family came in August. While Evgenya is looking forward to working in the district hospital (located between Winkler and Morden), the other Israelis are working for either Meridian Industries in Winkler or Décor Cabinets in Morden.

"We are getting a lot of help from the people here," Elyason said. "Winkler is a religious city. The people are proud to have Israelis living here. A lot of people have told us that they think it is a miracle to have some of the Chosen People here. People have been very friendly."

Daniel Elyason added that kids in school are very interested in what he tells them about life in Israel. He conceded that school has been a bit difficult, because his English isn't that good yet.

He said he'd like eventually to study business in university and operate his own computer company one day.

Eleven-year-old Alis is already taking skating lessons.

Dima said the Israeli families always get together on Shabbat.

"We don't want to lose our traditions or our language," he said. ""Our children speak Hebrew among themselves."

Dima and Evgenya Elyason, son Daniel and daughter Alis

The Israeli families were looking forward to celebrating Chanukah together.

He said he and Evgenya have Israeli friends in Winnipeg and have visited the Asper Jewish Community Campus there a couple of times.

The family has also visited other areas of Manitoba and even has travelled as far afield as Banff.

"We would like to see Churchill one day," Dima said.

Special needs program for kids grew out of mom's faith

Cynthia Gasner
Special to The CJN

The tenacity and spirit of a young Israeli mother, Malki Samuels, whose 11-month-old child, Yossi, became deaf, blind and hyperactive after receiving a faulty DPT vaccination (for diphtheria, tetanus and pertussis) in 1977, led to the development of Shalva, the Association for Mentally and Physically Challenged Children in Israel.

She pledged that if God would help her with her child, she would devote herself to helping other children with special needs and their families.

As a result, she helped develop Shalva, which serves the needs of hundreds of children with special needs and their families throughout Israel.

Seed money provided in 1990 by Gordon and Leslie Diamond of Vancouver, who believed in Samuels' dream, helped her establish the organization.

Today, professionals recognize Shalva as an international leader in the field of disability awareness and intervention for children and families. Its numerous programs are free of charge.

Recently, an inaugural Canadian Shalva dinner was held in Toronto at the home of Esty and Joseph Edell, who co-chaired the event with Nancy and Dov Friedberg. The dinner celebrated Shalva's achievements to date and the establishment of a new Shalva Center in Jerusalem.

Avi Samuels, Yossi's brother and a director of Shalva, spoke to The CJN when he was in Toronto, about his mother's unswerving dedication to building the organization.

"Shalva is changing negative attitudes expressed toward individuals with disabilities," he said.

Avi explained that, during a post-college trip through Europe, his father, Kalman Samuels of Vancouver, decided to visit Israel and never left. Kalman was raised in a secular home, but he studied in Israel and became a rabbi.

"After my brother had the vaccination, my parents couldn't get to first base in Israel. They went to New York hoping for get help for Yossi," Avi said.

"For eight years, Yossi lived in a closed world with no one able to penetrate his bubble of insulation. It took a tremendous toll on the family. Many professionals and friends, with the best intentions, suggested placing Yossi in an institution."

When they returned to Israel in 1983, a special education teacher, who was deaf herself, penetrated Yossi's wall of silence using Hebrew finger spelling in the palm of his hand, in much the same way as Hellen Keller was taught. With her input, Yossi learned his first word, shulchan, the Hebrew word for table.

His mother remembered her promise to help others with special needs. She and Kalman created Shalva, starting out in a small rented duplex.

Today, there are numerous Shalva projects, including an after-school activity centre, basketball teams, overnight and weekend respite programs, summer camps, research, education, rehabilitative programs and a day care centre.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has spoken highly of the association's work: "I wish to acknowledge the remarkable work of the Shalva organization and the invaluable role the organization played in Israel's development."

Recognizing the pressing needs and Shalva's ability to fill them, the Israeli government and the Jerusalem Municipality recently made an unprecedented gift of land to Shalva in the heart of the city. It will be used to establish the new National Children's Centre.

"The dream is only made possible with the continued support of our beloved partner and friends," Avi said. He noted that there are also hundreds of dedicated volunteers in the Shalva programs.

"Now, every mother who gives birth to a special needs baby in Israel comes to Shalva, where she receives the support she needs and the baby gets all the therapy the baby needs," he says.

"Today, at 37, my brother Yossi is inspirational," he added.

Team Shalva participates in the Jerusalem Marathon and runners come from all over the world to participate. If anyone would like to join Team Hessed to run in the Jerusalem Marathon with Shalva, please contact marla.buck@rogers.com.

For more information about Shalva, go to www.shalva.org.

Incubator drive launched at JGH

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL— The incubator in the Jewish General Hospital hallway just off the main lobby had a plush purple toy in it and looked a bit old and decrepit.

But that was the whole point.

The incubator was serving as a piggy bank – and starting off point – for a $1.3 million auxiliary campaign.

Its goal is to furnish the hospital's renowned neonatal intensive care unit (NICU) with 20 needed state-of-art models by the time the NICU moves down from the fifth floor to the JGH's still-unfinished Pavilion K, which is to house a new emergency room.

At the Nov. 18 launch of the drive – one day after World Prematurity Day – purple, mauve, and violet prevailed.

Out of the 4,500 infants born each year at the hospital's birthing centre, 700 are premature and need the NICU. The ones most at risk may weigh only a few hundred grams at birth.

"This is a very special day for us," said Dr. Apostolos Papageorgiou, chief of pediatrics and neonatology; Papageorgiou, a 40-year-veteran of the hospital and a leading figure in Canadian neonatology. "We have the best survival rate of any unit in Canada, and this new generation of incubators will help.

"The babies here fight for their lives, and need the technology that helps them do it."

Papageorgiou and NICU head nurse Serge Cloutier said in an interview that the new units will go a long way in aiding preemies.

Each new specialized unit costs $65,000, and is equipped with a special cover that lifts hydraulically and allows treatment of fragile preemies by "working around" the infants without needing to physically remove them.

PJ Library celebrates expansion with concert

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Just in time for Chanukah, some 4,000 Jewish families in the Greater Toronto Area received a free Jewish children's book in the mail. The books came from the PJ Library, which expanded into Toronto and Peel Region earlier this fall.

The PJ Library is an American organization that has delivered more than 3.6 million Jewish books to toddlers and young children since 2005.

To join the program, a family with at least one Jewish parent must have a child between six months and 5-1/2 years of age. The books from the PJ Library focus on Jewish values, customs and celebrations and are aimed at kids under six.

It launched in York Region in 2010, supported by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and delivered books to more than 1,800 families. "Once we knew how successful it was and what the demand was in Toronto, we were able to secure funding so that we could expand," said Elyse Tytel, the PJ Library co-ordinator in Toronto.

PJ Library founder Harold Grinspoon was in Toronto to attend a Chanukah-themed concert last Sunday in honour of the expansion into Toronto and Peel Region.

Grinspoon said that when the PJ Library began in 2005, it distributed only 200 subscriptions. Now, there are 125,000 books mailed each month to families in the United States, Canada, Australia, Israel and Mexico.

"I think the Jewish world in North America, especially in the U.S, is going through a crisis," Grinspoon told The CJN.

"We have a very high intermarriage rate, and that's scary. I think Jewish people have an amazing culture and an amazing religion. I think this program helps bring people back in touch with their culture and history and understanding Jewish values."

Grinspoon began the library after hearing about singer Dolly Parton's Imagination Library, an initiative that donates free books to children across North America and England. Grinspoon and his wife, Diane Troderman, philanthropists from western Massachusetts, were inspired to develop a similar program for Jewish families.

In Toronto, the Harold Grinspoon Foundation funds about half of the PJ Library program. The other funders are local donors, including UJA Federation and the Weinbaum Family Foundation, who ensure that families can receive one free mailed book each month. In December, the families receive a free CD of Jewish-themed music.

"PJ [Library] now has a lot of power with the publishing houses because of how many books they distribute," Tytel said. "There have been second, third and fourth printings of some of the more popular books that have stood the test of time."

Grinspoon's favourite book from the library, Bagels from Benny, comes from Toronto author Aubrey Davis. Bagels from Benny is the PJ Library's most popular book and a favourite among Canadian families.

"It's a great way to introduce Judaism and Jewish education to our kids," said Aaron Lazarus, a PJ Library subscriber for 2-1/2 years.

New subscriber Mindy Webber, who attended the concert with daughter Jordyn, agreed. "It gets my kids excited about reading Jewish stories. Every month when the book arrives, it's kind of fun," she says.

Now that the UJA has expanded this program into Toronto and Peel, Tytel said, they are planning to bring the PJ Library into schools, synagogues and day cares.

Career advice: don't wait for someone to call

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Lined up on the dais at the front of "Confederation 3," a meeting room at the Fairmont Royal York Hotel, were four experts on career management. Veterans in the field, they each found a different way to say pretty much the same thing: don't sit back and wait for something to happen. Instead, be proactive.

Whether they employed the term "career management" or spoke about people "owning their own career," each of Richard Wajs, who moderated the discussion, Rich Chad, Steven Pezim and Ralph Shedletsky agreed that the main person responsible for a career is you.

They were presenting "Lesson four" on careers as part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's "Taking Care of Business" program last week.

Most people are "reactive, not proactive," said Shedletsky, chief customer officer at Knightsbridge Human Capital Solutions.

His advice: "Understand yourself, what you want out of a career" and don't wait for a headhunter or search consultant to tap you on the shoulder with an offer.

"I find it astounding that people aren't more proactive," said Chad, president of Chad Management Group.

Get out and network, don't wait for people to call, and don't wait "until you're in dire straits."

"You have to manage your career from day one," said Pezim, co-founder of Bedford Consulting Group. He suggested developing relationships with executive recruiters even while you're working. Many people change jobs even when they're not expecting to.

Wajs, CEO of TWC International Executive Search, suggested that people "do their homework." Determine what will satisfy your needs and fulfil your dreams.

"Think about who you are. Are you living the life you want?" he said.

Extend your networks, as you never know precisely when that might pay off, he added.

Asked whether there was a rule of thumb as to the length of stay at any particular job, Pezim said for those under 30 who are still building their career, "It's OK to have these jumps every two to 2-1/2 years. I can rationalize that."

People in their 30s should remain in the same job for three to 3-1/2 years, but "red lights" will come on if "there are many jumps early in the career."

Turning to internships, Pezim suggested some duration of unpaid work can pay off for a young person entering the job market. Even MBA grads in the United States are taking unpaid jobs, which he suggests could be a good strategy.

"Get your foot in the door," he said, but after six to 12 months, "you should [get paid] or you're being taken advantage of."

Chad said a young person could "do one or two terms" before expecting a paying job. On social media's role today, Shedletsky said the growth of this phenomenon had led to "incomprehensible" levels of networking that young people should take advantage of.

Sufganiyot –Pt. 2 – beyond jelly

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Chanukah is finally here, and there are mouths to feed! Today, we troll the web for the jelly-filled, powdered sugar-topped, calorie-laden doughy delight, the sufganiyah.

Sufganiyot are big business. Jerusalem's Angel's Bakery makes more than a quarter-million doughnuts every 24 hours during the holiday. "The preparation of jam-filled and caramel-filled doughnuts begins a month before the holiday in a huge empty mixing bowl. Flour, sugar, and other special ingredients are poured into the bowl and kneaded by a metal mixing arm into 100 kilos of dough." [bit.ly/sufg28]

Back in Chanukah 1997, it seems some Israelis had plenty of time on their hands. They tried to set a record when they erected a 12-foot structure consisting of 6,400 sufganiyot near the town of Afula. As the History channel website delicately puts it, "the blob was dismantled later, and the sufganiyot were distributed to Israeli soldiers serving along the border with Lebanon." No word whether the oily pyramid ever drew the attention of the folks from Guinness. [bit.ly/sufg29]

The Jewish Food Recipes Archives has 21 variations, including chocolate, no-yeast and raised potato sufganiyot. [bit.ly/sufg30] Want to kick it up a notch? Try:

- Orange scented [bit.ly/sufg10]
- Quince and vanilla [bit.ly/sufg11]
- Pumpkin (gluten-free) [bit.ly/sufg18]
- Bread machine [bit.ly/sufg19]
- And lest we forget that we're living in frosty Canada, how about maple-glazed apple cider? [bit.ly/sufg31]

Mindful that we're dealing with boiling oil, Epicurious recommends a family-friendly version of the recipe that divides up the tasks. Kids "sift the flour and mix it with the remaining sugar, salt, cinnamon, egg yolks" while the adults "drop the doughnuts into the hot oil." [bit.ly/sufg37]

And you know something may have really gone (too) mainstream when there's even a "For Dummies" version! [bit.ly/sufg38]

Can latkes and sufganiyot live in harmony? They do in Naomi Silbermintz's kitchen, thanks to a recipe for Yerushalmi-style sufganiyot in which a yeast mixture is dropped by the spoonful into an inch of oil. "Every Chanukah, when we visited my grandmother, she made these. My mother always said that they are the precursors to jelly-donut-type sufganiyot. We used to call them 'Chanukah Latkes,' or 'Savta's Sufganiyot.'" [bit.ly/sufg39]

After you've ingested one, you'll wind up with 327 calories and 14.8 grams of fat (!) if you follow the directions at mealsforyou.com. [bit.ly/sufg41] (Note: the site works but loads slowly.)

But wait. All is not lost. Baile Rochel assuages her guilt by using whole-wheat flour and brown sugar to create "almost healthy sufganiyot." [bit.ly/sufg42] There are also alternatives that are oven fried [bit.ly/sufg43] and as well as a "no-fry" contender. I do wonder about this caveat about oil-less sufganiyot: "They come out not quite looking like donuts – more like itty bitty rolls – but they taste quite donut-like!" [bit.ly/sufg44]

If the calories don't get you, something else may. Here's the tale of one lucky survivor. "Be forewarned: sufganiyot can be dangerous! I have a small scar on my lip from boiling hot custard shooting out of a fresh sufganiyah bought from a street vendor in Jerusalem. For years now that little ridge on my inner lip has been a year-round reminder of the sweetness (and heat) of Chanukah." [bit.ly/sufg45]

The menorah's lesson

Sephardi Window
Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Chanukah celebrates two miracles: the victory of the Jews over their Syrian-Greek persecutors, and the ability of one small flask of oil to remain lit in the menorah in the Temple for eight days.

During Shabbat Chanukah, we usually read the Torah portion of Miketz, where Joseph rises to power in Egypt after correctly interpreting the dreams of Pharaoh's servants. In one of the dreams, Pharaoh's chief butler saw a vine. The Torah (Bereshit 41:10) relates the butler's description: "And in the vine were three branches; and it was as though it budded, and its blossoms shot forth; and its clusters brought forth ripe grapes." Rabbi Yosef Chaim of Baghdad, the Ben Ish Chai (1832-1909), writes that this vision carries a message that specifically relates to Chanukah.

Our sages have often compared the Jewish people, the Ben Ish Chai writes, to grape vines. One reason for this is that the people, as vines, are weak and delicate. However, just as the weak vines produce sumptuous fruit, so, too, does the Jewish nation bear fruit in its performance of mitzvot and its study of Torah. The three vine branches described in the butler's dream represent the three ingredients necessary to properly perform God's dictates. One must have his thought, speech and actions dedicated to God's service. If any one of these three elements is lacking, so, too, will a person's devotion to God be lacking.

Our sages compare the performance of mitzvot to a lamp. In order for a lamp to function properly, it needs three components: the lamp itself, fuel, and a wick. Similarly, to perform a mitzvah properly, one's thoughts, speech and actions all have to be directed toward this goal. Our lighting of the menorah reminds us of this lesson. When we light the menorah, we recall the miracle that happened in the Temple. God was sending a message that the Jews merited the miracle because their service of God was complete. They dedicated every fibre of their being to the proper service of God that was signified through the menorah.

Before lighting the menorah, we ready it by preparing candles or the oil, the wicks and the flame. If we don't have any of the above, we cannot light. The menorah should serve us as a lesson for God's service. Right before one performs any mitzvah, he should think about the menorah's message and focus with his thoughts, speech and action in order to have a complete mitzvah.

Let us all take the Ben Ish Chai's message to heart and through this meditation get closer to the source of all good, HaShem.

I'll miss U.S. Thanksgiving

Class Act
Daniel Held

Before moving to New York, I had never celebrated Thanksgiving. I vaguely remember a non-Jewish teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto describing his family's celebration of the holiday, but it sounded nearly as foreign as Christmas.

Perhaps we ignore Canadian Thanksgiving because it usually falls in the tumult of the chagim – often between Sukkot and Simchat Torah. Perhaps we blush over it because it falls on a Monday. Much like Victoria Day, Simcoe Day, Labour Day, and Family Day, it seems like another long weekend with little value beyond a day off. No matter the reason for missing out on a quarter century of Thanksgivings, I fell in love with my first American Thanksgiving.

First, it's a holiday without the strictures of Yom Tov. Everyone is off work, schools are closed, and the city is quiet, but there is no need to prepare for weeks in advance (think building a sukkah, cleaning for Passover, etc.) Rather than spending the day in shul, it can be spent with family, volunteering or cozying up with a remote control and a football game. There are no restrictions on driving, electricity or what foods we can eat when and where.

But more than the practices of the day, it's the theme of the holiday that resonates most with me: reflecting on the things for which we, personally, are thankful.

The Jewish calendar is filled with opportunities to give thanks. On Chaunkah we are thankful for the triumph of the Maccabees over the Greeks and the miracle of the oil; on Purim for God's hidden hand in saving the Jews from Haman, and on Passover for the freedom of our ancestors from slavery. But these thanks are particularistic to Jews rather than universal, and express thanks for the wonders of history rather than our own lived experience.

In early America, rabbis wrote beautiful liturgies, marrying poetry with prayer, to be recited on days of Thanksgiving. In our New York synagogue, during morning services our rabbi led the congregation in Psalm 100, Mizmor L'Toda, A Song of Thanks, and encouraged us to take time to reflect on the things for which we were particularly thankful that year.

A lot has been made of this year's rare convergence of Chanukah and Thanksgiving. In some ways, it's exciting. Families who would not otherwise gather for Chanukah will light candles during their Thanksgiving dinner, potato latkes will be topped with cranberry sauce, and Stephen Colbert will lament that Thanksgiving is under attack by Chanukah.

Though his comments are satirical, Colbert may be on to something. While parallels may be drawn between the pilgrims' quest for religious freedom and Maccabees' fight against Hellenism, the two holidays should not be conflated. Our collective thanks for historic victories on Chanukah is not the same as the personal thanks for our lived experience on Thanksgiving. Each should be given its own time and own expression.

One of the things I will miss most about no longer living in the United States is Thanksgiving: the chag without the Yom Tov, the turkey with cranberry sauce, and the opportunity to reflect on the many things for which I am personally thankful.

Forcing a miracle

From the Bimah
Rabbi Yael Splansky

What is the miracle of Chanukah? Ask and you'll hear something like: "The oil lasted for eight days, when it was only enough for one day." Then why celebrate for eight days, if the first day's light wasn't miraculous at all? On the first day there was sufficient oil. We knew it would burn. There was no surprise. It was a natural kind of light, so why sing of miracles on the first night of Chanukah? Why offer the blessing about miracles – "she'asah nisim" – on the first night? These words seem superfluous, even inaccurate, for the first night's candle.

Shouldn't we only celebrate the seven "miraculous" days of Chanukah? Ask and you'll hear 100 answers. Literally. More than 100 answers to this very question were compiled in the Middle Ages.

What was the miracle of the first day? Ask at your own Chanukah party and you'll hear something like: perhaps the miracle of the first day was that the few bands of Maccabees defeated the great and mighty Assyrian-Greek army. Perhaps the miracle of the first day was that Jews remained Jews despite the allure of Hellenism; that religious expression was embraced and the Temple rededicated. Perhaps the miracle of the first day was that the factions of Jews then saw a brother in the eyes of the other and decided not to completely tear each other apart.

And perhaps the miracle of the first day was simply the human capacity for hope. When the Maccabees lit the lamp with the only remaining cruse of pure oil, they didn't expect it to last, but they lit it anyway, so the story goes. Maybe that's the miracle of the first candle. Call it hope, faith, determination or perseverance. They could have waited for certainty, but instead they worked with what they had and opened the door for another kind of miracle to take hold. We can imagine our ancestors saying to one another, "Even if it will sputter out tomorrow, let us celebrate with light today." By their own strong hands and their own strong faith they invited the Divine to enter. The miracle of Jewish hope and the defeat of human cynicism are celebrated throughout the festival of Chanukah, but especially when we light the first night's candle.

In the 13th century, Nachmanides reflected on miracles. When commenting on Exodus 13:16, he distinguishes between miracles "hidden" and miracles "revealed." The splitting of the Red Sea is considered a miracle, because it was supernatural, but Nachmanides teaches that the very rules of nature are themselves miracles. The fact that gravity has not given out on us even once is a "hidden miracle." The fact that our pupils automatically dilate to let in the right amount of light to enable us to see is a "hidden miracle." Einstein's theory of the physics of light calls attention to another series of "hidden miracles." Candles numbers 2 to 8 may stand for the "revealed miracles." Candle No. 1 stands for the countless "hidden miracles" of Chanukah.

The first candle is my favourite candle. One thin candle alone on the windowsill stands for that good Jewish impulse to work with what we've got and carve out a way for more light. The first candle receives the most praise and has the greatest impact. Each night it is relit and finds itself, miraculously, in more and more good company. This is the Jewish way. The days of revealed miracles may be behind us. But hidden miracles are everywhere. It's up to a keen observer to behold their power.

When the U.S. let Iran off the hook

David Horovitz
The Times of Israel

Analysis

No, the provisions of the interim deal with Iran signed in Geneva early Nov. 24 are not themselves disastrous. If the United States and other world powers had been negotiating a contract with a dependable, credible interlocutor, the deal might make a certain amount of sense. The problem is that Iran is not a dependable or a credible interlocutor. It is, rather, a cunning, deceptive adversary, and the United States has let it off the hook.

As far as they go, the terms of the deal make some sense. Iran's march to the bomb, in theory, is being temporarily constrained. It can no longer enrich uranium to 20 per cent and must neutralize its existing stockpiles of 20 per cent enriched uranium. It cannot increase its stockpiles of 3.5 per cent enriched uranium. It can no longer advance work on its Arak heavy water facility, under a clause that was much improved from the amateurish formulation put to the Iranians in the original Geneva offer two weeks ago, which would have enabled them to continue construction there. Its acknowledged nuclear facilities will be subjected to far more intrusive and effective inspection. And the sanctions relief, formally at least, is relatively limited and theoretically reversible if the Iranians break their promises.

The problem is that Iran has never acknowledged that it is in fact marching to the bomb. And these interim arrangements, concluded at a moment when the regime felt itself to be under unprecedented economic pressure, a moment of maximal leverage, scandalously failed to require Iran to admit to two decades-plus of lying and deception.

Instead, the United States, the free world's only hope of thwarting Iran, appears to have convinced itself that this admission of duplicity, this Iranian confession that it has been developing nuclear weapons, can be extracted over the coming six months as negotiations move ahead on a permanent accord. Unfortunately, disastrously, that's just not going to happen.

As stated by the White House on Nov. 24, the "comprehensive solution" to be negotiated by late May "envisions concrete steps to give the international community confidence that Iran's nuclear activities will be exclusively peaceful." By definition, then, such a comprehensive deal will require the exposure of those elements of the Iranian program – such as the Parchin military complex, where the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) believes Iran has carried out extensive nuclear weapons-related activities – that the regime has insistently shielded from international view.

A "comprehensive solution" would require Iran to come clean. It would disprove its insistent contention that it has always acted in good faith and has been the innocent victim of American and Zionist plots. It would show the regime to have lied to its own people. It would expose the duplicity of its leaders' claims never to have sought the bomb.

The Iranian regime has always done everything in its power to avoid that moment of reckoning. And the United States has now let if off the hook.

Sorry, folks, but the Iranians will not spend the next six months dutifully preparing to take the IAEA on a tour of all the facilities they have been lying about – dutifully detailing the bomb-making activities they carried out, the explosives-testing they undertook – en route to the dutiful dismantling of their entire military nuclear enterprise. They won't shamefacedly throw open the doors to Parchin. They won't provide the full story of what they've done at Fordo, the underground enrichment facility that, for Emily Landau, an expert on nuclear proliferation at Tel Aviv University's INSS think tank, constitutes clear evidence of Iran's military program.

Instead, the Iranians can be relied upon to spend the next six months, and a lot longer, arguing over the terms of the interim deal, pushing their own interpretations of what's been agreed, while seeking every means to further ease the economic pressure they're under. As Landau notes, the seeds of years of potential disagreement have already been sown in that there doesn't even appear to be an agreed text of the interim deal: Iran and the White House have released different versions, with significant differences.

Iran's avuncular, English-speaking Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif will assure the world that Iran is fully keeping its side of the bargain, that Iran has shown good faith, demonstrated its mature responsibility, is being unfairly picked upon, represents no danger to anybody.

Mohammad Javad Zarif

Until Sunday, the international community was telling Iran: "You want sanctions relief? Tell us the truth about your nuclear weapons program and start dismantling it." As of Nov. 24, the international community is telling Iran: "We're giving you limited sanctions relief, and we want you to start telling us the truth about your nuclear weapons program further on down the road."

In theory, the cause is not yet entirely lost. The $7 billion of promised financial relief could turn out to be all the sanctions relief that Tehran gets. The painstakingly constructed wall of economic pressure, so effectively heightened these past two years under the Americans' direction, could yet hold. And if that pressure were maintained, and the regime felt its very survival was at stake a few months from now, it could yet cave and come clean.

But none of that's going to occur, as the United States must know. Surrounded by Iran-backing Russia, amoral China and the impotent Europeans, facing an Iran playing smart cards from a very weak hand, the United States didn't merely blink in Geneva. It closed its eyes.

The wall of sanctions is cracked now, and the crack will widen. Self-interested nations and hard-nosed businesspeople will see to that. The pressure is lifting. There'll be no comprehensive deal six months from now – no deal that exposes and dismantles Iran's nuclear weapons program. The Iranians are sighing with relief.

An unnamed senior Israeli official was quoted on Channel 2 news on Nov. 24 as saying that, in Geneva, "[President Barack] Obama established Iran as a nuclear threshold state." Indeed so.

Does that mean the Iranians will now speed to the bomb? And if they do, will they use the bomb against Israel? No! They're unlikely to overtly flout the understandings they've reached with the world powers now. Rather, they'll argue over terms and battle relentlessly to destroy the sanctions regime, and seek to entrench the current situation where the military aspects of their program remain off-limits to the world's prying eyes.

And as its economy revives, nuclear-threshold state Iran will gradually assert itself as a regional heavyweight, with the leverage to pursue its rapacious territorial and ideological goals. At the same time, Israel will find its capacity to respond necessarily limited.

Landau has not entirely given up hope. She notes that a comprehensive deal would need to cover all aspects of the Iranian program, include "highly intrusive verification mechanisms, expose all past weaponization activities and ensure rollback from all military aspirations."

For that to be achieved, she stresses, the international community will have to hold firm on sanctions pressure as Iran complains, obfuscates, argues and exploits divisions in the international community and uses every other trick it knows in the coming months. "You'll need all possible leverage to get a full deal," she says. "And without a full deal, you've lost."

Trouble is, the Americans signalled the easing of that crucial leverage in Geneva on Nov. 24. They let Iran off the hook.

'Options open' on military strike: Liberman

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Liberman, in an interview Sunday morning with Israel Radio in the hours after the agreement was announced, called the agreement "a new reality in the whole Middle East," and "the Iranians' greatest victory."

In terms of the possibility of an Israeli military strike on Iranian nuclear sites, Liberman said, "As always, all options are on the table."

Avigdor Liberman

He said Israel would look to other allies in deciding how to deal with Iran.

"Israel must look into new directions in addition to the U.S.," he said. "We must take responsibility regardless of the stance of the Americans or of others. We must make our own independent decisions."

Israeli Justice Minister Tzipi Livni told Ynet news, "This is a terrible deal that will threaten not only us but the entire world." Livni, the lead negotiator in talks with the Palestinians, said Israel must work with the United States and other allies to make sure the final deal offers better terms.

Naftali Bennett, chair of the Jewish Home party and a government minister, also came out against the deal.

"If a nuclear suitcase blows up five years from now in New York or Madrid, it will be because of the deal that was signed this morning," he said in a statement posted on Facebook. "Israel," he added, "will not be committed to a deal that endangers its very existence."

Iranian officials reportedly welcomed the agreement, saying it confirmed the country's right to enrich uranium and that "all plots hatched by the Zionist regime to stop the nuclear agreement have failed," the state-owned Islamic Republic News Agency reported.

Israeli President Shimon Peres said in a statement: "The success or failure of the deal will be judged by results, not by words. I would like to say to the Iranian people, you are not our enemies and we are not yours. There is a possibility to solve this issue diplomatically. It is in your hands. Reject terrorism. Stop the nuclear program. Stop the development of long-range missiles. Israel like others in the international community prefers a diplomatic solution."

Knesset lawmaker Isaac Herzog, the newly elected chair of the opposition Labor party, said "the deal that was struck between the world powers and Iran is a fact and Israel must adjust itself to the new situation.

"Netanyahu must do everything in order to fix the damage that was caused from the public clash with the U.S. and return to an intimate relationship with President Obama and other world leaders," he said.

In a Nov. 24 statement, Foreign Minister John Baird said, "Canada has long held the view that every diplomatic measure should be taken to ensure Iran never obtains a nuclear weapon. We appreciate the earnest efforts of the [six world powers].

"Effective sanctions have brought the regime to present a more moderate front and open the door to negotiations. Today's deal cannot be abused or undermined by deception. The Iranian people deserve the freedom and prosperity that they have been denied for too long by the regime's nuclear ambitions. Until then, Canadian sanctions will remain tough, and in full force."

He added: "We will evaluate today's deal not just on the merits of its words, but more importantly on its verifiable implementation and unfettered access of all Iranian nuclear facilities."

David Koschitzky, chair of Canada's Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, said: "We applaud the [six world powers] for [their] serious diplomatic efforts. Israelis, more than anyone, want a peaceful end to Iran's nuclear program. Canadians have every reason to maintain healthy skepticism regarding this deal, given Iran's track record of manipulating diplomacy and breaching signed agreements. Any pause to Iran's nuclear drive will only be successful if the next six months are used to reach a comprehensive agreement that permanently denies Iran nuclear weapons capability."

He added: "Israel and others in the region have pointed to a number of serious deficiencies in this agreement. Just as intensive verification of Iran's actions will be required, we urge the [six world powers] to address the concerns raised by Israel in the next round of negotiations.

"This is just the beginning of a process that will be tested in the months ahead. We caution the international community to remain vigilant in holding Iran accountable and ensuring that it retains the ability to apply additional pressures should Iran backtrack on its obligations."

Palestinian leader wants to set agenda

Abbas willing to speak to Knesset

JTA

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas said he would be willing to speak to the Knesset, but only on the issues he chooses.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu in a public statement last week called on Abbas to address the Knesset and said he would travel to Ramallah to speak to the PA leadership.

"Netanyahu comes up with an offer and then immediately puts forward his own terms – that this and that should be said and so on. No, if those terms are put forward, I do not accept that," Abbas told the Voice of Russia in remarks broadcast Nov. 22. "But if he wants me to come and say the things I want to say, then I am ready to do it – but only in order to say what I want to say and not what he wants to hear. "

Abbas said there would be a "full-fledged" Palestinian state.

"When Israel realizes the need to establish peace in the Middle East, then there will emerge a Palestinian state with the capital in holy Jerusalem," the PA leader said.

He said the Palestinian Authority currently is not discussing efforts to push forward a bid for full membership in the United Nations. Abbas said Russia has a "significant part to play" in peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians.

Israeli entrepreneur touts business in India

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Back in the day, when opportunities in the eastern United States seemed to be drying up, energetic self-starters were encouraged to "Go West, young man."

Israelis with an entrepreneurial bent might be inclined to take the advice and spin it on its head: Go East, young man, all the way to India.

For Focal Energy, India presents a vast business opportunity where its Israeli expertise is valued and where demand for its products – renewable energy solutions – is widespread, if not "desperate."

Focal Energy does 100 per cent of its business in India, where it provides the management skill and technical know-how behind solar panel, biomass power plants and run-of-the-river hydro-electric generation, said Noam Ben-Ozer, CEO of Focal Energy.

Ben-Ozer, along with Anchit Gupta, Focal's director of business development, are scheduled to be in Toronto this week to brief business people on "The India-Israel Opportunity." The meeting is co-sponsored by the Indo-Israel Chamber of Commerce; the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce; the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs; as well as the City of Markham; businessmen Walter Arbib and Surjit Babra of Skylink Group.

Noam Ben-Ozer

Israel's energy needs are pretty much taken care of and the entire country's population is one-third that of New Delhi alone. As a result, a company like his has to look abroad for business opportunities, said Ben-Ozer. India has long held a fascination for him and when he learned that the country had a nearly unlimited demand for power – you could even call it "desperate" – he saw a potentially lucrative opportunity.

"There's a huge gap between supply and demand for power in India," he said in a telephone interview from Israel.

Even in the top hotels in India, you'll find a five-, six- or seven-hour gap each day when they're taken off the grid and have to rely on generators to provide power, he said.

Half the country is not even hooked up to the grid, but as the country develops, the need for power will continue to accelerate, he said.

And that falls right inside Focal's wheelhouse. The company's hydro, biomass and solar solutions are perfectly suited to the Indian market, Ben-Ozer said.

The country doesn't have much in the way of fossil fuels and is not giving approvals to coal-generated power plants that pollute, he said.

So, Focal's "run-of-the-river" generation projects – a 21st century equivalent to the old water wheels that powered mills – each provides 3-10 megawatts (MWs) of power. They are environmentally friendly and can be located every six or seven miles downriver. Ten MWs of power is enough to provide electricity for 20,000-25,000 households, he said.

Its solar solutions are somewhat larger projects, providing 15-20 MWs each.

Focal's expertise is in providing the "technical optimization" as well as cost containment for each project, said Ben-Ozer. "We bring the quality of materials, design, utilization, controlling and maintaining. That's why the Israeli experience is so important."

Focal works with Indian partners to implement its projects. The majority of its workforce is Indian, he noted.

"We're in a good space, a positive space. Our projects are attractive and they're good for people. You change the lives of hundreds and thousands of farmers by buying the stuff they'd burn in the fields."

The projects generate work for many Indians, he added.

Ben-Ozer has found doing business in India is a positive experience. "India is a tremendously tolerant environment. Today, India is really favourable for Israel."

It's not too bad for the bottom line, either. Given the country's high demand for energy and the lower costs, the return on investment is in the 15-16 per cent range, "higher than in the west," he said.

Ben-Ozer will be telling his story in Toronto this week, and meeting investment bankers as well. An infusion of private capital will only increase the company's capacity to do business.

For Ben-Ozer, the sky's the limit. "Renewable energy in India and in developing nations is not a 'nice to have.' It's a necessity," he said.

Entrepreneur makes business case for philanthropy

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

"Philanthropy is good business."

In philosophy circles that phrase might be called a "conceptual polarity" and it hasn't necessarily been something widely accepted in the corporate world.

The phrase happens to be the title of a chapter in W. Brett Wilson's new book, Redefining Success, Still Making Mistakes, as well as the theme of his opening address at last week's UJA Federation of Greater Toronto event, "Taking Care of Business."

Wilson, perhaps best known for his role as a panelist on the CBC's Dragons' Den, delivered the message as a guide to corporate success. For corporations, charitable giving has traditionally been seen as a liability on the balance sheet, not an asset. But that's a perspective Wilson believes is outdated.

Charitable giving is a win-win for both the giver and the recipient, he suggested. When you look at it that way, giving is done not simply out of sense of obligation, but of opportunity. Both sides benefit.

Wilson, who co-founded FirstEnergy Capital Corp. 20 years ago, said he drew attention to his upstart company by making sure his philanthropic giving was well noticed.

Even if the amount given was modest, he made sure the cheques got in the hands of the recipients, their officers and board members and others whose attention could help benefit his company.

Currently FirstEnergy gives two-and-a-half per cent of its pre-tax income to charities – substantially more than other corporations – but it doubles as advertising for the company, he said.

"I believe that companies will become better – and bigger – donors when they start seeing community giving as an opportunity rather than any sort of obligation," he writes. "For those who might disagree with me, think hard about this: charitable giving that in turn reaps an economic return creates stronger companies that can make more meaningful contributions to their communities in the long run."

Since 1993, when FirstEnergy was founded in Calgary, it has provided, one way or another, more than $10 million to more than 500 charities or community organizations.

W. Brett Wilson [Jeremy Otto photo]

Wilson said individuals interested in supporting charities can give time, money or leadership. He provided a new spin to the familiar aphorism that with great wealth comes great responsibility; or that businesses should adopt the concept of corporate social responsibility. As he would have it, with great wealth comes great opportunity and companies should practice corporate social opportunity.

Growing up in North Battleford, Sask., Wilson was exposed to philanthropy at an early age, though he didn't know it at the time.

His parents were active in their community, involved in bake sales and other benevolent endeavours.

"They were active in every way they could," he said, though it wasn't until later that he realized their involvement was far from the norm.

That planted the seed for his future philanthropy. Along the way, he developed prostate cancer. He has a unique way of looking at it: "I consider myself a prostate cancer graduate,"not "a survivor," he said.

Wilson has raised $3 million for prostate cancer research as well as raising awareness for the cause, and in doing so, "changed the face of philanthropy in Calgary," he said.

Cosmetics studio helps clients feel good about themselves

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Twenty-five years ago, an encounter at a kosher restaurant helped launch Susan Kirsch into a career operating her own cosmetics studio.

She had to serve a kosher dinner and so she went to Milk 'N Honey on Bathurst Street and pinned her business card to their bulletin board.

"Not long after that, I received a phone call from a Mrs. Schmidt from [women's clothing store] Frumela's who said, 'Your card's not there anymore. I want to hire you to do my daughter's wedding.' From that moment on I was busy doing Orthodox weddings. Mrs. Helen Schmidt launched my career," she said.

Kirsch is the founder of Kirsch Cosmetics Studio, which offers a wide range of makeup services to its clients throughout the city and as far away as Winnipeg, Montreal, New York and California.

Applying makeup for more than 1,000 weddings (doing about 200 per year) as well as prom, bar and bat mitzvahs, Kirsch conducts private and public lessons and seminars and has developed her own line of quality makeup products. Her goal is to promote beauty and boost self-confidence.

"I have never been motivated by building a business based on selling lots of products. For me, it's always been service-based: making people feel good, feel happy, by teaching," stated Kirsch.

After graduating with a business degree from Ryerson University in her early 20s, Kirsch was hired as a management trainee at Hudson's Bay Company and given a project that happened to be in the cosmetic department. "I realized I needed to also use my creative talents – so I decided to become a makeup artist," reflected Kirsch.

Kirsch's business was first introduced as Kirsch Camouflage Clinic. "I worked from home for the first five years and specialized in helping people recover after surgery, focusing on camouflage and paramedical makeup techniques. I worked with dermatologists, plastic surgeons, the burn unit at Sunnybrook Hospital and the vascular malformation clinic at [the Hospital for Sick Children]."

Branching out into a retail environment, Kirsch moved to a storefront at Avenue Road and Eglinton Avenue and stayed there for 10 years. During that time, she offered private service to her clients.

"There was really no place in the city for people to learn the step-by-step makeup application in a private environment." That led to the expansion on the beauty side with weddings, special occasion photography, and makeup application.

Kirsch's business continued to grow. She acquired a corner unit of a plaza at Glencairn and Marlee avenues and has never looked back.

"I have a very large Jewish clientele, especially observant women who require a private room so as to remove their sheitel. To match their lifestyle, we offer long-wearing lipstick and shomer Shabbos makeup."

The Kirsch Cosmetic Studio team is respectful of its clients' personal style, teaching girls ranging from 16 years old right up to women starting new jobs.

"People ask me all the time how they [can] get their makeup to last for Shabbos? The secret is layering," stated Kirsch.

Kirsch created her first product line, which was camouflage makeup. She then moved on to eye shadows and blush. "We also make our own makeup artistry tools and travel sets for clients who are on the go, or who need something in their gym bag.

"Organically, that grew into a whole new company that I created which is called Pandora's Makeup Box. I am currently building my brand and use my studio as my test location for product development and techniques," Kirsch said.

This month, Kirsch will launch a nail polish and vegan paraben-free lip gloss at some Rexall and Pharma Plus drug stores.

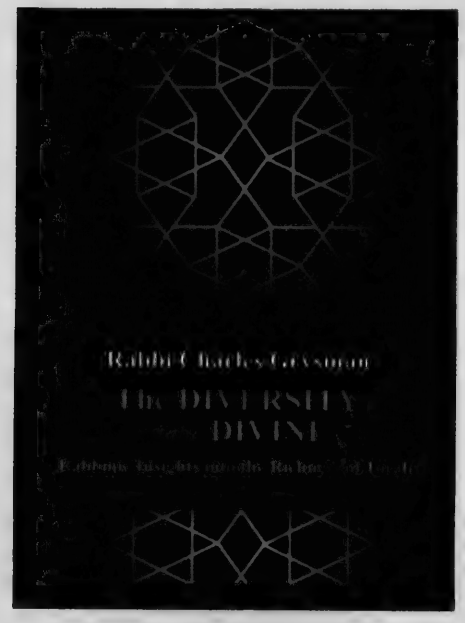
Guidance from a compassionate rabbi

Views & Reviews
Martin Lockshin

The duties of a congregational rabbi have changed radically over the last two centuries and perhaps even over the last 50 years. Three years ago in these pages, I reminisced about the good old days in Toronto of the 1960s, when "in an area just two or three kilometres long, you could find Rabbi Gunther Plaut, Rabbi Stuart Rosenberg and Rabbi Walter Wurzburger, all writing impressive books and articles in English that were being read widely, putting Canadian Jewry on the intellectual map of, respectively, Reform, Conservative and modern Orthodox intellectuals throughout the world. And just a few kilometres away from them, you could find Rabbi Gedaliah Felder and Rabbi Avraham Price writing erudite books and articles in Hebrew that are still being studied and cited throughout the world among students of rabbinic texts."



A congregational rabbi pulled me aside and politely told me that the demands on rabbis have changed: it is no longer reasonable, he argued, to expect a congregational rabbi to become an author. In the '60s, he claimed, people took pride in rabbis who studied and wrote. Today, they want rabbis to do marital counselling and mediation, and to be available for their congregants as confidantes and advisers every hour of the day.

So I'm always impressed when a successful congregational rabbi manages to publish a book of Jewish learning. My good friend, Rabbi Charles Grysman, rabbi of Zichron Yisroel Congregation of the Associated Hebrew Schools in Thornhill, Ont., has done so with the publication of his two-volume The Diversity of the Divine: Rabbinic Insights into the Richness of Torah.

Rabbi Grysman represents an interesting blend of the old and the new rabbinical models. His acumen in the study of classical rabbinic texts and his level of erudition are top notch. Yet he has also embraced the new roles of a rabbi. Like most rabbis, he teaches. But unlike most, he has also completed a PhD in education. Like most rabbis, he does counselling and mediation. But Rabbi Grysman has professionalized and modernized these aspects of his job by obtaining an advanced degree in social work, as well as accreditation as a mediator.

Rabbi Grysman's book provides sources and insights relevant to each of the parshiot (weekly Torah-reading segments) of the entire Five Books of Moses. Even a beginning student who knows no Hebrew and little Bible will be able to follow this book.

Rabbis write books on the weekly Torah portions for two reasons. Some attempt to provide the authoritative "correct" understanding of the biblical text. Others use the biblical text and the hallowed commentaries written on it in the past as a springboard for some moral lesson. Rabbi Grysman's book belongs to the second category. As he writes in the introduction: "There is a tendency amongst some to use source material to direct the reader to a single conclusion; this has the benefit of lending an air of certainty to the text. Others look for rare sources and novel perspectives so as to ensure that the material is unique... The goal of this book, however, is to present a diverse set of perspectives on a given issue that flow from a varied selection of source material. It is my conviction that overly definitive approaches to Scripture have the potential to inhibit the desire for further exploration and to obscure the sense of wonder that can emanate from a broad study of Scripture and commentary."

His sources are eclectic. Aside from traditional Jewish commentaries, including a smattering of chassidic texts, Rabbi Grysman cites less orthodox sources such as the writings of Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel and Sigmund Freud, as well as works on social psychology. His goal is to inspire us to become better human beings and better Jews.

In an example from this coming week's Torah portion (Miketz), Rabbi Grysman analyzes at some length the poignant scene where Joseph, viceroy of Egypt, toys with his brothers, whom he recognizes although they do not recognize him (Genesis 42:5-20). Standing in front of Joseph, but not realizing who he is, the brothers think back on their sin in the distant past when they ganged up on young Joseph and sold him (or led to his sale) as a slave (Genesis 42:21). The oldest brother, Reuben, describes their current predicament as their just deserts: "Now comes the reckoning for his blood" (Genesis 42:22). Rabbi Grysman cites the comment of the most respected Jewish Bible commentator of all time, Rashi (1040-1105), who suggests, with only the flimsiest textual support, that Reuben was saying that they were being punished not only for what they had done to Joseph but also for the pain that they caused their father, Jacob, all these years.

Rabbi Grysman explains that, following this line of interpretation: "Reuben expressed the awareness that their assault on Joseph was also an attack on Jacob, and that they bore fault for how it had affected Jacob." Rabbi Grysman, the educator, teaches a lesson: "A true reckoning of the consequences of one's actions must be inclusive, to the point that one sees the full range of the misery that one has caused."

TREASURE HOARD FOUND NEAR TEMPLE MOUNT DATES FROM SOLOMONIC TIMES

A Hebrew University of Jerusalem excavation some 50 metres south of the Temple Mount in Jerusalem has uncovered stunning remains from the Solomonic period. Shortly after breaking through the surface of a new area filled with modern debris, excavators found a hoard of rare gold coins, silver and gold jewelry, and a large gold medallion ornamented with a menorah.

"This happens only once in a lifetime," said Dr. Eilat Mazar, who heads the archeological team that made the discovery this summer.

Mazar and her team believe the menorah medallion and other items were probably used to adorn a Torah scroll; if so, they are the earliest known Torah scroll ornaments ever discovered.

Found inside a 6th-century Byzantine structure, the fantastic collection was most likely hidden by a prominent group of Jews during the Persian conquest of Jerusalem.

It is the latest of a series of extraordinary finds Mazar's team has unearthed. Last year she uncovered a piece of pottery bearing the oldest alphabetical inscription yet to be found in Jerusalem.

PLAY EXPLORES WORLD OF SHANGHAI'S JEWISH REFUGEES

Next Stage Theatre Festival presents the premiere of On the Other Side of the World, a play written and directed by Brenley Charkow, about a young Jewish girl whose family flees to Shanghai during World War II. "I wanted to honour this little-known piece of history," Charkow said. "Growing up Jewish, I was raised with the knowledge of what happened during the war, but not once did I hear of the Jewish refugees and ghettos of Shanghai. The more research I did, the more I wanted to tell this story."

The production will feature a 14-person cast that includes Ashleigh Hendry, Nicholas Rice, Sam Rosenthal, Dale Yim, Liza Balkan, Jordan Kanner and Dov Mickelson. It also features an original musical score incorporating both Asian and Jewish musical influences that will be performed live. $15. Israeli Film Festival: The Daring Independent Film Festival (DIFF), which grew out of the five-year-old but now defunct Moving Image Film Festival, makes its debut in Toronto in December, headed by Toronto-based filmmaker Ron Furman. DIFF, in partnership with the Schwartz-Reisman Centre, is presenting a full day of Israeli films.

"My mission is to promote Israel as best as possible," says Furman, who once worked for the Israeli foreign ministry and the Israel advocacy organization Stand With Us, and who adds that films that bash Israel will not be accepted in the festival.

"I believe there are a lot of anti-Israel films out there that do not represent the state in the proper way. I wanted to do my part to present Israel as I see it. An Israeli film festival is the best way to promote Israel and to educate people as to what Israel is all about."

The program includes Welcome Home, Furman's hour-long documentary about groups of young participants in the Birthright program from New York, Chicago, Toronto, Los Angeles and Miami as they visit Israel for the first time. Other titles include Strangers No More, Dolphin Boy, 804, Red Nose and Out in the Dark.

While DIFF's first three days of screenings take place at a downtown venue, the Israeli films will be screened on the fourth day – Sunday, Dec. 29 – at the Schwartz-Reisman Centre, 9600 Bathurst St., north of Rutherford Rd. in Vaughan, Ont. $10 per film, day pass $36. www.diffest.com

Jews of Egypt: Congregation Darchei Noam is screening the Egyptian documentary film Jews of Egypt by director Amir Ramses, supposedly the first film of its kind produced in Egypt and permitted a general release. The film covers the Jewish involvement in Egyptian business and arts in the first half of the 20th century, mentions the founding of Israel in 1948, the Egyptian revolution of 1952, and the forced exile of Egypt's Jews.

Khaled Diab, an Egyptian-Belgian journalist, wrote an opinion piece in Ha'aretz after a screening of the film in Egypt was cancelled. "This damages the push-back against strong anti-Jewish sentiment gripping the country, while failing to remind Egyptians of a past era of diversity and tolerance," he wrote. $10, $5. Jazz musician thrives on improvization

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Nothing thrills Toronto jazz musician Brian Katz more than getting on a concert stage and making something up.

Katz, 57, loves to improvise, and he often feels the urge to create new melodies at his shows and in the studio. He recently finished his first solo album of jazz recordings, Leaves Will Speak, and had planned to stick to the strict compositions he had written. However, that plan was short-lived. Of the 18 tracks on the album, he improvised six.

"My soul just needed to create new things," Katz tells The CJN. "It was really a little shocking to myself. This wasn't starting off to be a free improv record, but now it's a marriage of my pieces and free improvisations."

It took Katz a long time to finally get to this premiere solo effort. He spent more than 20 years collaborating with internationally renowned Jewish artists like Yiddish musician Lenka Lichtenberg, author Dan Yashinsky and the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band.

Katz got into klezmer music professionally in the late 1980s. He credits this to growing up in a "music friendly household" where his parents often played Yiddishkeit, klezmer music, as well as jazz and classical arrangements.

He began playing guitar at eight, later took up the piano and then developed a taste for classical guitar as a young adult. When Katz began to perform professionally, he blended the musical influences he listened to as a child into his recordings – and later, his improvisations.

"That was just a natural thing for me to do, to bring Jewish music influences into jazz," Katz says. "I can't get away from my Jewish influence… nor do I want to."

One of the most vibrant tracks on Leaves Will Speak, called Mezzonia, features an eclectic mix of musical styles, including klezmer, Bulgarian, East Indian and blues, showing off his taste for mixing genres. Katz wrote another melody, In the Olive Grove, in Jerusalem and he says he often travels to Israel.

He also dedicates Leaves Will Speak to his father, Bernie, who died last year. In the album's liner notes, Katz calls his dad "my first jamming partner, who infused me with a deep love of music."

Bernie was an amateur harmonica player who had a big love of music, Katz says. "He took me to the symphony when I was very young. He was an opera buff. We played music from the time I was a very young age."

When he is not performing or in the studio, Katz leads a busy life as a music teacher around Toronto. In addition to leading a klezmer ensemble at York University, Katz teaches improvisation, jazz and classical music there. He is also a professor of music education and Delcroze Eurhythmics at the University of Toronto.

"I like living on the edge," he chuckles. "However, I balance that by still maintaining practice in classical music. I do enough stuff that is preordained."

Delcroze Eurhythmics is a highly experiential approach to music, named after a Swiss music teacher, which sees the body as the first instrument. Katz teaches people rhythm through the body and emphasizes that his students should learn to move on each note they make.

"Delcroze said that for every sound, there's a gesture. For every gesture, a sound," Katz says. He even invented an offshoot of the Eurhythmics foundation called Yidrhythmics, which focuses on movement enhanced through chassidic tunes.

Katz is also busy working on the We Are One Jazz Project, designed for students aged eight to 13 who live in disadvantaged areas. He will spend the next three months rehearsing with kids living in and near Toronto's Jane and Finch neighbourhood, teaching them jazz and the blues, as well as improvisation.

Brian Katz got into klezmer music professionally in the late 1980s.

Alongside instructors like jazz pianist Howard Rees and legendary musician Barry Harris, Katz will prepare the grade-schoolers to perform for a concert in February at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

"It's amazing how kids from Grade 3 can learn (jazz and) all those syncopated rhythms," Katz says. "But, in fact, kids have such fast nervous systems. Kids totally get that. They live in that universe of really fast rhythms."

Katz says that being a teacher has made him a more confident performer. The improvisation he includes in a classroom setting rubs off on him.

Although he keeps his time full with teaching and performing, Katz says he now wants to focus on songwriting and perhaps do a solo guitar record of jazz standards.

He would love to tour across Canada, once again performing without a net, not knowing what each new improvised performance will bring. "There's nothing more exciting than that," he says.

Documentary shows revitalized Polish Jewish life

Jordan Adler
Special to The CJN

Toronto filmmaker Francine Zuckerman always wanted to travel with her father, Jack, to Poland. Jack fled Poland in August 1939, two weeks before the war broke out. He was fortunate to make it to Canadian soil, as the "none is too many" immigration policy closed the country's doors to Jewish immigrants.

But they did not get a chance to visit Poland together before he died in 1992. "Even though our family had this negative impression of Poland, he really didn't," she says. "He wanted to connect, he wanted to show me but we never got a chance to go."

However, when Zuckerman spoke with people she met on an earlier film she directed, the Gemini Award-winning Half the Kingdom, they told her about a new wave of Jewish life developing in Eastern Europe. Zuckerman says she had believed that there were no Jews left in Poland.

She knew it was time to head to her father and mother's birthplace.

In Poland, Zuckerman became one witness to the birth of this cultural and religious revival.

Her new documentary, We Are Here, tells the story of several Polish Jews who live under the shadow of the Holocaust and the new efforts to rebuild Poland's Jewish community. Zuckerman dedicated the film to her parents.

The first time she visited was during the 65th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising. From this maiden visit, she started contacting Jewish citizens.

"Each time I went back, I put little pieces of the puzzle together," she says. "Slowly I started to understand what was really going on in Poland. It's 20 years after Solidarity and the fall of the [Berlin] Wall. There's a new world that's opened up. It's almost hip now to say, 'I've got Jewish roots.'"

One woman she met at the Ghetto Heroes Monument during her first visit was Irena Likierman, a Holocaust survivor who became one of the documentary's five Polish-Jewish subjects.

Likierman was only eight when Nazis forced her family into the Warsaw Ghetto. She would later escape from the ghetto and hide in several homes before returning to Warsaw after the war. Likierman chose to stay in Warsaw but changed her name and hid her Jewish identity.

"When I go to the [Ghetto Heroes] monument, that's how I feel connected to my family," Likierman told The CJN.

Likierman struggled to find her place in Poland after the war. However, Polish Jews growing up in a post-Communist era are finding more comfort in the nation's slowly developing Jewish community.

One of these Jews, Ania Ciszewska, works for Limmud, a UK-based organization focused on educating people about Jewish life, history and events. The agency also connects people to their Jewish roots. Ciszewska says the job is important to her because it reminds her of her own realization that she was Jewish.

Ciszewska started to discover her faith as a child, even though her parents had repressed their religious identity. In high school, she became more attached to her Jewish identity through the Holocaust literature she read in her classes.

This was a key learning curve for her, since history classes in Poland skim over World War II, she says. But once she became interested in knowing more about Judaism, Ciszewska did not let up.

"I joined the Jewish Senate Organization and I went on Birthright," she says. "It was like this kick for me. I started to run the Jewish holidays at my place. I invited my mom and my sister and some of my friends and we did it together."

However, Jewish family celebrations are still more difficult to do in Poland. "There are many kids like me, who want to bring [Judaism] to the house, but the parents [and] the grandparents do not want it," Ciszewska says.

The estimated number of Jews living in Poland ranges from estimates of around 10,000 to 100,000. Although a 2010 census showed that around 10,000 Jews lived there, many have either not yet discovered this identity or do not identify as Jews.

"I was sitting in a café in between shooting. I look over and I see somebody who totally looks Jewish to me," Zuckerman says. "I was watching her, and I thought, I bet she doesn't know [she is Jewish]. That was probably the most profound thing for me. I grew up with this entire sense of who I am as a Jew. They didn't."

Although Jewish life has begun to spring into Warsaw, anti-Semitism remains. This intolerance is more rampant in smaller towns like Lublin, where Jews are not an active part of the community.

We Are Here took Zuckerman six years to make. It will preview at the Royal cinema in Toronto on Dec. 3 and is set to air on the Documentary Channel on Dec. 9. Zuckerman says she hopes to get We Are Here into next year's Jewish Film Festival in Toronto, as well as international festivals.

Earlier this month, the film screened at Warsaw's Museum of the History of Polish Jews. The museum, set to open in September 2014, was built on the ground that used to be part of the Warsaw Ghetto. The screening this month brought Zuckerman's journey full circle.

"When I was there for the 65th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising, the president of Poland and the president of Israel got together," she says. "They walked from the monument for the people who died during the Warsaw Ghetto Uprising to the new site of the Jewish museums. We realized we were moving from commemorating the death to acknowledging the life."

Partners hope app is key to fitness success

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Two Waterloo-based men are hoping their app will change the way people take care of their bodies.

Built through a partnership between Phil Jacobson and Garrett Gottlieb, both 23 years old, fitness app PumpUp has been reaching people all over the globe.

With more than 100,000 downloads, the app helps build personalized workout routines. For example, someone with just 15 minutes at home with no equipment could log on and get a routine laid out for them. The same goes for someone with hours to spare at a gym, surrounded by weights and machines.

"We show them what to do and how to do it, and they can share their progress with broader community," Jacobson said.

Gottlieb said it all started when he was in high school, getting into the routine of doing a daily workout and learning from his father.

When he got to university, he continued the habit, but by the time he was in his third year, he felt that his workouts were becoming stale.

"I tried searching for apps on my phone to make me a cool workout, but it was just workout libraries or exercise lists, so I decided to build it myself," he said.

After working at three startups and then at BlackBerry (then Research In Motion) as part of his computer science studies at the University of Waterloo, he realized he didn't want to work for a big company.

"The responsibility was very low, and there wasn't a whole lot of creativity involved. It didn't feel like I had as much artistic freedom," he said.

He took some time to develop the app as part of the University of Waterloo enterprise co-op program, where he won $4,000.

That's when his friend and Jewish fraternity brother, Jacobson, joined the team, bringing in the skills he learned as a business student at Wilfrid Laurier University.

"I developed the prototype and vision, but it was a matter of executing that vision," Gottlieb said.

Once they won a $25,000 prize in the VeloCity Venture Fund, a competition at the University of Waterloo for innovative tech startups, they knew they had something worthwhile.

But it wasn't long before the pair decided that they needed to go bigger. They tried out for CBC's Dragons' Den and although they were turned away, a month later, they were invited onto the show. It aired earlier this month.

So they walked into the den with a phone attached to a large monitor to demonstrate the app, as well as a hugely muscular bodybuilder. That was the producer's idea, Jacobson told Waterloo-based tech hub Communitech, explaining that the app targets beginners more than experts, so he wasn't thrilled with the idea, but the producer insisted.

On the show, the pair asked the "dragons" for $100,000 in exchange for 10 per cent of the business. Unfortunately, at that time – in April – they didn't have the user numbers to convince the investors their business was worth the investment.

At the time, they'd had only 12,000 downloads, with only about a third of them active, and a handful of people opting for the paid premium features, which so far is just a voice coaching option.

PumpUp's founders try to make a deal on CBC's Dragons' Den.

The fact that the pair were focusing on increasing their number of users rather than figuring out how to encourage those users to pay for the app dissuaded the dragons from making a deal.

David Chilton, author of successful financial planning book franchise The Wealthy Barber, did offer to invest in PumpUp, but he offered $100,000 for 20 per cent equity, as well as 25 per cent royalty.

"We believe all cash, whether by investment or revenue, needs to go back into the business," Jacobson said. "That would have held it back."

He said the fact that PumpUp has since then increased its subscribers by 1,000 per cent shows that it was a smart decision, and he doesn't regret turning down the offer.

However, the company still isn't focusing on monetizing the app – something that Venture Communications CEO Arlene Dickinson said is a problem with startups. "They're so full of, 'We know everything and we've got the best thing since sliced bread,' and it's ridiculous," she said after the PumpUp team left the den.

Fellow dragon Bruce Croxon, CEO of LavaLife, reminded her that if these kinds of ideas catch on, they can scale very quickly.

That's what Jacobson and Gottlieb are hoping will happen with PumpUp.

"We're continuing to involve the product and grow the user base... We'll focus on revenue in the future. Right now, we're focused on growth, and we're seeing hypergrowth," Jacobson said, adding that the growth includes adding two more staff members.

He credits his success partially to his experience in the Jewish fraternity Alpha Epsilon Pi. In his last year of university, he was president of the Waterloo chapter, and he said the role helped him learn how to manage an organization.

"It's a platform for you to explore and learn," he said, adding that he would encourage any male Jewish university students to join. "If you leverage it from an exploring and learning perspective, you get so much out of it."

Both Gottlieb and Jacobson are hoping to continue drawing on that and other experiences to help the company continue to grow.

They are optimistic. "A year from now, we'll have millions of users using the product across the world," Jacobson said.

Just what is COR?

Kosher Living

Richard Rabkin

As the calendar year comes to a close and with it the completion of the commemoration of our 60 years serving the kosher community, it may be interesting to reflect on our origins and answer the basic question, "What is the Kashruth Council of Canada?"

The Kashruth Council of Canada, known colloquially as "COR" because of our kosher symbol, or hechsher, is a charitable non-profit community organization. We certify approximately 1,000 facilities – both local "food service establishments," which includes restaurants, caterers, supermarkets, retirement residences and the like, as well as commercial manufacturing plants in Canada and around the world that produce products that appear on the shelves of grocery stores and as base ingredients used in products worldwide. We, as well as the entire kosher community, have come a long way in our 60 years.

In the 1940s and early 1950s, kosher meat supply in Toronto was unregulated and chaotic, frustrating the local Jewish community. Rumours circulated of unscrupulous butchers passing off non-kosher meat as kosher. Indeed, writing in the 1950s, Meyer W. Gasner, who would become COR's first lay chairman, wrote, "A study has revealed that only 50 per cent of all poultry sold in Toronto as kosher, is ritually slaughtered by a shochet. The remaining 50 per cent, though treif, is sold as kosher to you at a higher price, as though it were ritually slaughtered. Thus, one out of every two fowl sold is non-kosher."

Looking for a solution, a group of 10 of Toronto's synagogue presidents held an initial meeting in 1952, headed by Gasner, through the Canadian Jewish Congress. Their ongoing discussions led to the establishment of a kashrut organization with both lay and rabbinic oversight bodies. In November 1953, they formed the Kashruth Committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress and authorized the chairman to invite rabbis to join the Vaad Hakashruth.

By 1954, the membership of the Vaad Hakashruth consisted of 12 pulpit rabbis. A sub-group, the Rabbinical Council of the Vaad Hakashruth, was composed of Rabbi G. Felder, Rabbi B. Rosensweig, Rabbi D. Schochet, and Rabbi W. Wurzburger.

Rabbi Gedalia Felder was appointed chairman of the Vaad Hakashruth, while Gasner became chairman of the lay committee. Rabbi Nachman Shemen was engaged to run the day-to-day operations of the kashrut department. After Rabbi Felder's illness, Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner took over as chairman of the Vaad Hakashruth, while Rabbi Mordechai Levin assumed control over day-to-day operations upon Rabbi Shemen's departure.

Sixty years later, the same model is employed today. The Kashruth Council of Canada has a staff that runs day-to-day operations and reports to two oversight bodies. The rabbinic body is still called the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashruth (RVH), which now comprises 19 rabbis from various shuls in the Greater Toronto Area. The RVH is headed by Rabbi Yacov Felder, the son of COR's original RVH chairman. A core group of rabbis from the RVH called the "executive RVH" meets on a regular basis to discuss matters of policy and reports back to the larger RVH.

Similarly, COR staff report to a board of 34 lay representatives, of which 14 meet on a regular basis and act as the board's executive. Ira Marder is currently the chairman of the board.

From a financial perspective, COR is a non-profit organization. All of the fees collected go toward covering our operations. In the food service division – restaurants and caterers – we actually operate at a financial deficit – that is, our expenses are greater than our fees. We are able to marginally compensate this loss in revenue from our other divisions.

Everyone involved in working for COR does so out of a passion to serve the kosher community. But we don't view it simply as communal work. It's holy work. As long as there has been a Jewish People, we have been eating kosher food, and those of us who work and volunteer our time at the Kashruth Council of Canada intend to keep it that way.

Rabbi Gedalia Felder explained it best, writing in 1957, "I trust that the Jewish men and women of Toronto will be guided by our counsel, will help us in this holy task, enable us to restore kashruth to its sacred place, so that it can again be said, 'Israel, thou art a Holy nation to thy G-d.'"

A kosher feast for the senses

Norene Gilletz
Special to The CJN

Kosherfest 2013 was the biggest kosher buffet I've ever attended. Dairy in the morning, meat in the afternoon.

The 25th anniversary of Kosherfest, the world's largest annual kosher-certified tradeshow, took place at the Meadowlands Exposition Center in Secaucus, N.J., late last month. More than 6,000 kosher food and beverage buyers, industry professionals, food bloggers and cookbook authors attended the two-day show.

Thousands of kosher-certified products and services representing every category were on display, with strong international participation, including exhibitors from Canada, the United States, Israel, Italy, Argentina, Spain and more. There are more than 200,000 kosher products available today. An estimated 500 new products were scattered among the 350 booths, and nearly 150 products were submitted to the annual New Product Competition.

Menachem Lubinsky, the founder of Kosherfest, proudly spoke of the dramatic changes in the kosher food industry. Kosher has made a huge leap from the more traditional foods that many immigrants brought with them from eastern Europe to today's abundance of mainstream products that now bear kosher certification.

"Kosher today has truly become a worldwide phenomenon," Lubinsky said.

Kosher has successfully made the transition from baby boomers to today's younger generation of kosher consumers, with their appetite for new, unique products. The new-age product list at Kosherfest consisted of Facon (beef bacon), Asian sauces, hickory-smoked meats, organic Italian extra-virgin olive oil, pareve gelato, even pizza cones. Many coconut-based kosher products from the Philippines were introduced at the show for the first time. In almost every category of food, there were new products, new packaging and/or a healthier version of something that had been on the market for years.

Here's a round-up of some of the best kosher products I discovered as I wandered through the jam-packed aisles.

Matzolah (Foodman LLC): In 2012, their Maple Nut Matzo Granola won best new Passover product. This year, they introduced their nut-free, gluten-free Cranberry Orange Matzo Granola Breakfast and Nosh, made with Vermont maple syrup and cranberries.

Rye Tam Tam Crackers (Manischewitz): These crisp, pareve crackers are terrific topped with hummus or cheese.

MOLLIE KATZEN'S POTATO LATKES

(use her hint to keep batter from turning brown!)

2 lg potatoes • 1 medium-sized onion • 2 eggs • 1/4 c flour 1/2 tsp salt • Black pepper • cayenne to taste (optional) • Oil for frying

Bring a medium-sized saucepan of water to a boil. Scrub, then grate potatoes in food processor (no need to peel). Lower heat under saucepan to a simmer; drop in grated potatoes. Parboil 3 min., then drain in a colander over a sink; rinse with cold water. Drain thoroughly; transfer to a bowl. Grate onion, add to potatoes along with eggs, flour, salt, optional cayenne. Heat ½" oil in a skillet over medium heat. When hot enough to sizzle a breadcrumb on contact, spoon in ¼ cups of batter, pressing down to form thin pancakes. Keeping heat medium-high; fry on both sides until crisp and brown. Drain finished latkes paper towels (don't stack them! single layer only!); keep warm in oven.

Serve hot, with sour cream and applesauce.

Manischewitz has come a long way since it first introduced its super-sweet, ceremonial wines. Manischewitz also introduced its new recipe app at the show.

Goldbaum's Gluten Free Flatbread Crisps won an award in the best new bread, grain, cereal or cracker category. These tasty flatbreads are pareve and come simply salted, or in a range of savory flavours.

You Won't Believe It's Pareve: Corim Industries won the New Product Competition's top honours, along with best new beverage for its single-serve beverage cups designed for K-Cup brewers. Their pareve K-cups come in cappuccino, hot chocolate and chai tea flavors. Clever!

I went back for a second helping of Finchi's Decadent Chocolate Mousse, available in regular, low fat and sugar free versions. Chocolate velvet! I loved their all-natural Chocolate Brownie Torte. Both desserts are nut-free, dairy-free, and gluten-free. Finchi's won the award for best new kosher for Passover product. Well deserved.

The award for best new candy went to Schmerling for its Sugarless Rosemarie Parve & Rosemarie Milk Chocolates. Best new dessert/baked goods went to Melissa Cupcakes for its gorgeous mini cupcakes.

If you love the crispy edges around the brownies, you'll adore Sheila G's Brownie Brittle (dairy). This crunchy dairy snack comes in four fabulous flavours, including Toffee Crunch and Salted Caramel.

Grape Seed Flour (Solio): I often use grape seed oil but never saw grape seed flour before. This unique product is pareve and gluten-free. New culinary adventures ahead!

Jack's Gourmet: Last year, Jack's introduced its prize-winning Facon, which looks, cooks and tastes like bacon. This year, the company introduced several flavours of sausage patties, including spicy Mexican-style chorizo beef sausage patties, and a sweet Italian sausage patty. Good news – they will be distributed in Canada by Hartman's of Toronto.

Toronto cooking mavens Estee Kafra and Dassi Slater were promoting their popular website, www.kosherscoop.com. Kafra proudly introduced her gorgeous new cookbook, Cooking Inspired, an innovative recipe collection featuring 200 of the best recipes from Kosher Scoop, hot off the presses.

Cholov Yisroel yogurt wars: Mehadrin introduced its non-fat Greek Yogurt in strawberry and blueberry. Unfortunately, my sample was confiscated when I went through security at the airport! Norman's launched its Greek Yogurt Light, with 100 calories per container.

Mikee-Mac's Non-Dairy Mac & Cheeze Dinner won in the new pasta, rice, bean or soup category. Now you'll be able to serve your kids their cheezy pareve noodles while the rest of the family is enjoying brisket and potatoes. Does that mean peace at the dinner table?

Summit Point Farms introduced Hickory Smoked BBQ Beef Brisket, fully cooked, sliced and ready for reheating, in one-pound packages. It won an award in the best new meat, seafood or poultry category. Smart!

Royal Wine introduced the new Kedem fresh grape juice, with no added sugar, which is packaged like fresh-squeezed orange juice.

I tasted hot dogs made from fish, a new product from Aaron's. They were surprisingly good and didn't taste fishy at all. Frozen gefilte fish logs from A&B Fish included gluten-free, sugar-free and salmon gefilte fish options. Silky smooth and delicious.

Matt's Munchies won an award for best new sweet snack food. These gluten-free, pareve, organic fruit leather squares come in various flavours (Mango Açaí, Ginger Spice and Choco Nana). They're perfect for the lunchbox.

Osem has removed the MSG from its soup and seasoning mixes, and its broths have no MSG or additional additives. Its Israeli couscous now comes in bigger size packages, great for larger families.

The Center for Kosher Culinary Arts (CKCA) and Jack's Gourmet LLC co-sponsored an exciting Iron Chef cooking competition. Three talented local chefs were given a mystery basket of Mediterranean ingredients. The winner was Alexandre Petard, executive chef, Ladino Tapas Restaurant of Manhattan. Chef Petard is donating his $1,000 cash award to a local organization supporting Hurricane Sandy relief. I predict this talented, charismatic young chef will have a career ahead of him on the Food Network.

The next Kosherfest will take place on Nov. 11 and 12, 2014. Until we eat again...!

CHANUKAH GREETINGS 2013

Tzedakah important part of bar/bat mitzvah celebration

Sammy Hudes
Special to The CJN

A bar or bat mitzvah is a momentous occasion in a child's life, one in which they accept a new range of adult responsibilities.

One of these responsibilities is tzedakah, the act of lending one's efforts to those in need.

Many 12- and 13-year-olds choose to dedicate their own momentous occasion to the betterment of the community, be it locally or to the greater Jewish population of the world.

Fortunately, there are many ways to do just that.

"Tying in tzedakah as part of this milestone is really quite important. It's a wonderful, powerful opportunity for children to be connected," says Lance Davis, executive director of Jewish National Fund of Toronto.

Davis says that through JNF, children are able to donate funds raised through their bar or bat mitzvah toward the organization's many projects in Israel. These include projects based on tourism, water, recreation, education, research and development, and security.

"Something in our inventory will surely speak to a child and then they can direct the funds to something in Israel so there is a real, tangible connection between the child and the land of Israel at this important milestone in their life," he says.

Michal Freedman supported Mazon Canada at her bat mitzvah.

At the children's hospital of Israel's Shaare Zedek Medical Center in Jerusalem, there is currently a high demand for wheelchairs.

In late spring, the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation designed a new program aimed at bar/bat mitzvah youth called the Boomerang Project, according to Gayle Kertzman, the organization's manager of events and communications.

The project aims to raise funds for additional wheelchairs, each of which costs approximately $500. Through the Boomerang website, a child can set up his or her own personal fundraising page to collect donations from family and friends in honour of the occasion.

All participants receive an inscription of their name on the wheelchair wall plaque at the hospital. In addition, participants will be invited to play in a basketball game with an NBA alumnus later on in the year, Kertzman says.

The organization will also help children organize their own fundraising events, throughout the year, says Kertzman. She says bar and bat mitzvah children are always welcome to donate a portion of their gifts as well.

But to honour their transition to adulthood, children don't necessarily have to look as far as Israel in order to make a difference.

Through Mazon Canada's Gimmel Project, a child or family can donate an amount equal to a portion of their party's food costs, in order to fight hunger within the local community, says national executive director Ida McLaughlin.

She says the suggested rate is three per cent of whatever the family pays for food costs. They can also purchase place cards for guests from the organization, McLaughlin says.

"We are fortunate that we get to sit with our families once a week around our dinner table and be thankful for what we have," McLaughlin says. "I like to be able to link the simchah with that sort of thing. The importance of giving in this particular case is to say, 'we are fortunate in that we can eat, but others are not, so let's think of them in this time of celebration.'"

Angela D'Aversa, assistant director of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, says there are a growing number of children in the community donating a portion of their gifts to charity.

The United Jewish Appeal's B'nai Tzedek Teen Philanthropy program is an outlet for those bar/bat mitzvah age or above to start honing their leadership skills. It connects Jewish teens to hands-on, volunteer opportunities with the various community agencies UJA works with, according to D'Aversa.

"The key is really connecting what the kids care about to community needs," D'Aversa says. "Most kids realize that they live a very privileged life and that it's important to give back, and especially with the rite of passage of bar or bat mitzvah, it's the beginning of responsibility and tikkun olam and tzedakah, and it really is an important time in their life to do that."

Warding off the nightmares:

Survivor's poems tell important story

Robert Hirschfield
Special to The CJN

Miriam Steinmetz makes sure that every apartment she lives in has two exits. If the Nazis break into one, she can escape through the other. She lives in a building with a doorman in Manhattan. But it is her residence of memory, and the poetry she wrenches from it, that brought me to her door.

I heard her read one of her poems months before at the poetry workshop she was taking at the Mid-Manhattan Library. She read with her strong Hungarian accent, her lines simple, stark and declarative.

There were no carefully worked images, no attempt to add to the sum of Holocaust art. Just the desire to resurrect an event; to give suffering a coherent shape.

Listening to her read that day, I wondered where the strength came from to do such hauling and shaping. What made her begin?

We were sitting in her living room. Behind us, in the foyer, like tiny ghosts under glass, were her parents – her father, who died at Auschwitz and her mother, who survived Bergen-Belsen, but barely. She was reduced to 70 pounds of skin and bone.

Steinmetz, sturdy, open-faced, plain spoken, fit no brooding description of the perennial survivor, hidden in two orphanages while Eichmann was rounding up the Jews of Hungary for slaughter. Her mother saved her life by sticking her in an orphanage outside the Jewish ghetto in Budapest when she was three. It was hit by a Russian bomb and the children were taken in by Evangelical nuns and put in their orphanage.

"Ten years ago, when I was having terrible nightmares about the Holocaust, I'd wake up at two in the morning and turn on the TV, or read a book. Suddenly, spontaneously, I began writing poetry; it just came out of me," Steinmetz said. "I thought that writing would be a release. I could get it all out of my system. Of course, I could never get it all out of my system, but it was a relief to have an outlet for my memories. Since then, I have grown to love writing poetry."

Miriam Steinmetz

"Do you recall your first poem?" I asked.

She plucked it automatically from the stack of poems on her table. I thought of a mother who always knows where her first child is hanging out.

The poem was called Winter 1944, Budapest Jew House. It opens with these lines:

Do not be afraid my little dove
Said the man in black to me
As my mother held me tight.
In the cold basement of the Jew House.
Do not be afraid now, it is only gold I'm after.
Later, I will take lives
I already took your childhood.

The theme of the man in black is one she would return to years later in her poetry workshop. I heard her read a variation of that poem, fitted with new details: "battered suitcases," "coal briquettes," "a discarded toilet."

"When you tell someone they killed a million and a half children, it blows your mind. Who can imagine that? One child they can imagine."

By remembering for one, she remembers for many

I stood shivering and crying for my Mother, for a hug.
Scratching my scalp, home for a squatter family of lice being evicted by burning liquid poured on, dripping into my eyes.
Pushed under the shower's cold deluge,
I washed away my tears,
for my hair, for my yesterday.

She was four years old when the war ended, and her grandmother came to claim her. Reunion with her mother would take a while longer. She was recuperating from the effects of starvation and other aspects of bodily ruin in the British-run displaced persons hospital.

Laughing conspiratorially, Steinmetz drew me into her memory: "I didn't know she was my grandmother. I didn't recognize her. But I let her hug me, because then I could keep eating the raisins she had in her paper bag. In the orphanage, I was always so hungry."

She writes of the experience in her poem, Raisin Nagyamama (Grandmother):

I left the orphanage with her
Not daring to ask does she have more
Food for me to eat?
How long will this new stranger
Keep me?
Where am I going?
Who am I?

It hadn't really occurred to me, so used to thinking of the Holocaust in over-reaching terms, that children like her had to begin again from ground zero of near starvation.

Steinmetz's poetry reminds me of the lines in Czeslaw Milosz's Ars Poetica:

The purpose of poetry is to remind us/ how difficult it is to remain one person.

By remembering for one, Steinmetz remembers for many. She was never much interested in poetry. She comes to poetry through the roots of her own tree.

It is an unusual tree even for a Holocaust survivor. When the Hungarian Revolution broke out in 1956, Steinmetz found herself hiding from Soviet troops in the same basement she and her mother had hid from the Germans.

Her mother was living with her second husband in Sopron on the Austro-Hungarian border, over 200 kilometres away, so Steinmetz again had to endure maternal separation. In 1957, the family migrated to America, where Steinmetz eventually married a Holocaust survivor and raised a son and a daughter.

Sitting with her, whose poems are unpublished, made me realize how forgettable much of our published poetry is by comparison.

The unashamed nakedness of memory (I majored in survival/at the university of pain), poetry's terrible sacred room is her literary home.

Steinmetz has read her poems at the Fifth Avenue Synagogue in New York. Poems of hers were also read two years ago at the Lincoln Square Synagogue on Tisha b'Av, also in New York. I find it apt that she is a poet in the great oral tradition, telling her epic story in verse to her community. Because she holds no literary title or reputation, and comes across as quite ordinary, she makes it easy for you to hear her story, to climb into her skin, to contemplate the randomness that turned her from potential char heap to storyteller.

"In my poems, there is only what I saw with my own eyes. For many people, their memories of childhood were visits to the park, playing on a swing. For me, it was looking out the window of the orphanage and seeing a man hanging from a tree," she said. "Years later, during the revolution, again I saw men hanging from trees shot to death. I still have nightmares that the Germans are going to come and kill me and hang me from a tree."

Raised in a secular family estranged from Jewish orthodoxy, Steinmetz became religious as she grew older. Faith, like a life fully lived, fell into her category of sweet revenge against Hitler. She was like a partisan who insisted on fighting her singular guerrilla war long after the war was over.

Her poem, You Up There, documents her evolution from a faith of reaction to a faith of reflection:

Walking in the path of Your protection
I did not run away
But leave my footprints.

I asked Steinmetz about the reliability of memory after so many years.

"Can you imagine what it was like, being left by your mother in an orphanage, among strangers, during a war, at the age of three? Every day was a nightmare. Wouldn't you remember?" she said.

We did not understand a thing only the feeling of endurance and loss in the silence of hidden tears...

Happy Chanukah!

Find a hidden Jewish history lesson in Sicily

Bill Genova
Special to The CJN

Jews have been in Sicily since the second century BCE, however, unlike in the north of Italy, Spain and other areas, there are no prominent physical signs from which you could infer that Jews once inhabited this island, located just off the boot of Italy in the Mediterranean.

In 1492, just before the Spanish Expulsion (Sicily was then part of the Spanish Empire), up to 50,000 Jews may have been living there, centred not just in the cities of Palermo, Messina, Trapani and Siracusa, but in more than 50 towns.

From the eighth to 15th centuries Jews survived through good times and bad under the many occupiers of Sicily. They were active in the silk and cloth trade and in the practice of medicine. The majority were artisans – weavers, dyers, cobblers, silver workers, jewelry workers, blacksmiths and carpenters. There were also philosophers, doctors and advisers to whoever was in power.

One can see throughout Sicily signs of the past, from the initial aboriginal people, Phoenician, Greek, Roman, Arab, Norman, Swabians, Argonese/Spanish and even American and English, but there's no Jewish indication in sight.

Bill Genova, left, with Josephine Asaro, a Sicilian guide, and Filippo Ganci, president of the Jewish Return Committee, stand by a Jewish monument in Salemi, Sicily.

No synagogue, ghetto or building could readily be indentified as Jewish. But this is beginning to change.

Sicilians are now making an effort formally and informally to discover their Jewish past. Numerous hidden objects, hidden places, little centres and hamlets that were once home to Jews are now being rediscovered.

With Pope John Paul II reaching out to the Jews by his visit to Rome's synagogue and the retraction of the idea that Jews were the Christ killers, an atmosphere of interest now prevails.

To this end, scholars, archeologists, communities and amateurs are increasingly uncovering the Jewish past of Sicily.

If you visit Syracuse you will find in the main courtyard to the new Bellomo Gallery three sizable Jewish tombstones from the 15th century. Fifteen years ago in this same city when a building was being renovated, they discovered a mikvah that is now thought to be the oldest in Europe. In Palermo, signs indicating the district where the Jews had lived are posted in Italian, Hebrew and Arabic. Also in Palermo, in the Zisa, a summer Norman palace, you will find a tablet written in four languages – including Hebrew. In Erice's museum you will find a menorah on a clay lamp. In 1992, the town of Salemi issued a proclamation inviting the Jews who had been expelled some 500 years before in 1492 to return. They erected a marker with Jewish writing to emphasize that Jews were welcome.

In Spain, out of 200,000 Jews, 150,000 accepted banishment rather than convert to Christianity. In Sicily, a different story unfolded. Scholars believe that most of those leaving were poorer Jews while the richer Jews, not wanting to leave their property and good lives, opted to stay and converted, some turning their back on their Jewish past and others continuing their Judaism in a hidden manner.

In Salemi, of the 30 Jewish families, only four families opted to leave, a special case and not typical. In San Marco, 723 out of 728 Jews preferred to leave. In Castronovo 120 of 130. Who knows how many people of Jewish origin walk among Sicilians without knowing anything about their Jewish ancestors?

When the expulsion edict came down, the Spanish viceroy did not want to see the Jewish communities leave the island. At first, he delayed the edict and petitioned the Spanish king and queen not to enforce it. He was joined by many of the aristocracy and business interests in Sicily.

But, on Jan. 12, 1493, the Jews left. There are recorded stories of Christian friends weeping at the docks as their Jewish friends left by ship for Calabria, Greece or North Africa. Some even went to Rome, where the pope surprisingly adopted a protective attitude toward the new arrivals. Sicilians did not share Spain's severe damnation of Jews.

The tempo of interest in Sicily's Jewish past continues to increase with scholarly research and tours now being offered. Recently in Salemi, in the province of Trapani, a convention was organized to discuss the historical importance of Jewish communities in Sicily. The week-long convention, attended by important Catholic and lay personalities, represented a solid beginning that continues to grow with the help of documents in archives and libraries throughout Sicily.

The Jews in the recent past did return to Sicily and made a brief return on the eve of World War II, but the population left or were interned. Today, there are Jews once again in Sicily, and with some detective work, you can contact them in Palermo and Siracusa in order to attend services.

Jewish tours are offered by Rabbi Barbara Aiello and Bill Genova of Genova Tours. Visit genovatours.com for more info.

They go bowling and on picnics. They play billiards and get together for potlucks. They go out to dinner.

Food plays a big role. After all, breaking bread figures large in all social interaction.

Getting to know one another socially, whether over a dish of baba ghanoush or a pool table, is the point of a group called Shalom-Salaam Toronto. Formed in 2008 in the wake of Israel's Operation Cast Lead incursion into Gaza, its mission statement is self-explanatory:

"Before Canadian Arabs and Jews can stand as one for peace and justice, we need to overcome racism, prejudice, intolerance and animosity which have accumulated in our communities. The first step of our program is to provide an opportunity for Arabs, Jews and Muslims to interact in an atmosphere that promotes learning about each other as human beings rather than as creatures with exceptionally strong political opinions and inadvertent tendencies to discount suffering of the other side."

Put another way, it becomes harder to shut out, hurt or kill someone you have come to know, maybe even like. Seeing "the other" as human is the first step to peace, or at least, tolerance, members believe.

There's no heavy lifting here, no heated debate about Palestinians, Jewish settlements or the peace process. Being distanced from the Middle East conflict "allows us, at least theoretically, to be more objective," the group says. "We need to overcome our tribal mentality and openly acknowledge suffering the other side is experiencing."

With close to 300 members – even that term seems too formal; they're more like Facebook friends – the group has grown precisely because it avoids the standard controversies.

"There are so many other groups out there that debate," said Shalom-Salaam co-founder Urz Heer, a 44-year-old Muslim. "We wanted to talk about the issues but we really wanted an end-goal in mind, and that was that we all want peace in the Middle East. We wanted to figure out how to navigate those discussions with that goal in mind. We've had people who have said, 'I want to tell everyone why I'm right.' This group is not for them." This evening, 23 members meet and chat in a Turkish restaurant in Downsview over plates of hummus and Mideast salads.

They seem evenly divided between Jews and Muslims, with a smattering of Christians, and hail from a host of countries: Jordan, Algeria, Israel, Albania, Bangladesh, Egypt, South Africa. The atmosphere is cordial, even fun.

One by one, they rise, introduce themselves and state the reasons for their presence, which are remarkably similar. Starting from a position of empathy and shedding hidebound biases are common themes.

"We're very grassroots," explains Heer, who works for a local member of Parliament. "We don't have a consulate or government backing us. Through meeting like us, we've established a lot of friendships. Sometimes the conversation has been heated. There has been crying tears of joy, tears of sadness. But this is how we grow a grassroots movement. This is how we grow as people."

She calls it taking "baby steps."

Not an issues based group

The CJN asks whether the group believes Israel should exist as a Jewish state, and whether it supports the boycott, sanctions and divestment campaign.

"It has not been a conversation topic," Heer replies.

There's been discussion, she adds, on whether Israel and the Palestinian territories "should be one state, two or even three states. [But] I don't think anyone has said Israel should not exist. I think we all have the understanding that Israel is a state."

As for the BDS movement, "it's never come up."

She concedes it all sounds a bit soft and fluffy.

"We're not an issues-based group. We want to find ways to co-exist, here and abroad. We have an elephant in the room. We just have not yet acknowledged it. Our meetings have been a mix of social and conversation. Once you break down social barriers, it's easier to get to the hard issues."

The group aims for social get-togethers monthly. At quarterly meetings, usually held in a meeting-room environment, discussions on the Mideast conflict itself are moderated "so that everyone continues to grow in respect and understanding for the views of others," explains Shalom-Salaam co-founder Steven Holt.

But even socially, strong views are not avoided. One South African woman, who said she was raised in "a very conservative Jewish" family, now believes she was "brainwashed" into holding certain views about the Israeli narrative. Another South African Jewish woman laments that a close relative has called her a "self-hating Jew" for her participation in the group.

There are no comparable stories from the Muslims in the room.

But they're mirrored by Holt, who told those gathered that he started the group because "I just couldn't stand it anymore. I couldn't stand reading the paper and feeling powerless to do anything.

"I grew up in a family where Jews were always right and everybody else was 'them.' There was a subtle understanding that we were the good guys and always did the right thing."

Holt, 59, related that while travelling in Morocco, "some people actually wanted to kill me because I was Jewish. So I've experienced that level of irrational hate."

He repeated that this is not a forum for debate. And Holt is content to put Middle East history behind him.

"I don't really have to know about what's happened in the past so much. I know that's a contentious statement. I know terrible things have happened on both sides. We could watch and argue for hundreds and thousands more years. Or we can just say 'I've had enough.'

"This is huge and simple. It doesn't take much."

RISING STARS: Religious Jewish singers, Gil, left, and Arie Gat are achieving fame for their performance of Simon and Garfunkel's The Sound of Silence on the Israeli TV show The Rising Star. While performing mainstream music on television might seem less than kosher for such observant Jews, these guys say it's all good. "We checked out the whole issue of participating in the show in Jewish law," Arie said. "It's not like we jumped into rumbling waters without checking the temperature. From the perspective of Jewish law, there's no problem with what we are doing." That said, the brothers, who don't own TVs themselves, haven't told their children about what they're doing. Most of their friends and neighbours are in the dark as well.

Stars visit Israel on cultural and historical tour

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel 21C

"I'd love to be in a romantic comedy in Tel Aviv because we had an amazing nightlife there, or maybe I could play Cleopatra at Masada," mused Sullivan & Son co-star Vivian Bang on the final day of her first trip to Israel.

Bang was part of a Hollywood contingent of visitors led by veteran actress Lea Thompson (Switched at Birth, Back to the Future) and Thompson's husband, director Howard Deutch, under the auspices of America's Voices in Israel, a project of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

The cultural, historical and religious adventure also included C.S. Lee, co-star of the cult hit TV series Dexter; and Anson Mount, lead actor in the TV show Hell on Wheels; as well as Thompson and Deutch's daughters – Zoey Deutch, star of the forthcoming movie adaptation of Vampire Academy: Blood Sisters; and Madelyn Deutch, a musician and screenwriter.

Guided by America's Voices for Israel director Irwin Katsof and hosted by the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Ministry of Tourism, El Al Israel Airlines, David InterContinental and Inbal Hotels, the group toured the Golan Heights and Gaza border regions, explored Israel's high-tech and boutique wine industries, visited Masada and the Old City of Jerusalem, and partied long into the night in Tel Aviv.

Lee was mobbed by Israeli admirers wherever he went. "I had no idea Dexter was so popular in Israel," said the Korean-American actor. "It was great meeting all the fans."

Speaking with members of the press at the Inbal in Jerusalem, each participant told ISRAEL21c there had been surprising elements about the tour – from the "resort vibe of the beaches" (Howard Deutch) to the consistently excellent wines (Lee).

"I was surprised by how much everyone enjoys their life here," says Madelyn Deutch. "My sister observed that people burn their candles here and eat their candies. In [Los Angeles,] we hide our nuts like squirrels and don't enjoy our day-to-day as much as Israelis do."

Her mom was amazed by "the diversity of experiences you can have here in such a short time – swimming in the Mediterranean and the Dead Sea, all the museums, the desert, so many interesting people and perspectives.

"There is such an ancient feeling here that speaks to your heart in a way that no other place that I've ever been has."

For Bang, a visit to the new media

C.S.Lee who portrayed Vince Masuka on the TV show Dexter was one of a group of actors who visited Israel.

department of the Israel Defence Forces shattered her "grim misconception" about the military in Israel.

"I didn't realize that going into the army here is actually kind of like a college where you get placed in different groups and learn different skills," she told ISRAEL21c.

"It was so refreshing to meet these really intelligent young people from all over the world, coming to make a difference. We met people from New Jersey, Chicago, New Zealand, Belgium, France – all so smart and so enthusiastic, showing us their Twitter sites and Facebook sites. The army here is more like an educational process."

Mount related that what most impressed him was "the clearly visible effects of responsible land use. When you go to the Golan Heights, where they have a very proud wine business, and then you go to the Syrian border, you can very clearly see the dividing line between Israel and Syria due to the colour. Israel has cultivated green, while Syria is still brown. It makes you realize this is really fertile territory and I had no idea about that."

The Hell on Wheels lead actor got introduced to the Israeli film industry by viewing the Academy Award-nominated Footnote en route to Israel. "I will make a concerted effort to see more Israeli films," pledged Mount, who said Israel had long been on his "top five" list of new places to visit.

Madelyn Deutch, who just completed a screenplay to star her sister, said she would love to do some of the shooting in Israel.

"Parts of Tel Aviv would double for New York insanely well," she said. "There's a similar vibe and urban feel. It would be awesome to shoot some exteriors for my new film there."

Visit the Culinary Bazaar at the First Station

Sybil Kaplan
Special to The CJN

In September 1892, the Jerusalem train station opened as the first and last stop of the Jerusalem-Jaffa line. It closed in 1998 and the station offices, ticket office and hall and its 3,000-square-metre concourse sat deserted until "First Station" was renovated and restored this past year.

The site opened in May and is a venue for seven eateries, a family bazaar, a design fair for 30 designers, a running shoes store, an activity centre for children and a visitors store plus a myriad of activities running seven days a week.

For those interested in food, a tour of the kosher Culinary Bazaar is a must. Nir Zook, the 37-year-old Israeli-born chef, was our guide. Zook has worked in restaurants in Israel, France and the United States since the age of 13 and currently owns three restaurants in Jaffa – Cordelia, upscale, candlelit and romantic, its little sister Noa and the Jaffa Bar.

When Avi Murdoch, partner in the management team and entrepreneur, created the idea of making the old train station a centre for culture and food, he approached Zook with the idea of a culinary bazaar in what was once the storage room for goods being shipped to Tel Aviv.

On the patio is a seating area with clever stools made from used tires with grass-like seats, and a wonderful wagon with hot corn on the cob cooking. A restaurant will also soon open opposite this area.

Next to the seating area is a bar with drinks and produce for sale on one side as well as a candy bar with at least 27 different candies, nine spices and 28 dried fruit, nuts and snack varieties.

On the opposite side of the bar, is the booth of Michal Havirian and her husband from Moshav Nocham (near Bet Shemesh, 15 miles from Jerusalem). The booth sells 50 to 60 different kinds of organic produce, freshly picked for only a day's sales. Kale, baby leeks, lettuces and other vegetables are sold in their natural state with their leaves attached. Particularly tasty was the raw corn on the cob and the Napoli pumpkin.

Inside the old building are 10 kiosks, including a booth where fresh falafel and hummus is sold. Next is Itzhik, who sells 150 to 200 kosher cheeses and 150 different kinds of wine from 30 wineries around Jerusalem plus one from the Golan. Itzhik also operates a cheese and olive stall in Jerusalem's produce market, Machaneh Yehudah.

Another shop sells pots and pans imported from France; it will soon sell knives and operate a knife-sharpening service.

Nir Elimelech operates a fish shop. On the day we visited, he had sea bream, striped bass, red mullet and grouper delivered twice a day, and imported salmon from Norway, delivered twice a week. Oriental condiments to go with the fish are also for sale. Soon fishing accessories will be available, and one can organize a fishing trip with him.

Another stall sells halvah, techinah and baklava, and at the pizza/pasta stand, one can eat or buy fresh pasta to take home.

Gruda's Bakery, made by Leon Gruda, pastry chef, has breads, cakes, tortes, cookies, quiches and croissants to eat here or take home, or, as they say in Israel, "take away."

At Daskalide's, one can buy one Belgian chocolate out of the 30 varieties offered or buy entire boxes. Chocolate chips, all sizes of gifts items and gift baskets are also available.

Tom runs the coffee shop, Café Barista, where beans are roasted. One can drink the house coffee, made from five different kinds of beans, or take home a bag of coffee.

For ice coffee enthusiasts, the beans are soaked in water for 24 hours then separated and the liquid strained. This is poured over crushed ice resulting in a wonderful tasting cold coffee.

Snacking in the Culinary Bazaar is a fun experience; wandering through the bazaar to buy foods for home is definitely an entertaining and enjoyable time one wants to repeat on a regular basis.

Vignettes from a visit to Israel

Synagogues, parking tickets and ancient history

Donald Carr
CJN President

The new synagogue:

A very few kilometres north of the Egyptian border, about the same distance to the east from the Gaza Strip – not far from where Gilad Schalit had been kidnapped – the paved, but pretty well deserted road bears a signpost pointing to Bnai Netzarim. There's nothing but rolling sand to the right and to the left.

There is a bend in the road and before us are fields of green with tented hothouses stretching in ordered lines, parting the sea of sand.

Yes, these hothouses are of the same design and purposes as those left behind in Gaza in the area known as Gush Kativ, by the inhabitants of Moshav Netzarim, who were uprooted when Sharon's government voluntarily "withdrew" everyone from Gaza. That was intended as a token of good faith towards the Palestinian Authority.

Those hothouses, with the latest technology in growing crops, which were exported to Europe, were the ones wantonly and foolishly destroyed by the Gaza Arabs. Whether they wanted no part of the available means to pull themselves out of their abject poverty, or whether their mindset did not permit them to use what Israeli ingenuity and cutting edge agricultural knowledge could yield for them, nobody knows.

We turn to the left and, suddenly, before us are paved roads and curbs, laid out in a way reminiscent of a new North York subdivision. However, there are no newly built houses. Dotted among the roadways are those tasteless, utilitarian, oblong, white pre-fabs, which one could always see across the Israel of the 1950s and 1960s.

Children's toys, clotheslines, some parked cars, an empty playpen here and there. A mother, enfolding a baby in her arm and holding onto an older child, who clings to a third and a fourth – a natural chain of family progression.

This is Bnei Netzarim – the children of Netzarim. Here, many of the former members of Gaza's Netzarim, their children and their children's children resettled together – determined against what seem like overwhelming odds, they established new roots – literally. Bit by bit, they carved out a new home and a new source of bounty, which they and their predecessors had proven could be drawn from what looked like a barren and heartless territory, with the sun beating down from a cloudless sky.

"Lucky that you weren't here yesterday," says one of our hosts. "We had one of our real sandstorms."

We turn another corner and see, standing on different lots, a few partially built and some completed, modern, one-storey concrete homes.

The site of an ancient temple built by Herod in honour of the emperor Augustus at Sebastia National Park.

This is a religious community. One of the first permanent buildings had been the school, which had served as a place of worship.

The purpose of our visit was not just to marvel at what had been achieved, but to attend the dedication of a new synagogue – a chanukat ha'beit knesset – with some connection to Toronto.

On the edge of the community – literally rising from the sands – stood the modern structure, beautifully designed and overlooking the whole moshav.

The dilemma of getting a parking permit in Israel

The Toronto connection? With the constant aid and encouragement of World Mizrachi – embodied, of course, in that resolute octogenarian, Kurt Rothschild, who recently made aliyah from Toronto – funds had been provided from four sources.

First, a family from Florida provided some "seed money." Next, the estate of Freda Fejer, a survivor of the Shoah and long-time resident of Toronto, had donated a substantial amount for the construction. The family of the late Herb Green, a well-known Toronto developer and philanthropist, had provided the funds for the most beautiful, modern Aron Kodesh and bimah, finished in exquisite polished and carved wood. Finally, a bank had extended a loan, which ensured the completion of the building – money which the moshav will have to repay.

After the affixing of the mezuzah to the main entrance doors, the community and guests moved into the main prayer hall, designed to accommodate many hundreds of worshipers.

As visiting dignitaries spoke, I looked around. From the soaring ceiling a cluster of modern decorated glass cubes of light cascaded above the bimah. The balcony railing is a delicate fretwork, depicting many designs, behind a glass frontispiece. Light streamed in from three-storey high windows, adding to the illumination from the recessed ceiling fixtures.

Typical of so many Israeli synagogues, the seating is in movable lines, with a comfortable "theatre-type" seat, a hinged wooden book rest in front, covering a deep recess to store siddurim, chumashim and, perhaps, tallitot.

This community of genuine agronomists, agriculturalists, farmers, students and quiet torchbearers of "Torah" has arisen again from the desolation which most would regard as an unyielding, useless scrap of land. As they did from Gaza, they are exporting bumper crops of fruits and vegetables to Britain, to Germany and – hard to imagine – potatoes to Russia.

These are today's Israeli chalutzim, or pioneers, "settlers", in the most positive of terms.

Jerusalem parking permits:

Those who have read my earlier accounts, will recall that in order to park in the square in front of the apartment building where we live, one has to have a municipal parking permit on the car's windshield. Otherwise – ticket!

Originally, unless you owned the car, there was no way of getting a permit. Thus, if you had a rental car, you either parked a long way away or got a ticket.

Latterly, the municipality started issuing permits for rented cars, so long as you brought into the appropriate office the car's official licence, your rental agreement, your passport and your driver's licence. You then got a permit for the rental period. If you wanted a permit in the future, you had to remember to peel the permit off the windshield before returning the car and keep it in a safe place. It had to be produced with the other documents next time.

We arrived in Israel during chol hamoed Sukkot. In Jerusalem, nearly all businesses close for the whole of Sukkot. So does city hall. Thus, no permit. But parking tickets still get issued during chol hamoed Sukkot. What to do?

The Byzantine Church in ancient Sebastia. Some Christians believe it's the site of John the Baptist's beheading.

Our good friend and former Torontonian, Stephen Glazer, has a position with the City of Jerusalem, similar to that of an ombudsman. He scratched his head and spoke to someone who manned the emergency city hall phone. The only hopeful solution was for him to write a long essay in Hebrew – for me to place in the car window – describing my predicament and promising to get a permit as soon as city hall opened after Sukkot. The parking officer was supposed to read it and desist from ticketing my rental car.

It worked!

Excavations have revealed vestiges of the kings' palace

Sukkot ended on Thursday. City hall did not open on Friday. Then there was Shabbat.

Early Sunday morning I went to the appropriate office, but the computer was down. After a half hour, it was up and running and I took my documents to the proper booth.

The policeman there looked at the papers, then at the computer screen.

"You are turning the car back on Friday," he said. I agreed.

"That's less than one week," he said, "and we can only issue permits for a week or longer."

I started to tear out some of my remaining hair. I was back in a catch-22 .

I, quietly, full of control, pointed out my inability to get the permit on any of those eight or nine days that the office was closed. He stared at me. He thought for a while. I was afraid that he was going to ask someone else in the office and that we would have one of those long debates. "I suppose it's OK," he said, with a frown. I got the "short term" permit.

Sebastia:

Sebastia is an Arab village, with orchards and buildings sprinkled along a steep hillside in Shomron, about eight kilometres from Nablus (the biblical Shechem). Quite unremarkable in itself, its highest reaches lead, by way of an unpaved, rock-strewn track, to the remains of a city first built in 879 BCE.

This city – the capital of Israel – was referred to in several places in the Book of Kings and was captured and occupied, successively, by Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, Hasmoneans, Romans and Byzantines.

There has been construction, destruction, rebuilding, further devastation and yet more rebuilding over a period of almost 1,000 years, making this one of the most interesting sites of the Israel National Parks Authority.

Excavations have revealed vestiges of the palace and fortress of the kings of Israel. Superimposed on those are the remains of Hellenistic walls and round towers. What are most evident are the later Roman walls, columns, towers, colonnades, theatre, temple and stadium.

There's a two-person performance in what is left of the Roman theatre during the day. Two actors, dressed in period costume, engage in a 15-minute humorous dialogue in Hebrew, expounding – I am told – on the times which they are meant to represent.

A performance was given while we were there. Only our son, daughter-in-law and our grandchildren could understand it. We took their word on what it was about.

Sebastia
National Park

Sebastia National Park is one of the most interesting sites of the Israel National Parks Authority.

Walking back to the parking lot when it was over, we were passed by one of the actors, on his way to the refreshment bar. Just at that time, I was wondering out loud how many performances a day were presented.

"Five," he said, overhearing me. Even in his costume, as he spoke and half turned around, he seemed familiar. I suddenly realized that he was the same actor, who, last year, appeared in flowing white robes as a Samaritan at the top of Har Gerizim, the ancient home of the Samaritans on the other side of Nablus, and about whom I had written last year.

He, too, recognized us. He had been a youth leader in the past and had visited Camp Ramah in Ontario, knew Toronto well and had pleasant memories of visiting Beth Tzedec Congregation.

As I waited in the parking lot for the rest of the family, who inevitably had to visit the gift store, I noticed a number of Arab men were gathering in front of a square-shaped single-storey building, which stood at the top of the village and flew a Palestinian flag.

The Israeli army and border police squads, who constantly patrol this area, also saw what was happening. They all sauntered slowly from their vehicles toward the building.

Don't make assumptions based on your predisposition

As the local group grew ominously larger, they were joined by a video cameraman, two youngsters, each holding large placards written in red and black Arabic letters, as well as by someone with a microphone and a loudspeaker.

In response to the one with the loudspeaker, the group started to chant in time. The youths held up their placards, hoisting them up and down. The cameraman started to record everything, exhorting the crowd to shout louder and move closer to each other.

What was going to happen? I looked over at the young soldiers and policemen. They were now standing in a rough, widely-spaced semicircle, facing the demonstrators. They did nothing to interfere and made no threatening moves. They seemed, like me, to be interested spectators, although their weapons and shoulder mounted radios somehow belied such innocence. I expected some move.

However, the demonstration was over as quickly as it started and the men started to disperse. The Israelis moved off, in groups of two or three, to resume their patrolling.

Knowing full well that the Arabs had been demonstrating against Israeli "occupation," I asked one of the teen-aged soldiers what it had all been about.

"They are," he said, "complaining about the Palestinian Authority, which is preventing them from expanding or building houses in their village."

The moral to my story? Don't make assumptions based on your predisposition, learned from television and the newspapers.

As I said, it was chol hamoed Sukkot and our family had packed a lunch, hoping that we might find a sukkah in one of the Jewish communities dotted around Samaria.

Our granddaughter, Aliza, on leave from Israel Defence Forces, saw the soldiers and policemen in the middle of their hot, unrelenting eight-hour shift. They were unsheltered from the blazing sun. They were perspiring and covered in dust. She turned to her father and pointed out how unlikely it was that we would find a sukkah and that we would probably have to wait until we got back to Jerusalem to eat. She strongly suggested that we give our bottled drinks, which were on ice, as well as our cookies, to the soldiers and policemen. They gratefully accepted those gifts and made short shrift of them.

It was another example of how the populace looks upon its people's army and the bond linking all Israelis.

Education a common theme for adult bar and bat mitzvahs

Lila Sarick
CJN Staff

Some never had a bat mitzvah because they were girls, while some were raised in non-Jewish or thoroughly secular homes. For others, a family trauma pre-empted the ritual coming of age. And still others want a re-do, to approach the milestone with the wisdom and intention of an adult, not a newly minted teenager.

The motivations for adults to become bar and bat mitzvah are as varied and numerous as the individuals themselves.

Bar and bat mitzvah programs for adults are found in every stream of Judaism, reflecting the diversity of Jewish education. Nearly every participant says the experience of becoming a bar or bat mitzvah as an adult is a profoundly emotional event.

Of course, rabbis point out, Jews become bar and bat mitzvah simply by turning 12 or 13 years old. But that doesn't mean that adults long past braces and teenage awkwardness aren't hungering to reach the milestone, but on their own terms.

Debbie Gilbert, 58, celebrated her bat mitzvah 18 years ago at Congregation Darchei Noam, a Reconstructionist synagogue.

"I have two daughters who were approaching their own bat mitzvahs, and I felt I should go first," she said.

"As a woman claiming equal ritual opportunity, I needed to step up and take on the obligation. It was an opportunity to claim our place in Judaism."

Undertaking an adult bat mitzvah (the majority of participants are women) is a rigorous process. At Darchei Noam, and other liberal synagogues, students typically attend a year-long class, participate in a Shabbaton, do a tikkun olam project and prepare to lead the Shabbat morning service, including reading Torah and a Haftorah, and delivering a sermon.

Gilbert recalls her group's bat mitzvah fondly.

"The sanctuary was overflowing. It was a time of men and women celebrating together. It was not a ceremony of anger, it was not a ceremony of bitterness. It was sweet, dancing with the Torah."

At Darchei Noam, Rabbi Tina Grimberg interviews candidates and then designs the curriculum around what they wish to learn and the gaps in their education.

"It builds Jewish knowledge, it links people to their ancestral tradition as well as contemporary realities," she said.

The program also builds community, she said. "Many people walk away with very special friendships... People have become more involved in synagogue and had transformative life experiences."

Gilbert's class has remained close and annually marks the anniversary of their Chanukah bat mitzvah with a group aliyah at the Shabbat-morning service.

Adult ceremonies demand commitment

"The seed was planted 18 years ago, but it continues on for me today," Gilbert said. "It's been a marvellous journey for me."

It was the educational component of Darchei Noam's program that attracted Sid Markowski, 55, to become a bar mitzvah for the second time last year.

"I felt at the time [of his first bar mitzvah] it was just learning the reading. I was pretty nervous and anxious."

This time around, he led Friday-night services at Baycrest as part of the group's tikkun olam project, and studied with his wife, who did not have a bat mitzvah as a teenager.

His class of 18 men and women now continues to meet monthly and studies together.

At Chabad of Markham, Goldie Plotkin teaches a bat mitzvah class for women that also emphasizes Jewish education.

"The class was formed as a response to women's desires. They were lacking in Jewish education and they felt their children knew more than they did," Plotkin says.

She took the curriculum offered by the beit din for potential converts and added her own personal insights and weekly homework assignments.

"I didn't just teach it how it was taught at Mount Sinai. I tried to make it real and practical for their lives as mothers and daughters," she said.

"When we did Pesach, we spoke about what does maror mean to us today. We make the whole of Judaism become alive and practical in our life in 2013."

The program culminates with a Shabbat weekend in Crown Heights, N.Y., and a ceremony in the synagogue where women speak about what they learned.

Michelle Benjamin, 35, remembers the ceremony being a very emotional day.

Her father died just before she was to have her bat mitzvah when she was 12, and her grieving family didn't celebrate the milestone.

"I had lost that opportunity when I was 12... and I felt this was my second chance."

Now married, with a young family of her own, Benjamin took the course with her mother-in-law. "I could be a role model to my family. No matter what age you are, you can always learn more about your Yiddishkeit."

Michelle Illiatovitch, 67, embraces that philosophy. Raised in an Orthodox home, she says she could never find her place in Judaism. After being estranged from synagogue life for more than three decades, she recently joined the City Shul, a newly formed Reform synagogue in downtown Toronto.

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, founder of the City Shul, said she expects her adult bar and bat mitzvah candidates to regularly attend services on Shabbat, learn to read Torah and lead services during the year-long course.

"I'm really stressing for them to say, 'I really can be counted on. I have the skills to help the community thrive.'"

For Illiatovitch, the idea of having a bat mitzvah as an adult was appealing, but she admits she is "terrified" when she thinks about the upcoming date in May that has been selected for the group to lead Shabbat services.

"When this was offered I became very interested and very nervous at the same time," she said. "We've had three classes so far, and I feel like it's a homecoming. I feel like I'm getting taught something I can grapple with."

Jamaican Jew doesn't fit the usual stereotypes

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

When Rivka Campbell was still in high school, she started to become curious about her Jewish heritage. It wasn't something that often came up in her day-to-day life. Her family wasn't particularly observant, but she knew she was Jewish on her mother's side, going all the way back to the Sephardi expulsion from Spain 500 years ago.

Rivka Campbell

At 18, she considered visiting Israel as part of her process of self-exploration; she had already visited her parents' homeland, Jamaica, on numerous occasions.

But, as the old saying goes, life is what happens while you're busy making other plans. In her early 20s she married and had two children.

"It was not until my marriage broke apart that I had to find out more about who I was, as a Jew, to find out what it was to be a Jew," she said.

"I also felt I owed it to [my children] to tell them the whole family history."

It would take a couple of decades before Campbell would make the trip to Israel, but in the interim she did re-discover her roots and she began to live a more actively Jewish lifestyle. She enrolled her children in Jewish school. She attended synagogue regularly, she became a passionate advocate for Israel and the Jewish people and, in her explorations of her multifaceted identity, she found many others who don't fit any stereotype of what a Jew should look like.

It turns out, there are lots of people like Campbell, Jews of many colours and backgrounds, who are claiming their place among the Jewish people – and some who are wannabes.

After attending a lecture by a self-proclaimed "black Hebrew" from Chicago, she discovered the group wasn't what it appeared and that its Facebook page was misleading.

"I call it the 'black and treif group.' They were missionaries, Hebrew Israelites. They were trying to convert Jews. Oy, oy, oy, I got so sick of it."

Instead of merely complaining, Campbell started her own Facebook group called "A Minority Within a Minority – Jews of Colour."

"It's open to Jews of colour and also to people who have Jews of colour in their family, and people who are interested."

With about 300 members, "it's really active," she said.

The site includes many posts on Torah study, Israel and on Jews who don't necessarily resemble Ashkenazim.

Articles recently posted on the site included a fascinating look at the Lemba of South Africa, the Abayudaya in Uganda and the more familiar Jews of Ethiopia.

There's a link to a photo essay featuring Jews who do not fit any stereotypical mold; there's a section on "Debating Judaism;" another about Israel; and there's one called, "Black and Jewish – Jews of color."

It's a rainbow coalition of the People of the Book.

Campbell's interest in Torah studies was cemented during her one year in Israel, which she managed to visit a couple of decades after she'd envisioned it.

While living in Arad, she attended Chabad "shiurim" and "I enjoyed it a lot."

Not only were the lessons themselves fulfilling, but she said she gets the fewest questions from religious Jews. "They must figure I belong there, or why would I be there."

In Toronto, when she attended services at a large Conservative shul, she experienced something quite different. Once on Kol Nidre eve, she felt "a tap on the shoulder." A woman sitting behind her "asked where I'm from, if I was Ethiopian and do I come here often. I pretty much said to her I come here on a regular basis. I almost said if you came here on a regular basis you'd know that too."

Campbell admits the incident made her feel uncomfortable. "The assumption in that question is 'you don't belong, so why are you here?' It's not a welcoming question.

"I have black, brown Jewish friends who would be put off if they hear that question.

"It's not easy to fit into the Toronto Jewish community when you look different," she added.

'We're Jews too...'

Campbell – "it's spelled like the soup," she said – has found that humour can deflect some of the more irritating questions posed to people like herself. When she's asked if she converted, her reply might be, "No, I'm still Jewish."

Another that she's adopted from a video-maker in New York answers the question, "How are you Jewish?" with the quip, "I'm fine, thank you. How are you, Jewish?"

"It's a question that Ashkenazi Jews don't get," she said.

Campbell is now working on a video to highlight the diversity of the Jewish people.

"The purpose of my video work is not to bitch and moan. It is to say, this is our reality. We are different. That's one of the beautiful things about being Jewish."

"Given that we as a people are scattered throughout the world, why is it unusual to find people with brown hair, dark curls, Asian [looking]?"

In the broader community, she's rarely asked about being black and Jewish. Instead, the questions she gets are about the religion itself. She was often the go-to person for answers on things Jewish when she worked as a nurse at North York General Hospital.

Living a Jewish lifestyle is something she strives for constantly, while returning to Israel remains high on her list of priorities.

Based on her experience there, she's often pushed back against the charge of Israel as an apartheid state. She's been barred from some Facebook pages because of her persistence. The irony is that "I can go anywhere in Israel except in Hebron, where a sign is posted [in the casbah], 'Jews are not allowed,'" she said.

"I get asked to defend Israel against the charges of apartheid... I will never say it's a racist country. I will tell you there's a lot of work that needs to be done."

One is an attitude that she believes was imported from the Diaspora, "that tends to rank Jews. That needs to be addressed."

"Progress will be shown. We're Jews. There shouldn't be ranking among Jews," she said.

As to her home in Toronto, Campbell wants others to remember, "we're Jews too. I think that's what I want people to understand.

"We all have a story."

Women sparking a Jewish sex-ed revolution

Julie Wiener
JTA

When Sarah Epstein returned home to Dallas after her first semester at Brandeis University, the modern Orthodox yeshiva graduate had some surprising news to share – she was undergoing 200 hours of training to become a peer sex educator.

"When I told my family at the dinner table, my older brother was like, 'Why couldn't you just join the tennis team?'" Epstein, now 23, recalls.

Epstein's family adapted as she went on to organize standing-room-only workshops at Brandeis for observant Jewish girls interested in learning more about their bodies and sexuality. Recently, together with Amy Beth Oppenheimer, a Jewish educator and founder of the website Jewrotica, Epstein launched Halachically Yours, a website with educational resources about sex and intimacy for observant Jews.

Encouraging open discussion and education

In the modern Orthodox world, where discussions of sex often have been taboo or confined to the logistics of marital intimacy laws, women like Epstein and Oppenheimer (as well as some men) are encouraging open discussion and education in a manner respectful of modesty and other religious considerations.

Meanwhile, in the more liberal community, another emerging group of female sex educators is trying to enrich discussions about sex and relationships by putting them in the framework of Jewish texts and values.

Halachically Yours, which includes lessons such as, "Halachah is important but so is pleasure" and, "Fantasies are normal and can be shared," comes amid a wealth of new sexual resources targeting Orthodox Jews. An Orthodox sex guide, The Newlywed's Guide to Intimacy, came out two years ago and was recently translated into Hebrew. Growing numbers of Orthodox day schools are using Life Values and Intimacy, a new sex-education curriculum. And in 2011 a website touting "kosher" sex toys – sold discreetly, without any explicit images – hung out its cyber-shingle.

What's spurring the Orthodox sex-ed revolution? In part, there seems to be a growing recognition that traditional pre-marriage classes don't offer enough information. There's also a perceived need for religiously sensitive alternatives to more explicit messages coming from the wider culture – and especially online.

"Instead of surfing the Internet and coming across all sorts of things observant people don't want to see or hear, we're making learning materials and resources framed in a halachically sensitive way accessible," Epstein said.

The growth of Jewishly inspired sex education is not limited to the Orthodox world.

Rabbi Jessica Minnen started a series of workshops on sex and relationships for Jews in their 20s and 30s as a fourth year rabbinical student at the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary. The workshops, called Seven Wells, use text study and role playing to help participants see the connection between their sexual and spiritual selves.

"Judaism gives us a framework for exploring who we are in ways that don't seem related to sex at all," Rabbi Minnen said. "We use Jewish concepts to frame all our workshops. For example, in a workshop about sexual boundaries, we're studying eruvim, the boundaries between public and private space."

While Seven Wells is still in its infancy, Rabbi Minnen hopes it will eventually grow into a national program training facilitators to run workshops in synagogues, JCCs, schools and living rooms. So far, says Rabbi Minnen, who also holds down a full-time job as assistant director of the Jewish Journey Project, Seven Wells has generated more interest than she has been able to accommodate – including from Orthodox Jews.

"To be in a position where you have too many people wanting to do your program than you can serve is a wonderful problem," she said.

Another relatively new Jewish sex-ed program, JLove and Values, focuses on a younger audience and takes a less text-heavy approach. Founded by Mara Yacobi, the program has workshops for teens about sexuality and relationships at the American Hebrew Academy boarding school in North Carolina and at various overnight camps.

"There's some Jewish content sprinkled in, but I want to make sure my audience's attention is captured," Yacobi said. "I don't want this to be about a study session, but a foundation of the information they need to keep themselves healthy."

A sex educator who has worked in public schools and for Planned Parenthood, Yacobi started JLove and Values because she wanted to be able to discuss the role of religion and Jewish values in sexual decision-making – and because her own day school experience growing up had been almost devoid of sex education.

Yacobi believes that easy access to pornography makes values-based sex education particularly important.

"A lot of times teens associate sex with every slang term in the book – all these degrading words," Yacobi said. "I try to impart that it's about intimacy, love, pleasure and holiness."

In this case, familiarity breeds contentment

"Those of us who live here are treated as guests, in the full sense of that word, and individual dignity is treasured in ways that are transparent and contagious."

"Fortunately, there is a wonderful little oasis in the heart of mid-town Toronto called Living Life on the Avenue: opened just two years ago, it has been acknowledged as the premier retirement residence in Toronto."

Christian Zionists to unveil Europe's largest chanukiyah

JTA

Christian Zionists in the Netherlands are building what they believe will be Europe's largest menorah as a Chanukah gift to the country's Jewish community.

The Chanukah candelabrum, or chanukiyah will be approximately 11 metres tall and made out of metal, said Sara van Oordt, who works at the Netherlands headquarters of the Christians for Israel organization. It will be placed near the group's offices in Nijkerk, 50 kilometres east of the Dutch capital.

"We think that this is a good way to show our support and solidarity for the Jewish community worldwide," van Oordt said.

Shaped like a Star of David, the giant candelabrum will have nine branches running along its top beam. According to Christians for Israel, it will be Europe's largest chanukiyah.

It is scheduled to be inaugurated at Nijkerk on the eve of Chanukah on Nov. 27 by Binyomin Jacobs, a chief rabbi of the Netherlands who has agreed to light the first candle of Chanukah at a public ceremony that is expected to draw several hundred people.

The chanukiyah cost just more than $30,000 to make and is currently being manufactured in Friesland in the northern Netherlands under the supervision of Arjen Lont, the Christian Zionist owner of a construction firm.

Lont, who also participated in the reconstruction of Jerusalem's Montefiore windmill last year, has sponsored a part of the chanukiyah's cost, according to van Oordt.

"We did not approach Jewish or Israeli businesses and donors, only Christian ones, because this is supposed to be our gift to the Jewish people," van Oordt said.

The five-ton chanukiyah will be transported in several parts from Friesland to Nijkerk.

Rabbi Jacobs told JTA that the Netherlands has several large menorahs and chanukiyot that became popular with local Jews and Christians about 10 years ago.

"Not everyone was enthusiastic at first, but they kept popping up," he said. "It brings people who would not normally celebrate Chanukah to partake and it shows the world in general that we, Jews, are also here and a part of this society."

Large menorahs or chanukiyot can be found in 18 Dutch cities, including Amsterdam, The Hague, Maastricht, Haarlem, Groningen and Rotterdam, Rabbi Jacobs said.

Remembering the Canadian, Jewish, Chinese cowboy

Bernie Farber
Special to The CJN

Moishe "Two-Gun" Cohen, the Canadian swashbuckler, soldier of fortune and an honoured officer in the army of Chinese revolutionary Sun Yat-Sen died 43 years ago this month at the age of 83. His impossibly improbable story is the stuff of Hollywood movies and legends. Indeed such a movie is being produced this year.

Born to Orthodox Jews from Western Poland in 1887, his family moved to London, England's rough and tumble east end, as did many wanting a life safe from eastern European anti-Semitism. There, Moishe learned the ways of the street – from gambling to petty thievery – guided by a street crook known as "Harry the Gonif." Here too Moishe learned to fight. He boxed under the name "Cockney Cohen," amongst others.

It wasn't long before his thieving ways caught up with him and Moishe ended up in an English reform school. Following his release, his parents sent him to western Canada with the hope that this still-British colony would provide a new start for young Moishe, who ended up as a farm hand in Whitewood, Sask.

Moishe also learned to gamble and shoot, two pursuits that would suit him well later in life. It wasn't long until Moishe quit his job as a farm hand and started wandering around western Canada, where he worked various odd and menial jobs.

With the outbreak of the First World War, Moishe seized what he saw as another opportunity and joined the Canadian Railway troops in Europe. It was here where fate intervened. Placed in charge of Chinese labourers who were sent to the front from Canada, where they were building the CPR, Moishe was taken by the strange food, traditions and customs of these Chinese workers.

Following the war, Moishe returned to Canada, where he developed strong friendships with many Chinese immigrants. A frequent customer at Chinese gambling dens, he was one of very few non-Chinese to gain the respect of this cloistered immigrant group. Indeed according to Joe King, who wrote a fascinating essay on Moishe's life, his legend was bolstered when he saved Mah Sam, a Chinese "businessman" (the owner of a gambling den as it turned out). As King relates:

"[Moishe] turned up one night at one of his favourite haunts; he found the aged Chinese restaurant owner, Mah Sam, being held up by a hoodlum.

"Moishe wasn't going to have his plans for the evening interrupted, so he sidled up to the thug, whacked him in the head, disarmed him and then threw him into the streets."

It was this newly minted relationship with Mah Sam that moved Moishe to travel to China in 1922. Mah Sam was an ardent devotee of Sun, the Chinese nationalist. Considered an evolutionary hero of China, he had overthrown the Qing Dynasty 10 years earlier, founding the first Chinese national republic.

Moishe managed to wangle a meeting with the Chinese leader and used his charm to wheedle his way into a job.

Moishe started off as a personal body guard to the leader, then helped teach Sun's troops how to fight, shoot and smuggle weapons.

It was during a protection detail that Moishe was involved in a gunfight. Slightly wounded in one arm, he learned his lesson well and taught himself to shoot with both hands. From then on he always carried guns in a hip and shoulder holster, earning the nickname "Two-Gun."

For his courage and exploits, Sun promoted Moishe to the rank of colonel and following Sun's death in 1925, Moishe was promoted again to general. By 1930 "Two-Gun" headed Chinese Intelligence and following the Japanese invasion of China in 1937, Moishe helped the Chinese forces obtain weapons while doing intelligence work on behalf of the British.

Upon hearing that Sun's wife was taken prisoner by the Japanese, Moishe attempted a rescue. Unfortunately he was captured by the Japanese and imprisoned.

Insisting he was just a Canadian businessman in a very rare prisoner exchange, Moishe was released and repatriated back to Canada in 1943.

As if the war was not enough for "Two-Gun," Moishe then gave his talents over to the fledgling Jewish state in British-mandated Palestine. Here he helped the Zionist cause by procuring much needed weapons and teaching the inexperienced Jews, many who had never held a gun in their lives, to shoot and fight. He even travelled to the U.S., where he was able to convince the head of the UN Chinese delegation to abstain from voting against Israel, doing more than his bit to help establish the new Jewish state.

In the years to follow Moishe moved back to Canada, where he married and established business ties between China and the West. He was one of the very few to maintain good relations between mainland communist China and Taiwan.

Canada's Jewish cowboy, samurai warrior, spy, petty thief and gambler is buried in the Jewish cemetery in Salford, England. His black granite tombstone is inscribed in three languages – English, Hebrew and Chinese.

Bernie Farber is a writer and human rights advocate. He is senior vice-president for Gemini Power Corp., where he works with First Nations reserves to help build sustainable industries.

A land of milk and chocolate

Tourism at Cadbury World is cocotastic—and kosher

Nathan Jeffay
JNS.org

It's easy to imagine that if the ancient Israelites had been familiar with the cocoa bean, God might have promised them a land flowing with milk and chocolate. He didn't, but such a land does exist.

In the English city of Birmingham, a 90-minute train ride from London, Cadbury – the company that popularized modern British milk chocolate – welcomes half a million visitors a year who come to pay homage to Cadbury World. And if you are kosher observant and accustomed to foodie attractions where you can look but can't taste, you should rejoice, the London Beth Din regards almost all products made by Cadbury as kosher.

Non-Brits may not grasp just how big Cadbury is – as a cultural institution as well as a brand. But you'll quickly get the hang of it at their huge visitor centre. In addition to the main exhibition, there's an outdoor children's play area with climbing zones, tube slides and tunnels, a separate area at a lower level for the under-five set, and a multimedia show. The show consists of two five-minute features during which you meet the earnest Quakers who set up the company back in 1824, after which you get to create your own chocolate, with melted Cadbury chocolate and fillings.

A visit to Cadbury World can take up to three hours, but it is so well choreographed that time flies by. It isn't an "exhibition" in the conventional sense, but rather a mixture of displays, acted sketches, 3D multimedia presentations, demonstrations of the production process, and, of course, tastings. Yet you do learn a lot. In fact, Cadbury World was one of the first institutions in the U.K. to be awarded the Learning Outside the Classroom Quality Badge, recognizing it as a provider of quality, safely managed educational experiences for young people.

For those of us used to family outings where different people circulate at different speeds and everyone loses each other, Cadbury World is brilliant. As you go past various junctures, such as the shows, in batches of around 50 people, you are constantly synchronized with your party. The various components of the experience have been designed to hold the attention of the very young while stimulating the grown ups. There was a 70-year age span in my family group, and both granddad and toddler daughter loved every minute.

In Britain, Cadbury is a cultural institution as well as a brand.

The exhibition begins with a series of 3D stages where miniature figures give you short snippets of the history of chocolate. You find out about "chocolate houses" where grown men (women and children were barred) used to gather to drink hot chocolate and gamble, and you meet an actress who recreates the atmosphere of these dens of sugary indulgence. Then an actor introduces the members of the Cadbury family who established the company and made it great. They tell their story of how their chocolate is made through a series of presentations, one of them featuring seats that move as the cocoa breaks are shaken. You find out how specific Cadbury lines are made, and you make your way through a packaging plant to an area where you can watch the production of one of the company's premium handmade products.

The place really does flow with chocolate – A kilometre of piping on the ceiling takes it around. And even after nearly three hours, the kids are still on a high, not just because of their pockets full of samples or the cup of liquid chocolate (the day's second), but because the whole trip ends with an adorable ride, Cadabra, which takes you on little carriages through a world in which cute cocoa beans are engaged in all sorts of activities, including skiing.

I always dreamed of visiting Willy Wonka's chocolate factory. This was definitely the next best thing.

While most products distributed at Cadbury World are kosher, some are not. The London Beth Din's listing of kosher Cadbury products can be found at www.kosher.org.uk.

Total Lift Bed puts patients in a standing position

Abigail Klein Leichman
Israel21c

The Israeli-innovated Total Lift Bed is a simple but revolutionary solution that could set a new standard of care in hospitals and rehabilitation centres worldwide.

Made by VitalGo Systems, the patented Total Lift is the only hospital-grade bed that can elevate a patient from a lying to a fully standing position – and all points in between – for treatment and transfer with no lifting required of the caregiver.

Two major companies are now distributing Total Lift in the acute-care and home-care markets in the United States. About 350 of the beds are in use there, with a goal of tripling that amount next year. The product is registered with the U.S. Food and Drug Administration and the Certification Experts in Europe.

Israeli innovation prevents patient falls and caregiver injuries

"We have to ramp up production because we are getting approached from all over the world – Germany, the UK, China, Japan and other countries," says Ohad Paz, VitalGo's president and CEO.

"We believe that our product will eventually become the standard of treatment in hospitals and healthcare facilities, as the concept has numerous advantages over the beds used today. We can already see a movement of the big companies trying to imitate our concept and understanding the importance of early mobility."

He points out that Total Lift not only prevents patient falls and caregiver injuries but also leads to shorter hospital stays because it allows patients to get out of the prone position earlier and more often. Lying in bed for prolonged periods can cause medical problems such as muscle atrophy and bedsores.

"This is the only bed in the world that can do all of this," says Paz, a certified public accountant by training and an entrepreneur by interest.

Around 2005, Paz and his business partner Ofer Parezky – who had worked on successful consumer goods in the past – were approached about designing products to enable the elderly to "age in place" in safety and dignity. Then, Paz's father was sent to a rehab centre after suffering a stroke, and the issue got closer to home.

"We started with a showering product that moves the person from a standing to a reclining position. This was my first patent, and it was very complicated mechanically," Paz says. "I said to myself, if we made a product like this for the shower, why not for the bed?"

The Total Lift Bed has a few patents, one of which is a unique weight-bearing control system that shows the exact weight bearing of the patient by calculating the amount of pressure placed on the footboard in relation to the patient's body weight. The more the patient is tilted up, the more pressure gets transferred to the lower extremities.

This feature allows, for the first time, for three options – zero weight bearing, partial weight bearing and full weight bearing. Each option has important implications for treatment, Paz explains.

"For patients in rehab today, it's all or nothing – lying or standing – and the therapist needs to hold onto them and it's dangerous. With our bed, you do it gradually, step by step, and can measure the weight bearing. This system is so innovative that we had to explain its benefits to doctors, and once they understand it they see its great potential."

The ability to transfer weight to the footboard, even without getting out of bed completely, is advantageous for people who are too ill to walk or are hooked up to myriad machines.

"With our bed, there is no risk," Paz says. "If you have some of the weight shifted for a few hours, it makes a huge difference in not losing muscle tension, which is the biggest problem. Every day in bed, you lose 1.5 per cent of muscle tension."

VitalGo recently launched its new Total Lift Bariatric Bed, which can handle patients weighing up to 1,000 pounds. "It is already being used in the U.S. Some of these people have not stood up for months or even years, and this is their first opportunity to get out of bed," Paz says.

Bankrolled by private investors and based in Tel Aviv, VitalGo has an office in Florida and produces the bed piecemeal from parts made in Israel, Turkey, Scandinavia and the United States.

Student and teacher make beautiful music together

Sholom Wargon
Special to The CJN

The teacher was adamant: "I'm sorry, I'm fully booked. I can't take on any more students."

The mother wasn't taking no for an answer.

"Let me hear her play a little," relented Eli Kassner. "Then I'll decide."

The "audition" took mere minutes to become lesson one. In lesson three, Kassner assigned his precocious pupil a page of Asturias – an intricate, graduate-level piece. She returned one week later with four pages.

Liona Boyd was 13 years old.

"Why waste time putting a PhD candidate through kindergarten?" says Kassner. "She was – and is – a special talent."

Fifty-one years later, Boyd has put out multiple gold and platinum recordings, received the Order of Canada and played close to 1,000 concerts worldwide. She has such a mastery of her instrument that in 1975 she earned the moniker Canada's First Lady of the Guitar.

Student and teacher are back where it all started, in Kassner's Toronto studio. Peers now, they're comparing notes and reminiscing.

"Eli was my mentor. He allowed me to grow," Boyd said.

Unlike some music teachers who are possessive of their prize pupils, Kassner facilitated Boyd's exposure to other influences and mentors, including several world-class guitarists. At his suggestion, she enrolled in a master class given by Julian Bream, the very virtuoso whose performance in the seventh floor auditorium of Eaton's College Street had first ignited Boyd's passion for classical guitar.

For teacher, as for student, age 13 was a watershed year.

Liona Boyd and Eli Kassner. "Eli was my mentor," Boyd said. "He allowed me to grow."

It was Vienna, 1937. Kassner's participation in the Hanoar Hatzioni (Zionist Youth) Movement affords him an opportunity to make aliyah. The diminutive musician — a guitar player since age seven — brings none of the physical prowess deemed prerequisite to life on an agricultural kibbutz. But he alone among the "prospects" speaks Hebrew with the modern Sephardic pronunciation, which allows him to converse with the shaliach in charge of the selection process. ("My father insisted I learn. I was his only hope for a yeshiva bocher in the family; my brother Edward had no interest in religion.")

It's aliyah selection day. One by one, the names of the 50 chosen olim are called. Kassner's is not among them. At name 50, his fast-eroding hopes are extinguished. Whereupon the shaliach turns to him: "And you can come too."

"My knowledge of Hebrew probably saved my life," intones Kassner. Without the rapport established by mother-tongue dialogue, he would in all likelihood have stayed in Vienna and perished at the hands of the Nazis along with his sister Charlotte. (Brother Edward survived and went on to enjoy great success as a music publisher, including a prescient purchase of the rights to Bill Haley's Rock Around The Clock).

An aspiring visual artist on his 1951 arrival in Canada ("for me the guitar was just a hobby,") Kassner hoped to earn a living by selling his paintings. Slow sales led to his plan B – a job at Whaley, Royce & Co., the iconic instrument and music dealer on Yonge Street. One fine day, as he strummed a Bach gavotte (in-store playing was good for sales), a customer approached and asked for lessons.

"I've never taught before, but if you'd like to be my guinea pig, I'll be happy to try," volunteered Kassner.

The rest is history. Over the next half century, Kassner was to play a vital role in the advancement of guitar studies. According to Carl Morey, professor emeritus at the University of Toronto's faculty of music, Kassner "virtually single-handedly created serious guitar studies in Toronto, if not in Canada," according to Guitar Canada.

In 1956, Kassner co-founded the Guitar Society of Toronto, of which he served seven years as president and 39 years as artistic director. In 1959 he began teaching at the Royal Conservatory of Music and the University of Toronto. In 1967 he established the Eli Kassner Guitar Academy, resigning from the RCMT but continuing to teach at the U of T. He has also taught at the École Normale de Musique in Montreal and Queen's University. He composed and performed for the CBC-TV series The Nature of Things, winning the Bell-Northern Prize and the Monaco Award for the film The First Inch. For this and other Nature Of Things films, he not only composed the music but also contributed his own microphotographs. Today, at age 89 – though slowed by a stroke and macular degeneration which has rendered him virtually blind – he continues to teach at his Toronto home, where he lives with his wife Ann.

Though Kassner's brush and palette were usurped by his guitar, evidence of his visual artistic talent remains. Adorning one wall of his home is a series of illustrations of the chassidic figures that populated the Vienna of his youth.

Making beautiful music together

While Kassner was redefining the art of guitar instruction, Boyd was fulfilling her early promise on stage and in studio. In 1974 The Guitar, her first record, was produced by Eleanor Sniderman, wife of Sam Sniderman. In 1995, she dedicated a self-composed Canadiana suite of recordings — My Land Of Hiawatha — to Kassner.

In 2003, Boyd was diagnosed with task-specific focal dystonia, a condition stemming from excessive repetition of specific muscle movements. Common to guitarists, it often leads them to stop playing altogether.

Not Boyd. By dint of sheer determination and an underlying conviction that she could and would play again, Boyd used a six-year hiatus to reinvent her playing technique. That process included, temporarily, using a pick with her right hand.

And she began to sing. And write. Not just experimentally, but for keeps.

From her first album as a vocalist and composer, released in 2009 (Liona Boyd Sings Songs Of Love, with Srdjan Givoje*)* to the just-released The Return... To Canada With Love, Boyd has demonstrated that she of the golden hands has a set of vocal chords to match.

No one is more impressed than Kassner.

"Liona never ceases to amaze me," he exudes. "To sing is one thing. To sing at a level commensurate with her guitar playing? Unbelievable! Liona solves all her own problems."

Single since her 2004 divorce from California real estate developer John Simon, Boyd is nevertheless smitten – with the native land to which she returned in 2011. Thirteen of the 15 compositions on The Return are lyrical odes to Canada: its places, its landscapes, its people. In content and execution the material is spectacularly new. If a breakthrough album is supposed to happen only once in one's career, someone forgot to tell Boyd.

Never once during the long road back did Boyd view herself as a "reclamation project." To her the comeback was an evolution, a renaissance. "I feel more complete musically now than ever," she beams. The quicksilver speed that once earned Kassner an admonishment from the legendary Andrès Segovia – who felt that Boyd was playing "too fast" – has slowed an iota. But to measure the cheetah by a stopwatch alone is to miss the beauty and grace of its gait. The sound is still unmistakably, mellifluously Boyd: riveting and precise. The same sound whose clarity, in 1962, made squeezing in one more student the easiest decision of Kassner's career.

Today, at age 64, Boyd continues to tour, accompanied by guitarist Michael Savona, and to record, with producer Peter Bond. She and Kassner, who now reside in close proximity, enjoy an ongoing relationship of mutual respect and fervent admiration.

"Eli doesn't just teach guitar, he personifies it," says Boyd. For Canada's First Lady Of The Guitar, Eli Kassner is the de facto first man.

Eli Kassner is also a visual artist as this painting of his of two Chassidic Jews attests.

New cheap coffee-to-go chain in Israel

Viva Press
Israel 21C

Mainstream news will lead you to believe something diplomatic or political is the talk of the day in Israel. But for most Israelis, the big news right now is whether a new, cheap coffee chain that recently opened in the heart of Tel Aviv will spark a coffee revolution and bring down the prices at cafés around the country.

Entrepreneur Avi Katz – the guy who brought the "dollar store" concept to Israel – is leading the latest coffee revolution. His team opened Cofix, a takeaway-only café, on one of the busiest thoroughfares in Tel Aviv.

Everything on the Hebrew-English menu is five shekels (about $1.40): quality Italian coffee, cappuccino, sandwiches, bakery goods, fresh juice and desserts. A cup of coffee at a café in Israel usually runs $2.80 to $5 while a sandwich costs $7 to $11.

Within hours of the opening of this audacious venture, people were lining up out the door and down the block. The long lines continued for the next three days, and Aroma, Israel's biggest café chain, has already announced that it will lower the price of cappuccino to NIS8.

"There's no way I could have known this would happen," Katz, the founder and president of the crowdsourcing investments Hagshama Fund, told ISRAEL21c. "Even someone as optimistic as me couldn't have known this would take place."

The idea for the new café chain had been brewing in Katz's mind for 12 years. The veteran businessman said he will always remember the day he pulled his "new Mercedes into a gas station and went to buy coffee and a snack at the service stop. Paying over $14 for two coffees and baked goods hurts, even for someone with a new Mercedes."

Katz founded Cofix in Tel Aviv and hopes to open 300 branches across Israel.

Along with his daughter, Hagit Shinover; his partner in Hagshama, Benny Farkash; and attorney Hanan Shemesh, Katz opened the first branch of Cofix on Ibn Gvirol Street. They plan to keep it under their ownership for the first few years. Katz said they plan to open more branches in Tel Aviv's downtown area in the coming months.

"After we check the market and pay the price of experience, we'll franchise out," he told ISRAEL21c. Cofix's long-term development plans cite opening 300 branches around the country.

The café market in Israel is brimming. According to a 2009 report by the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Labor, there were over 1,300 cafés peppered throughout Israel and some 120 in Tel Aviv.

Cofix is meant to sharpen the distinction between the takeaway café scene and the sit-down coffee-shop market, which Katz says has been blurred.

"It's not about what other café owners are feeling [in response to Cofix's opening] but rather what they'll do," Katz said. "There's no reason that kiosks don't sell coffee at our price. This is a realistic price. It still enables us to make a nice profit. Our motto is to sell more for less, not to sell a little at a high price."

The same day that Cofix opened, in fact, two other café chains advertised $1.40 cappuccinos, albeit for a limited time offer.

Cofix is not strictly a social venture, as Katz is very upfront about wanting to make a profit. However, the new kosher café chain does answer the public's desire for fair prices.

It makes sense that he would be the one to lead the coffee revolution. Eighteen years ago, Katz founded the Bee Retail Group, Israel's largest group of retail chains for home and leisure merchandise.

He's the guy who introduced the Kfar Hashashuim toy store chain to Israel and offered more affordable prices. He also introduced the Doctor Baby chain, a store selling reasonably priced baby paraphernalia. And, of course, the dollar store enterprise was his, too.

"There's always a social purpose to what I do," Katz said. "The public's feeling that the cost of living has risen unjustly is correct. People want to see a change in food prices. Prices have fallen in fashion, computers, phones. There is no reason to pay $4 for fresh carrot juice that is made from broken carrots grocers can't sell anyway."

Katz said that Cofix is meant to perk up the takeaway sector but that it could – and should – improve sit-down café options, too.

Coffee shops "should return to what they really are," Katz said. "Until five years ago, there was a difference between what you could get in a sit-down café and fare served at a takeaway place. The owner of a sit-down café has to charge for what they offer: service, a proper meal and distinctive ambiance. I feel the menu will have to change."

Donation brings Saskatchewan's Jewish history to life

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

At the age of 80, after 40 years of researching and collecting material on the Jewish farming colonies of Saskatchewan, scholar Anna Feldman donated her entire body of research to the Canadian Museum of Civilization in Gatineau, Que.

Among the material is audio cassettes with songs, interviews and oral narratives, personal memoirs and a wide range of other textual documents. It's a rich and highly relevant contribution that sheds light on those small colonies and the hopes and dreams of their Jewish inhabitants, says Judith Klassen, music curator at the museum.

"It really makes sense for it to be here," Klassen says. "The breadth of Anna's work is really exciting. For example, she didn't record only one particular genre of song as she looked at Yiddish song and culture. Rather, she recorded different types of music from a broad spectrum of people, including cantorial training, ornamentation, traditional song and storytelling."

Jews arrived in Saskatchewan in the 1880s, many fleeing from persecution in Europe. They established farming colonies with names like New Jerusalem, Sonnenfeld and Edenbridge and by 1930 those colonies were populated by thousands of Jewish farmers and their families. The Jewish colonies' decline started in the 1930s with the Depression and a drought. By the 1960s most of the farm colonists had left the land for larger cities. Today, all that remains is open prairie where homes and settlements once were and small cemeteries marking the graves of the original settlers. In Edenbridge, the Beth Israel Synagogue, constructed in Carpenter Gothic style in 1906 and used until the 1960s, is now a municipal heritage site. But for any kind of context about the lives lived here, you have to go to the museum.

Fortunately, material like Feldman's, which is now being processed for the public archives, is accessible. To immerse yourself in the collection you have to travel to Gatineau, but for those who are looking for specific documents, those can be ordered, copied, scanned or mailed. "We've already had inquiries from people interested in this collection, even from outside of Canada, which shows it's of interest beyond our borders," Klassen says.

Feldman is an accomplished scholar who obtained an ARCT in Singing, a bachelor of music and a master's degree in Canadian studies from Carleton University. In 1983 she received the Norman Pollock Award in Canadian studies. Today she resides in a seniors' complex in Toronto.

She began donating her collection in early 2000. The first 188 audio cassettes containing interviews with Jewish musicians, homesteaders, merchants and professionals who were part of the rural farming communities in Saskatchewan has been processed and is available in the archive catalogue. Part two of her collection is still being processed.

"In terms of Jewish cultural expression and settlement in Saskatchewan, this collection is foundational," Klassen says. Partly, that's due to Feldman's skill as an interviewer. "She's very pointed in her questioning and very thoughtful in how she asks questions. She allows her subjects to talk about their background and interests but guides them so she covers the key areas she is interested in. In the breadth of her fieldwork and interviews, you get a nuanced perspective on the experiences people had – for example, on anti-Semitism, but also on mutual respect. You see there's a broad spectrum of opinions even within the particular settlement. That's one of the really unique things about this collection."

A list of the material catalogued thus far is available on the museum's website at catalogue.civilization.ca. Search by author Anna Feldman to find a description of the material in each box, as well as a list of the subjects interviewed.

'Where is the big honking menorah for the front lawn?'

Toronto 32 Division now has its own menorah

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Every holiday season, when Toronto Police Service (TPS) Sgt. Lawrence Sager noticed his colleagues adorning the police station with Christmas decorations, it hit a nerve.

"As you know, around Christmas time, you have so much representation of the Christian faith, be it a nativity scene, or a Christmas tree or wreath," said Sager, one of three or four Jewish officers at 32 Division.

He said when he would vocalize his wish for Chanukah to be represented alongside Christmas, he always faced a little resistance from his colleagues.

"For years, at every division that I've worked at, they've never had a menorah up," said the 49-year-old Montreal native, who will be celebrating 25 years with the TPS in May.

"Years ago, I was a constable in this division. I would print out and hang up menorahs and type 'Happy Chanukah' under them. They would let me do that, but I would get comments like, 'Lawrence, what are you trying to do?'"

Sager, who says he's a Conservative Jew who observes Jewish holidays and sends his children to Jewish day school, said it was important to him that his community be represented at 32 Division.

Of Toronto's 5,400 police officers, Sager estimated that only about 50 are Jewish.

"Because we have so few [Jewish] policemen on our service, I have to do something for the Jewish community. We police these people, we serve these people, and a little bit of education goes a long way."

Last year, when his division's Superintendent, Selwyn Fernandes, hung a Christmas wreath in the office, Sager presented him with a challenge.

"He was hanging up this huge wreath, and I said, 'What are you doing?'

"He said, 'Lawrence, it's Christmas time. Do you have something against Christmas?'

"I said, 'I have nothing against Christmas, but where is the big honking menorah for the front lawn?'"

Sager pleaded his case, telling Fernandes that 32 Division – which serves the community bordered by Steeles Avenue to the north and Lawrence Avenue to the south, and by the CN Rail line (near Dufferin Street) to the west, and Bayview Avenue to the east – has a larger Jewish population than any other TPS division.

"I said to my boss, 'We serve these people, yet we're polarized [this time of year] because we only have Christmas decorations. If you have Jewish people coming in, and they're in distress, or they're having problems, they can see that at the very least, we're recognizing their community. It might give them a little more comfort that they're talking to a policeman who may be little more sympathetic to them rather than someone who has no idea where they come from,'" Sager recalled.

Fernandes agreed to take up the challenge and said, "'I'll get you a menorah.'

"I said, 'OK, yeah, I'd like to see that.' I challenged him, but I didn't think he'd be able to deliver."

Fernandes called two men, David Stein and Michael Kuhl, with whom he'd established a connection through Gesher Canada, an organization that lobbies government agencies on behalf of the Orthodox community.

"Last year, he called and he said, 'We need a menorah to be supportive of the Jewish community and we want to be able to display a menorah for Chanukah.' They wanted a sizable menorah so it would make an impact," Kuhl said, adding that he was "pleasantly surprised," by the request.

He said he and Stein reached out to Chabad Flamingo founder and spiritual leader Rabbi Mendel Kaplan, who happened to have a six-foot, electrical menorah at his disposal.

Menorah displayed in front of police station

"Someone else was supposed to purchase it, but it fell through. So we saw the opportunity and we purchased it," Kuhl said.

It took just two weeks for Fernandes to meet Sager's challenge, and Sager was thrilled.

"But, once again, there was some eye-rolling. Before, it was just a bunch of paper menorahs that I would put up. Now there was a big one, and no one had ever heard of having a menorah at a police station anywhere in Canada, maybe even North America," he said.

"I started to get a little self-conscious because everyone knew I was behind it, and I didn't want anyone to think I was trying to infringe on Christmas. Now we've got this big menorah, bigger than a Christmas tree."

Not wanting to force his traditions on any of his colleagues who weren't interested, Sager told his boss that he would make the effort to come in every Chanukah evening to light the menorah.

"But he said, 'Lawrence, everyone has got to learn about everyone else's holiday. I don't want you to come in. I told the staff sergeants in charge that if they don't want to light it, they need to get someone to light it, and that it needs to be lit after sundown.'"

He said some of the people who seemed wary at the beginning, started to warm up to the idea.

"They got into it big time. They were interested to know how to light it, whether from left to right or right to left, because they didn't want to offend the Jewish community."

He said some of his colleagues began to ask him what Chanukah was all about, and he would try to frame it around the same message attached to Christmas.

"I told them Chanukah is the festival of light and represents a time when good prevailed over evil, resulting in a miracle. The presence of light... also represents peace and hope for all mankind," he said.

"I've had officers come to me and say, 'I used to have this view that Chanukah was competing with Christmas'... But they soon learned about it and they were asking me when we'd be putting it up again."

The menorah, currently displayed in front of the station near Yonge Street and Finch Avenue for the second time in as many years, has elicited an "incredible and very positive" reaction from the Jewish community.

"The Toronto Police Service is very dedicated to the community, and this is just one example of how they go out of their way to ensure that our community is well taken care of, along with the general public," Kuhl said.

"I hope this will encourage other organizations to show the same sensitivity."

Sun, sea and a synagogue – exploring Curacao

Maureen Littlejohn
Special to The CJN

Curacao, a speck of rock 63 kilometres off the coast of Venezuela surrounded by crystal blue waters and famous for an aromatic liqueur, is not your average Caribbean destination. What really makes this Netherlands Antilles island special, though, is its deep Jewish heritage.

Mikve Israel-Emanuel Synagogue, built in 1732 and located in the capital city of Willemstad, is the oldest synagogue in continuous use in the Western Hemisphere. Enter and you might be surprised by what's underfoot. The floor is carpeted in soft, white sand.

"Some say the synagogue is patterned after the Tabernacle which our forefathers used in the Sinai desert during their 40 years of wandering there," explains Emlyn Peters, a Curacao tour guide and member of the congregation.

"Others say that during the Inquisition the 'Conversos' or Jews who took the Catholic faith to hide their belief, placed sand on the floors of their secret rooms to muffle the sound of their worship services."

The last explanation is the one Peters likes best.

"God commanded Abraham, 'Go forth and multiply like the grains in the sand and the stars in the sky.'"

This sand is not trucked in from a nearby beach. It is imported from the riverbeds of Suriname and Guyana and at one time even came from Israel. Why not use the stuff on Curacao's shores? Sea sand contains salt that would eat into the synagogue's lovely mahogany furniture. Curacao has no fresh water rivers. In fact, its drinking water is desalinated sea water.

Mikve Israel-Emanuel Synagogue's congregation was Sephardic Orthodox until 1964, when there was a merger with Temple Emanuel (Reform). Now Sephardic Reconstructionist, the congregation of 190 is led by American Hazzan Avery Tracht.

"In the old days my great aunts and grandmother would never sit together with the men," recalled Peters, adding, "men and women all sit together now."

Although Curacao's Jewish population is only 350 (a fraction of the island's 150,000 inhabitants), the number of visitors to Mikve Israel-Emanuel Synagogue is huge. Last year 22,000 people arrived, many coming from the docking cruise ships.

Visitors approaching the synagogue will first see a scalloped-roofed, lemon-yellow façade. Made of coral and limestone, the walls are filled with sea sand and plastered with lime mortar. Inside, the atmosphere is ancient, almost timeless. Light filters softly through blue windows and between four pillars representing the matriarchs (Sarah, Rivkah, Rachel and Leah) hang four 24-arm chandeliers molded in the Dutch porpoise pattern. They are lit on special occasions such as Kol Nidrei. It takes several hours to install the candles and three men to carry the heavy brass centre section for cleaning and polishing afterwards.

Adjacent to the synagogue is the Jewish Cultural Historical Museum.

"We still use items you see in the glass cases," explains Myrna Moreno, the museum's welcoming curator. "For Chanukah we use a silver menorah from Amsterdam that dates from 1716. The cups are filled with olive oil and lit with a wick by one of the youngsters in our congregation."

Other prized possessions include the 350-year-old silver tray that is used for smashing goblets at wedding ceremonies, and a Sephardic Torah written in 1320, smuggled out of Spain before the Inquisition. Pictures of the Dutch royal family hang on one wall.

"The Netherlands was the first country to give us freedom of religion. Every rabbi here does a prayer in Portuguese to thank them," says Moreno. Nodding at a wooden Chair of Elijah in the corner, she notes, "That is 150 years old and people still ask to borrow it for the brit milah, circumcision ceremony."

How did Jews first come to Curacao? The island was settled by the Spanish in 1527 and taken over by the Dutch in 1634. (Britain and France owned it for small stints as well). Samuel Cohen was the first Jewish person to step foot on the island in 1634 when he accompanied Dutch explorers there as an interpreter. Twelve Jewish colonizing families arrived from Amsterdam in 1651. They were later joined by Jews fleeing Brazil after capture by the Portuguese. The Jewish settlers were involved with the Dutch West India Company and played a major role in shipping, importing supplies from Europe and exporting tropical produce. As the community grew, they assisted other communities in Suriname and St. Eustatius and helped finance early synagogues in New York (Shearith Israel) and Newport, R.I. (Touro). Curacao's Jewish population peaked at 2,000 in 1780.

One prominent family, the Seniors (Sephardic Jews of Spanish and Portuguese descent), started the Curacao distillery more than 115 years ago. The plant, a big tourist destination, produces five colours and four flavours of Kosher certified Curacao liqueur. In the financial sector, the Jewish Maduro family is half of the Maduro-Curiel Bank, one of the largest private sector employers in the Dutch Caribbean. Their 19th century plantation house has been turned into a museum and the Mongui Maduro Library boasts an extensive collection of Antilles history and Judaica dating from the 17th century.

If you want to go to Curacao to enjoy the tropical climate and explore the island's Jewish history, transportation has recently gotten easier. WestJet introduced non-stop flights from Toronto in October and in December SunWing will begin offering all-inclusive vacation packages.

Although Curacao's Jewish population has dwindled, its legacy is massive. Unravel the threads of time on this delightful island and you'll embark on a fascinating spiritual journey.

Jewish links to West Africa buried in time

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

In the popular imagination, Timbuktu is a remote outpost, an almost mythical destination somewhere at the ends of the Earth, beyond which there be dragons.

As a trading centre in central Mali on the southern edge of the Sahara Desert, Timbuktu is real, not legend, and not so remote that a community of Jews could not find it, settle there and do business for generations.

At one time in its history, a thousand years go, Timbuktu was an important caravan destination – a place where gold and salt were traded. Today the town's Jewish community is no more, its members long ago assimilated into the predominant Muslim population. But the elders among the Jewish descendants still possess unique documentation – marriage contracts, burial information – attesting to the vitality of that long ago Jewish community, according to Israeli Ambassador Gideon Behar, who served in the region from 2006 to 2011.

Timbuktu is not the only West African location to play host to a vital Jewish community. In The Gambia, Senegal and Cape Verde, traces of Jewish life can still be found, said Behar, who was in Toronto recently in his capacity as Israel's ambassador directing the department for combating anti-Semitism.

Behar said he was somewhat surprised to find a Jewish presence across Western Africa. Though he was posted in Senegal, his duties took him to Cape Verde, The Gambia, Sierra Leone, Guinea-Bissau and Mali, where he found "there was a Jewish presence and there is still a Jewish presence in this area."

Israeli Ambassador Gideon Behar, second from left, is seen here with Gambians who have taken up Judaism on their own, including a local "rabbi," second from right.

"I saw it as a professional and a Jewish mission as the ambassador to find Jews in these places and to learn about Jewish history, the Jewish people and to discover cemeteries and ancient Jewish tombs," he explained.

"Timbuktu was the home of quite a large Jewish community in the Middle Ages," he said.

According to Kulanu ("all of us"), an organization dedicated to finding and assisting lost and dispersed remnants of the Jewish people, Jews there had been an important part of the caravan trade from Morocco, dating back to the 1500s.

In 1492, the same year as the expulsion from Spain, the local monarch in Timbuktu gave Jews the option of departing or converting to Islam. Most gave up their Judaism, but that did not mark the end of Jewish life. The Jewish population continued to be replenished for years afterwards by a small number of Jewish merchants from Morocco.

Interest in the Jewish roots of local Malian Muslims, who may number as many as 1,000, was initiated in the 1990s by a local historian, Ismael Diadie Haidara. He noted that Hebrew script could be seen on old trading documents. He also reported on local family names that had a Jewish origin and he cited the remains of synagogues and graves. In addition, a local tradition identified the residents of three villages near Timbuktu as "the Jews."

In Cape Verde, a small island country in the Atlantic off the coast of Senegal, "the interesting Jewish story there is that many of the inhabitants who came from Portugal, the colonial power, were Jews," said Behar. "They intermarried with the African population" and today you can still find many locals with the Jewish surnames of "Cohen," "Levi," and "Ben Shimol", as well as "Oliviera," which translates as olive tree.

"Today they're Christian but some of them do feel connected to Judaism and Israel and the Jewish people," he said.

One of the main cities on the islands is called "Synagoga," and the ruins of the house of worship there can still be seen.

During his tenure as ambassador, Behar organized a Rosh Hashanah service along with a meal, which was attended by many local people. "They are still interested in Jewish tradition and they want to connect to Israel and the Jewish people," he said.

Still, they aren't actually Jewish, so Behar took it upon himself to perform a mitzvah that had not been done in many years. Visiting the local Jewish cemetery, he recited kaddish, the prayer for the dead.

"I saw this as a Jewish obligation for me. Some had not had prayers for them in decades. It was important for me and their Jewish souls," he said.

Descendants of the children of Israel

In Senegal, when he opened the official ambassadorial residence, he extended invitations to Jews temporarily in the country, as well as local dignitaries. Of the Jews who attended, some hailed from France while others traced their origins to North Africa. "But there were a few ethnic groups who claimed to be descendants of Jews. Today they are Muslims."

In eastern Senegal you can still find people who call themselves "Bani Yisrael (sons of Israel). They believe their ancestors came from the east ... 1,500 years ago. They were Jews."

During his sojourn, Behar heard stories of a Jewish kingdom in Senegal or Guinea in the 18th century.

In The Gambia, Behar found a small community "who started to adopt Judaism, to live Jewish lives." They maintain a synagogue, have a sefer Torah, wear kippot and adorn their homes with mezuzot.

And they read the Torah in a house of worship – on Sunday.

"They belong to a larger movement that originated in Nigeria in the 1960s that operates hundreds of these kinds of synagogues. They're growing in popularity," he said, adding that, "They don't claim Jewish descent, but according to them, Jewish traditions are closer to God."

They are evangelical Christians who are trying to get closer to Judaism. "They're great supporters of Israel and the Jewish people. They love Bible stories and want to learn more about Judaism."

Similarly, in Sierra Leone, he found a great interest in Israel and Jewish spirituality.

"It is everywhere in Western Africa," Behar said, adding that "self-proclaimed rabbis from the Caribbean" have come to Sierra Leone to teach locals about Jewish traditions.

Beyond the settled communities of western Africa, there's another group of nomadic herdsmen who may or may not have Jewish roots. They're called the Peul, Fula or Fulan people.

With a range that extends as far east as Chad and Sudan, the Fula numbers could be as high as 35 million. "They have a tradition that their origin is from Egypt, that they came from the east and are descendants of the children of Israel," Behar said.

Some scholars believe that they could be of Judaeo-Syrian origin, but others say they descended from nomads from North Africa and from sub-Sahara Africa.

Locals in Cape Verde celebrate Rosh Hashanah at a dinner hosted by Gideon Behar, Israel's former ambassador to the West African island nation.

As is the case for so many of the peoples of Africa, their origins, if not lost, are so obscure that they will be contested and discussed for generations to come as the stuff of legend.

Timbuktu was for generations an important trade centre in western Africa.

Tourists at Kibbutz Misgav Am see a different kind of view

Bernie Bellan
The Jewish Post & News

TIBERIAS — "You see that fence over there?" asks 73-year-old Aryeh Ben Yaakov. "Beyond that fence is 'La-la land'. That's where Hezbollah has thousands of rockets stored. Oh sure it looks peaceful enough now, but don't kid yourself. They're there all right."

The setting was Kibbutz Misgav Am, situated directly on the border with Lebanon, and overlooking the controversial Shebaa Farms, also the scene for a vicious terrorist attack in 1980.

I was there this particular day participating in a mission sponsored by Shurat HaDin (Israel Law Centre). On this, the fourth day of the mission, the 20 of us who were participating in it got our first glimpses of the kinds of views that most tourists who come to Israel do not have occasion to see.

We saw quite a bit more than merely the spectacular views of both Syria and Lebanon. We also heard the sound of artillery fire coming from Syria and looked down on the very houses that shielded Hezbollah fighters during the harrowing Israeli "operation" in Lebanon in the summer of 2006 – it was quite the experience, to say the least.

Looking out over the Golan Heights from Mount Bental. The green fields belong to Israel, everything brown belongs to Syria. In the distance lies a Druze village on the Syrian side whose inhabitants are loyal to the Assad regime.

There are so many ironies abut the turn of events that has occurred in this area of the Middle East, not the least of which is that Israel is a relative oasis of calm while so much of the Arab world is locked in deadly internal struggles.

But what might happen if some of those struggles resolve themselves? That was the question posed to our Israel Defence Forces guide in the Golan Heights, a young officer whose first name was given as Jonathan, and who gave us a detailed analysis of what might happen in the not-too-distant future, at least as far as Syria is concerned.

"You see that village down there?" he asked our group as we stood on the top of Mount Bental, which gave us a sweeping view of the Golan Heights extending far into Syria. Jonathan was pointing to a small village in the valley that lay beneath us. That village is called Majdal Shams, he explained. It's a Druze village that used to be in Syrian hands. Now it's under Israeli control.

"But over there," he said, pointing to another village, "that's also a Druze village, but it's in Syrian territory under Syrian government control and loyal to Bashar Assad's regime." Surrounding that village though, Jonathan explained, are two rebel-held villages.

At some point, the officer explained, "the rebels may attack the Druze village" which could lead to quite a bloodbath. It's likely then that those Druze villagers would ask for sanctuary in Israel as their backs would be to the wall with no other place to run. If that were to happen, the officer told us, Israel would allow them in. But by no means is Israel interested in becoming a large-scale refuge for Syrian refugees, he noted.

Residents profess loyalty to Assad

Interestingly, but not all that surprisingly, he also remarked, there haven't been any refugees seeking sanctuary in Israel, other than wounded civilians and combatants who had sought medical help occasionally – and always received it from Israelis.

The officer suggested that after more than 60 years of demonizing Israel it's really no surprise that Syrians simply reject the idea of turning to Israel for sanctuary – no matter how dire the situation may be.

Jonathan went on to explain that the residents of Majdal Shams also still profess loyalty to the Assad regime even though their standard of living has improved immeasurably under Israeli control.

"I was walking through the main street of the village," he related, "when I saw a shop flying the Syrian flag. I asked the shop owner why, in spite of all that Israel has done for him and the rest of the villagers, he was still flying a Syrian flag.

"That shop owner explained it to me this way: 'Look,' he said. 'There have been four different Israeli prime ministers who were ready to give the Golan Heights back to Syria at one point or another. What do you think would happen to us if we suddenly found ourselves back in Syrian hands and the government knew that we had shown support for Israel?'"

The view of Lebanon from Kibbutz Misgav Am, on Israel's northern frontier. This picture gives a fairly good idea just how close Hezbollah is to Israel.

Border with Syria remains quite, but for how long?

As we stood on Mount Bental Jonathan pointed to an impressive looking array of towers and antennae situated on the peak of the adjoining mountain, Mount Avital. "That's one of several 'weather stations' we have around here," Jonathan noted. "They'll tell us 'whether' the Syrians are coming or not."

Such are the vagaries of the situations that all of Israel's neighbours face as they ponder what lies ahead – who will be in control and how much bloodletting there might be if someone is perceived to have been on the wrong side.

Pointing further south, Jonathan went on to say that while the rebels near where we were standing belonged to the Syrian Free Army, further south they're all jihadis.

"The jihadis have spelled out what their goals are," Jonathan said. "First they want to overthrow the Assad regime; second they want to establish Sharia law over all of Syria; and third they want to come after Israel.'

So, for the time being, as the Syrians continue to wage their bloody civil war, the border with Syria remains quiet – as it has for the past 40 years. But no one knows whether that will continue or for how long and, as a result, Israel continues to prepare for every contingency.

The situation along the Lebanese border is much the same. Hezbollah has remained quiet ever since the brutal conflict in the summer of 2006, during which Hezbollah fired thousands of missiles at Israeli targets.

Kibbutz Misgav Am is the only spot in Israel where you can see Lebanon, Syria and the Mediterranean Sea all from the same vantage point. It lies just metres from the border with Lebanon and even today its residents remain on heightened alert for a terrorist attack from Lebanon. As Ben Yaakov (who looked like an old American biker and spoke with a Midwestern drawl) showed us around the kibbutz, he constantly made ironic references to how little lies between his kibbutz and the lethal forces of Hezbollah, hidden for the moment but most assuredly there, Ben Yaakov insisted.

"You see this handgun?" he asked us, pointing to his holstered pistol. "I always walk around here with this gun." It may not do much to stop a whole band of men, Ben Yaakov noted, but in 1980 three terrorists snuck into Misgav Am in the middle of the night.

"They saw a light on in one building. It was the nursery. They broke in and took control," he told our group.

That incident eventually led to the three terrorists being killed, but only after two Israeli soldiers were also killed, along with one baby whose brain was bashed in because, as Ben Yaakov told us, "the baby wouldn't stop crying."

Ben Yaakov also noted that it is only in the past seven years that tourists have been allowed to visit Kibbutz Misgav Am. Before that time it was simply considered too dangerous to allow tourists that close to the border but, ironically enough, for the past seven years Hezbollah has been absolutely silent insofar as attacking Israel. Again that has more to do with the problems Hezbollah is now facing as its two main benefactors – Iran and Syria – find themselves quite preoccupied with their own domestic situations. But no one should lose sight of the fact that, while Israel has simply moved off the radar screen for the moment, at least as far as Syria and Hezbollah are concerned, that could change quite quickly. The truth, though, is that many in Israel wouldn't mind if the current internecine battle being waged in Syria were to continue indefinitely, offering Israel, as it has, an unprecedented respite from attacks.

This bullet-riddled wall is where Israeli soldiers were lined up and shot by their Syrian captors in the Yom Kippur War. The building is the former Syrian headquarters on the Golan Heights .

Harper announces first trip to Israel

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Just before serenading 4,000 guests at Sunday night's annual Jewish National Fund (JNF) Negev Dinner with a selection of rock'n'roll hits, Prime Minister Stephen Harper announced he will visit Israel next month.

A playful and relaxed Harper, the gala's honoree, predicted "a great trip" to Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian territories, and reminded the rapt crowd of his staunch and unabashed support for the Jewish state.

Noting that "these are dark days. I just wanted you to know that I understand where you're coming from on this," said Harper.

Calling Israel "a light of freedom and democracy in what is otherwise a region of darkness," he added: "We understand that the future of our country and of our shared civilization depends on the survival and thriving of that free and democratic homeland of the Jewish People in the Middle East.

"And I tell you friends, we understand that. And that's why Israel will always have Canada as a friend in the world," the prime minister said to wide applause and cheers from the crowd at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre.

Netanyahu meets with Pope at Vatican

The Times of Israel

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu met with Pope Francis at the Vatican on Monday, his first encounter with the current Pope.

Pope Francis has previously met at the Vatican with Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas in October and with Israeli President Shimon Peres in April. Netanyahu met with the previous pope, Benedict XVI, in 2009, and with Pope John Paul II in 1997.

Citing an anonymous official Israeli source, CNN reported last week that the Pope was scheduled to make his first visit to Israel in May. The Vatican has not confirmed that report.

Six government ministers joined Netanyahu on the trip to Rome and were set to meet with Italian ministers.

The Pope and the prime minister reportedly discussed negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians, security threats Jerusalem faces in the region from Iran and elsewhere, as well as recent European legislation banning circumcision and kosher slaughter,

Szegedi Opposed

MONTREAL — Opponents of a controversial Dec. 9 visit to Montreal by a former Hungarian neo-fascist leader who has embraced his newfound Jewish roots have been unable to sway organizers from Chabad of Westmount to rescind the invitation. Hungarian-Jewish Holocaust survivor Paul Herczeg and fellow countryman Peter Sipos met with Chabad's Rabbi Yossi Shanowitz, to no avail, they told The CJN. Opponents say the about-face by Csanad Szegedi, 31, is insincere and that he only embraced his Jewish identity after trying unsuccessfully to suppress the news through bribery. Chabad believes he's proved himself, including undergoing ritual circumcision and following Jewish practices under Chabad tutelage.

WORLD

Maccabi Head Dies

MIAMI — Global Jewish leader Guiora Esrubilsky, who presided over last summer's Maccabiah Games in Israel, died Nov. 26 in Miami of a heart attack at 66. The Argentine-born Esrubilsky was elected Maccabi World Union president in May 2010 and was planning to run for re-election of the Maccabi World Union next year. A prominent Argentine businessman based in Florida, he was elected a vice-president of the World Jewish Congress at the World Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly in Budapest in May 2013.

Brit Milah Ordered

JERUSALEM — Jerusalem's rabbinical court upheld a ruling requiring an Israeli mother to circumcise her son or pay a fine of $140 a day. Following the Nov. 24 ruling, the mother said she said would take the case to Israel's Supreme Court, which is a secular court. A Netanya rabbinical court ruled Oct. 29 she must have her son circumcised within a week. The baby, who was born a year ago, wasn't circumcised on the eighth day, as per Jewish custom, due to medical problems, and the father decided to insist he be circumcised when the couple began divorce proceedings in rabbinical court. The Jerusalem court judges indicated the mother could be withholding the procedure as leverage in the divorce, but she told Ha'aretz that after reading about circumcision, "I realized that I couldn't do that to my son." The Jerusalem judges noted the public and legal wrangling against circumcision in the United States and Europe. "The public in Israel stands united against this phenomenon," they wrote, "seeing it as another aspect of the anti-Semitic acts that must be fought."

English School Board To Defy Charter

MONTREAL — The English Montreal School Board (EMSB) has decided it will not comply with certain key provisions of Bill 60, the proposed charter of Quebec values, including the ban on overtly religious wear, if it becomes law.

Syd Wise

On Nov. 27, the public board approved a resolution, moved by commissioner Syd Wise, declaring that it will not adopt any policy to implement any of the related elements of the proposed legislation.

"The EMSB values the diversity of its students and staff and respects their personal and religious rights which are guaranteed both by the Canadian and Quebec charters of rights," Wise stated. "We cannot be party to a proposed legislation, which if passed, runs contrary to what we teach our students insofar as tolerance, respect of individual rights and religious freedoms are concerned."

Bill 60 states that public institutions must adopt policies to implement the charter and post those policies on their websites. The EMSB intends to present a brief at hearings in early 2014.

Iran deal all trust and no verification, critic says

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Rafael Barak's bags hadn't even arrived from Jerusalem before the new Israeli ambassador to Canada took part in a conference call sponsored by the Centre for Jewish and Israel Affairs (CIJA) on the Iranian nuclear deal.

Echoing Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's words, Barak, who officially took up his new post late last month, said that although many consider the Iranian nuclear deal a historic agreement, he considers it a historic mistake.

The hour-long conference call featured Barak, Canadian Foreign Minister John Baird, CIJA CEO Shimon Fogel, and Mark Dubowitz, executive director of the Foundation for Defence of Democracies.

The six-month-long interim deal, which was agreed to by the P5+1 and Iran on Nov. 24, freezes parts of Tehran's nuclear development program in exchange for a decrease of sanctions. Iran will not be allowed to enrich uranium beyond five per cent and must stop its development of the Arak plant. The International Atomic Energy Agency will also get more access for inspections.

"Skeptical" was a word used many times throughout the discussion of the deal.

Baird said the Canadian government would like to see the agreement succeed, but "we believe that countries earn the benefit of the doubt." Iran has not done so, he said, thus he remains "deeply skeptical."

Rafael Barak

Dubowitz, too, said he was wary of the agreement, especially since there's no way to truly ensure that Iran doesn't continue to develop nuclear weapons. The deal may set the program back, but physicists can continue to research other aspects of nuclear development.

If Iran continues its research on weaponization, once the deal expires in six months, the country may not be far from attaining nuclear warheads, he said.

"Geneva is all trust and next to no verifying, which is a very concerning issue," Dubowitz said.

It's not just about nuclear weapons, he added. Through sanctions relief, Iran has saved itself from a financial crisis, and he expects to see "billions of dollars flowing into the country" over the coming months.

Although sanctions relief has been estimated to be worth $7 billion, Dubowitz said if it's factored in that Iran will surely exploit loopholes, $20 billion is a more accurate figure.

Fogel said he worries that Iran is interpreting the agreement as a sign of weakening resolve in the West, and that it's important to distinguish between inducements and incentives. The deal offers the former more than the latter, he said.

"It's effectively trying to coax through concessions and undeserved relief, rather than driving home the point that there is a way for Iran to climb back into the family of nations – that is, coming into the compliance with and adhering to its international regulations," he said.

Despite the agreement, Canada and other countries that are dissatisfied with the deal can continue to pass anti-terrorism legislation, Dubowitz said, and Fogel said Canada should continue to enforce its existing sanctions against Iran.

Barak emphasized the importance of the sanctions, thanking Canada for its support of Israel.

"Iran is a country that is threatening us, and we feel it's something we have to deal with," Barak said, adding that the sanctions have had a positive effect, and thus should not be weakened.

The interim deal "is putting a lot of question marks on the future."

Meaning of Iranian nuclear deal is at best unclear

In his Nov. 25 blog post for the American Interest, Walter Russell Mead, an unusually shrewd analyst, reflected on the nuclear agreement reached in Geneva the day before between the P5+1 powers and Iran:

"[C]olour us unimpressed, both by the agreement and by much of the commentary around it. On the one hand, while we don't rule out a miracle, the chances are stacked against the interim deal producing a final settlement of the Iran nuclear issue. The White House would greatly prefer that nobody think about this for a while, but nuclear deals with countries whose leaders actually want nuclear weapons tend to flop. American negotiators have a long and virtually unbroken record in such cases of bringing home carefully worded agreements, hammered out in difficult meetings, that somehow don't stop the onward march of nukes" (emphasis added).

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

On the other side, a number of commentators, such as Roger Cohen of the New York Times, expressed "hope" that the deal would work and bitterness toward Israeli leadership for raising profound concerns that the deal would almost certainly, and dangerously, flop.

With some exceptions, Canadian editorials expressed skepticism or raised questions about whether the agreement – a six-month interim plan constraining parts of Iran's nuclear program in exchange for limited sanctions relief – would result in the West's long-sought goal: a final, comprehensive agreement guaranteeing that Iran's nuclear program would be confined solely to peaceful civilian use – that is, no nuclear bombs.

"Can Iran's mullahs be trusted?" asked the National Post (Nov. 26). "The world has every reason to be skeptical… Iran has defied the United Nations Security Council, it has defied the International Atomic Energy Agency. Simply put, Iran has not earned the right to have the benefit of the doubt."

The same day, the Globe and Mail expressed more agnosticism than outright skepticism: "The interim deal reached on Iran's nuclear-weapons program is just that: interim. It's a way station on the way to somewhere else. Where? It's still too early to say.

"We know what the West wants out of these negotiations. What's unknown is what the Iranians want, or how much they're willing to give up…

"[Israeli Prime Minister] Benjamin Netanyahu…fears that this means Iran will be able to keep sufficient facilities to build a bomb, just on a slower timetable. The Obama administration believes that it is close to achieving the end of Iran's nuclear-weapons program. Who is right? We don't yet know. But in a few months' time, we will. It's a risk worth taking."

The very next day the Obama administration's guarded optimism that a deal with Iran could be achieved (with stringent controls and an intrusive inspection regime of Iran's nuclear facilities) encountered a serious setback when Iran accused the U.S. State Department, which had posted an analysis of the deal, of misrepresenting what had been agreed to in Geneva.

That was followed by a State Department admission that, despite all the prior wrangling over the terms of the agreement, the Americans couldn't even specify when the six-month interim period was to begin. The failure to have pinned this down allowed Iran a "window" of time to keep enriching fuel as before – that is, toward a weapons-grade level uranium.

The State Department spokesperson, Jen Psaki, was left in the embarrassing position of having to admit that, after more technical details were worked out, it was her "guess" that "the clock would start." (Only at that point would Iran be required to limit its enrichment to five per cent.)

Just how the Americans and the Europeans could not have confirmed the start time of the agreement left a lot of people shaking their heads and pondering what other loopholes remained to be discovered.

To say the least, it was not a promising start.

A first step?

When the deal on Iran was announced, Amos Yadlin quipped that the official reaction in Israel might lead one to think Iran had been given a green light to develop nuclear weapons. The head of the Tel Aviv-based Institute for National Security Studies (and former chief of military intelligence) was responding to comments like Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's "the deal is a historic mistake," former National Security Council head Yaakov Amidror's, "a failure of diplomacy," and Israeli Intelligence Minister Yuval Steinitz's "the deal is based on "deceit and self-delusion."

Skeptics are right to be concerned. But there's lots of daylight between Israel's official, heavy-handed and scornful position and sober analysis of the deal's positive and negative elements. That discussion is ongoing in Israeli security forums and shouldn't be ignored.

To begin with, the interim deal is just that – a framework that allows negotiations to continue. At best, it freezes Iran's capabilities and rolls back several egregious aspects, but doesn't destroy them. Clearly, a permanent deal will have to be far tougher.

This leads to the unresolved debate over the end game. Israel wants to destroy Iran's capability to develop nuclear weaponry and so far has insisted on removing all enriched uranium. (Iran can enrich its low-grade civilian use uranium to nuclear-weapons levels within a few months.) But the interim agreement implicitly acknowledges that Iran will continue to enrich civilian-use uranium in future, giving it more leeway than previous UN Security Council resolutions. This critical question will have to be addressed.

There are numerous other issues to consider and forthcoming negotiations may well fall apart. If the West stays firm, then failure will clearly be Iran's fault. But if the Geneva negotiations had failed, Iran would have forged ahead with construction of its heavy water plant for plutonium enrichment, uranium enrichment would have continued, sanctions might have cracked and Israel would be blamed for pressing for a deal that would bring Iran to its knees.

The issue of trust has been invoked frequently in the last 10 days. When it comes to Iran, assume it can't be trusted, but wants to ease the crippling burden on its economy. That's why the sanctions regime must hold tight now without further reductions and why monitoring mechanisms must be strictly executed by the International Atomic Energy Agency and adhered to by Iran during the interim period.

At core, though, is the question of Israelis' trust in U.S. President Barack Obama. They know his (and the American public's) aversion to military action and don't believe his assurance that all options remain on the table. To make a permanent deal happen, Obama has to work hard with hardliners in Washington who oppose the interim deal and may try to undo even what's already been agreed to and, most importantly, to assuage Israeli concerns.

Finding common ground depends on Israel, too, and one can only hope that rhetoric is quickly replaced by substantive, co-operative dialogue. Because so far, at least, a deal is better than no deal, and it's certainly better than a risk-fraught Israeli strike. And if successful, it might be a first step toward defanging Iran as the key destabilizing force in the region.

Synagogues need to be relevant

While it is gratifying to note ("Conservative shuls wrestle with non-Jews in pews," The CJN, Nov. 21) that rabbis recognizing that the Conservative movement is in trouble are "being challenged to rethink positions that in the past we accepted almost as dogma," the focus on how to involve or integrate intermarried families into shul rituals is, with the greatest respect, missing the bigger challenge. The real question is, "How do we make the synagogue experience relevant once again to any and all of its congregants and attendees?"

While it is true that the length of the service, who can or cannot take part in the service, and how, ought to be examined, what the rabbis ought to be really debating is the role of the clergy and the synagogue itself in the lives of the people they are trying to reach. If the synagogue is no longer the only place where Jews can safely gather and say, the Toronto Jewish Film Festival or Aroma seem to be viable alternatives, clergy have no choice but to see themselves in a different light.

Synagogue leadership must find ways to make their "house" the primary gathering place for Jews once again, a place where intimacy and spirituality can together be sought or found with both clergy and fellow Jews. Programs that create intimacy, warmth, a welcoming atmosphere with increased spirituality as a goal, and that attract our young people, must be explored and tried, because a "talk to you service" in a language that many do not understand, that requires silence unless voices are joined in prayer and that was copied from the church is simply not working for us anymore.

Mulcair's policies criticized

It's nice to know that NDP Leader Thomas Mulcair would make Canada a real "player" in the peace process if, God forbid, the NDP would form a government ("NDP gov't would be Mideast player: Mulcair, The CJN, Nov. 21). It's no secret which geopolitical interests and constituencies Mulcair must cater to in order to maintain his party's status as Her Majesty's "loyal" opposition. Canada's Jewish community, regardless of which faction he considers most sympathetic, isn't one of them.

His Quebec electoral base has been historically indifferent to foreign relations at the best of times and very cool to Israel's position vis-a-vis the Palestinians, according to countless polls over many years. Quebec's overrepresented contribution to UN officialdom and the attitudes of Quebec's many personnel in Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs are hardly a secret. Any skillful interview with Mulcair should de-emphasize the Middle East, but ask him about his position on the Boundaries Extension Act, should Quebec decide to separate unilaterally. Then we'd all see where he really stands.

Iran continues funding violence

It is interesting that with the recent agreement supposedly slowing down Iran's program to build atomic weapons that there has been no comment about the negative effects of lifting many of the sanctions against Iran.

For starters, Iran now has more funds available to support terrorist groups such as Hezbollah and Hamas and to continue funding the murderous regime of President Bashar Assad of Syria. I guess in diplomatic circles it would be considered impolite to raise those issues throughout the many hours of discussions that led to this dubious interim accord. Presumably, the handshakes at the conclusion of the meeting failed to take note of the blood on the hands of the Iranian representatives.

Shul memorabilia sought

In 2014, the First Narayever Congregation, downtown Toronto's traditional egalitarian synagogue, will celebrate its 100th anniversary. In preparation for our centennial, we are seeking memorabilia (photos, documents, programs, newsletters, etc.), as well as memories and stories from families who were connected with the shul or the surrounding neighbourhood during its century of history. If you can help, please contact the synagogue office at 416-927-0546 or centennialcelebrations@narayever.ca.

Rob Ford and the dangers to kosher speech

Dave Gordon
Special to The CJN

After months of allegations and suspicions, several weeks ago, Toronto's embattled Mayor Rob Ford ignited a media firestorm by admitting to smoking and buying crack cocaine while serving as mayor.

Reports of Ford's behaviour circulated around the globe, punctuated by late-night television satire, but two experts on kosher speech say there are limits to how much information we should consume, and how much we ought to share at the water cooler if we are to be sensitive to gossip and its perils.

There's a difference between freedom of speech and kosher speech, says one authority, even when what's being said is true.

"Lashon hara [literally, bad language] by definition has to be true. Yet just because it's true, doesn't give you the license to tell other people," said editor and publisher Danny Levy of Mazal Elul Congregation in Brooklyn, N.Y.

"If everything is hearsay, and nothing's proven factually, you can't report on it even if it's commonly heard. You have to have your hands on the proof before even talking about it."

Levy is publisher and editor of a series of books by the early-20th-century Polish rabbi Israel Meir Kagan. Rabbi Kagan – also known as the Chafetz Chaim – developed renown for his elucidation and clarification of the laws of lashon hara. Levy is the first to translate a complete series of Rabbi Kagan's books in English.

The Chafetz Chaim, Levy noted, says there is no victimless talk when one speaks degradingly of another person.

"[This is] especially true when any language evokes financial harm, physical harm, fear, conflict or anguish. It doesn't touch on the concept of true or not true," Levy says, quoting the Rambam.

"The Torah outlines a real structure for what's permitted to speak and listen to."

Toronto Mayor Rob Ford [Dave Gordon photo]

The Torah tells the Jewish people not to be talebearers and gossipmongers (Leviticus 19:16).

Despite good intentions, when Miriam critiqued Moses to her brother Aaron, she is punished by God with a serious skin condition.

Unkosher speech can be seen in daily life in various forms.

One example is telling an otherwise uninvolved third-party about a quibble you had with another.

It can be a facial expression when discussing another person.

It can be forwarding, or CCing to another, an email with incriminating or potentially embarrassing information.

In a work setting, human resource professionals must dodge the conversation when hearing about personal issues from others pertaining to an applicant.

Ethically and halachically, discussing these issues in an interview setting is strictly forbidden.

Lashon hara, after all, is considered by the sages to be one of the worst sins committed, equal to murder, adultery, and idol worship combined (Tractate Peah 1:1 and Talmud Arachin 15a).

That's because it can destroy reputations, tear apart relationships and humiliate victims.

A victim of ruinous speech doesn't have to forgive the speaker of lashon hara, since the harm cannot be undone, according to the Jerusalem Talmud, "because the damage just goes on and on," as Rabbi Joseph Telushkin says in an online video from SinaiLive.

"They can't reach all of the people they spoke to... so you've suffered irrevocable damage."

Rabbi Telushkin is author of several books on Jewish ethics, including a book on the topic of gossip, Words That Hurt, Words That Heal: How to Choose Words Wisely and Well.

"All human beings have things in their lives they want hidden," he told The CJN.

"It is wrong to go around unearthing secrets in other people's lives, knowing there are secrets in our own lives that would be embarrassing if they became known."

In terms of the public's right to know scandalous information about a politician, Rabbi Telushkin, however, draws a distinction between the personal and the public.

"Let's say you uncover the fact that a politician is committing adultery. I don't think that's the public's business," he said.

"But if he says adultery is fine, or makes no effort to hide it, then he's flagrantly showing his lack of respect."

In terms of politicians, holding public office generally means adhering to society's behavioural standards.

"If someone is flouting them, as from what I understand Ford is, then he is in a sense introducing it into the public discourse," says Rabbi Telushkin.

"With public drunkenness and boorishness, if you present yourself that way and do so consistently... common sensibly, you lose the right that people are going to keep those secrets for you."

Levy agreed, saying that "it's out of the bag. It's out in the open."

Still, he said, "water-cooler discussion" about politicians' indiscretions often do devolve into character-maligning gossip, even if unintentionally.

That risks causing the listeners to become desensitized to gossip. As well, the speakers will tend to associate the subject only with negative traits.

"Even when one speaks negatively about him, one should not lose sight of the things that are positive about him... you don't have to speak about the person in a particularly demeaning way," Rabbi Telushkin said, adding that one should not talk about a person's flaws excessively or read about the minutiae of each scandal.

"One of the ideas behind lashon hara is that the person [discussed] becomes exclusively identified with the nasty things in their lives."

Dave Gordon is a freelance journalist whose work has appeared in some 40 publications worldwide and who has co-edited a volume of the Chafetz Chaim's work dedicated to lashon hara.

Kosher speech: some definitions

Shmirat halashon – laws of kosher speech

Lashon hara – true speech about someone that could change a listener's perspective about the person, usually for the worse, and causes damage to the person (in reputation, finances, emotional anguish or otherwise)

Rechilut – sharing information about a person in a way that causes hatred toward the subject, or between the listener and the subject.

Motze shem ra – negative speech about another person that includes a fabrication

A coalition of conscience must denounce Quebec charter

Gil Troy
in Montreal

In politics as in engineering, subtleties count. Just as you can't make a workable machine based on approximate measurements, because nothing will fit, you can't function effectively with sloppy terminology and blurred distinctions, because nothing will make sense. Unfortunately, Quebec has recently witnessed an epidemic of slackness and Orwellian absurdity that has inflamed tensions and darkened the collective mood, within the Jewish community and beyond. Misleaders take note: sponsorship is not censorship, and oppression is not freedom.

In November, the decision my Montreal's Federation CJA to disinvite harsh anti-Israel critics from Le Mood, the festival of Jewish learning it sponsors, triggered a predictable – but hypocritical – outcry. The speakers violated the mainstream Jewish consensus by rejecting Israel's right to exist and associating with organizations that spread the lie connecting Israel to the discredited South African apartheid regime. Inevitably, their supporters yelled "censorship."

Pulling sponsorship isn't censorship. In open societies like Canada, it's hard to censor – meaning ban – speech. Governments shouldn't suppress speech; that would be censorship. But why should a communal organization underwrite, sponsor or pay for speakers who reject the community's consensus values? Do feminists host male chauvinists at their conferences, or do gays host opponents of gay marriage so that everyone learns all points of view?

Moreover, cries of suppression are hard to believe when Israel's ideological enemies make their case in so many forums – on campus, in the blogosphere and through the media. Federation CJA sponsors, underwrites and pays for a much broader and diverse range of speakers than many other communities do. Hopefully, in the future, the many people who represent the Jewish community will beware inviting Israel-haters to communal events to avoid the messiness of disinviting them. But Federation CJA was justified in defending its core values and refusing to bankroll Israel-haters.

At the same time, we've recently seen a growing distortion in the debate over the Parti Québécois' authoritarian charter of values, which should be called the charter that devalues diversity. This initiative concerns possible government actions where the bias should favour maximizing freedom and individual autonomy.

In their desperate attempt to justify this unjustifiable assault on freedom, individualism and religious liberty, separatist extremists are committing acts of historical hijacking. In their Nov. 18 letter to the New York Times, Quebec's minister for democratic institutions, Bernard Drainville, and its minister responsible for the Montreal region and international affairs, Jean-Francois Lisée, invoked one of America's patron saints of liberty, Thomas Jefferson, to rationalize the Quebec government's current onslaught against religious freedom.

Demonstrating shocking ignorance of Jefferson and America's liberal democratic philosophy, the two mentioned Jefferson's commitment to building a "wall of separation between church and state" to support the Parti Québécois' proposed ban on public employees wearing "conspicuous religious symbols on the job," in a province where even librarians and doctors would be defined as public employees.

What they missed is that America's founders wanted separation of church and state to protect church from state. Jefferson defended liberty and individualism throughout his career, including religious freedom. Invoking Jefferson to justify this illiberal, authoritarian law is like invoking Albert Einstein to support medical quackery.

I invite the two ministers – along with the Jewish community's "Le Mood" critics – to enroll in one of my U.S. history courses at McGill University to learn who Jefferson was, what the United States stands for, and what freedom and tolerance, pluralism and autonomy, truly are.

While studying, they'll learn that Quebec is now demonstrating a classic pathology. Demagogic politicians started this initiative to win votes among those more motivated by anti-Muslim and anti-immigrant sentiment than anti-Semitic sentiment per se. But we're seeing a monster being unleashed. In stirring fears of the "other," we're seeing difference demeaned, individuals menaced and true oppression looming.

These political demagogues are to blame for every act of harassment, physical or verbal, directed against any hijab-, sheitel-, kippah- or turban-wearer. In an act of cynicism and shortsightedness, leaders played to the worst instincts of their most extreme supporters, thus validating ugly behaviour from the top. Leaders in a democracy are supposed to appeal to our better angels. We let dictators do the kind of damage now being done to Quebec's delicate social fabric.

We need a coalition of conscience throughout Canada – but led by our French Canadian brothers and sisters – to stand strong and denounce this, in the name of democracy, pluralism and not that word I hate, tolerance, but rather real, respectful acceptance of each other's freedom to be different.

Rob Ford and the lessons we teach our kids

Urban Writer
Avrum Rosensweig

It's difficult to understand the motivations behind the lessons we teach our children.

When I was little, I was told by parents and teachers that name-calling is wrong. The lesson I digested was that it's inappropriate to speak disparagingly of others, particularly if my words act like slings and darts and cause great pain. As Jews, we're instructed by our sages to speak cleanly, to use lashon nakee (pure speech).

Although it was said that "names can never hurt you," the truth is they can. We've all felt the sting of verbal affronts. It can be agonizing to be called an idiot, a fool or a loser.

Yet when Toronto Mayor Rob Ford's life began teetering, that lesson – not to partake in name-calling, the one we continue to teach our children today – completely faded away for so many, almost as if it never existed.

Barrages of invectives and abusive tirades began showing up, without excuses, in newspaper headlines, email threads, online articles and interviews, and in conversations between individuals.

Ford was regularly referred to as a buffoon and fat. For some reason, it seemed to be open season on our mayor's weight, as if his fall from political grace was tied to his generous girth. Late-night television shows labelled Ford the younger brother of an overweight comedian who passed away a few years ago.

Ford has been called "scum" in conversations I've heard, a name generally reserved for the lowest of the low in our society, like bikers or individuals who rip off the elderly. The shine of our mayoralty has dropped like concrete falling off a cliff, and Ford has revealed the cracks of his character in a way that few of us want to see.

I think this husband and father has done something that's truly anathema to the Canadian way – he has shown his weakness, and the wretched side of his spirit. While we felt sick to our stomachs, we called him names – the exact thing we tell our children not to do – and we did so because we felt compelled to tuck Ford's fat away, back into his pants, so we couldn't see it, and perhaps fool ourselves into believing it was no longer there.

Ford has made many Torontonians and Canadians wriggle in their seats. The fact he's a large man who doesn't follow the rules of this culture embarrasses us, because we do our ever-best to avoid seeming, feeling or looking fat.

The Canadian way is to hide the blemishes under layers of defensiveness and never mention this "hideous" physical defect. So when Ford's tie is undone and his waist prominent, we turn red with disgust, because within his extra poundage, we see our own cellulite and lumpiness. We are a judgmental society that leaps at opportunities to take a pound of flesh from someone else, particularly if they're in the public domain. So we call them scummy and useless, even though we know their children, and ours, are hearing these epithets.

Why? Because it makes us feel better about ourselves.

I believe Ford should leave his position immediately, because he's under police investigation, has admitted to doing very illegal things and simply is not living up to the expectations of a "moral mayor." I think it does matter what a mayor does in his private life, and it certainly makes a difference that the man in charge of our budgets and police force drives while inebriated.

I think an apology should be forthcoming, however, from the people of our city and all of those on-air hosts who made fun of this man with no concern for his reputation or theirs, and what we refer to as fair play.

I think, too, that we should be introspective and dig deeply to determine what it is about Ford and his actions that has turned much of the public into a mob, unconcerned with the societal ramifications of verbally tearing this man apart, cutting him into pieces through name-calling.

Why do we really care if our children call each other names?

UJA Federation CEO plans to step down

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

By next year at this time, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto will have a new CEO in place, Ted Sokolsky, federation's president and CEO, announced last week at the organization's annual general meeting.

"The clock is ticking and this is an organization that plans for the future... Since I turned 62, I knew it was time to press the clock, and accordingly, the board will now begin a search for a new CEO to replace me. If all goes well, a year from now, we'll have a new CEO," Sokolsky said, adding that he plans to help his replacement transition into the role.

"This September marked my 27th year at UJA Federation and my 10th year as CEO. This is also the month I turned 62... I had always planned to retire at 65," he said.

Following his announcement, Richard Venn, the chair of the board of directors, thanked Sokolsky for his years of leadership and highlighted some of his major accomplishments.

"Looking back, over Ted's leadership, the annual campaign has doubled to over $60 million," Venn said, adding that throughout Sokolsky's tenure, federation built the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life at the University of Toronto, as well as the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus and the Schwartz-Reisman Centre in Vaughan; completed the expansion of the Lipa Green Centre, and renovated and reopened the Miles Nadal JCC.

"The infrastructure that UJA Federation will enjoy for generations to come is certainly Ted's legacy for all of us. We will be forever grateful for his perseverance and determination," Venn said.

Ted Sokolsky

Morris Perlis, the federation board of directors' senior vice-chair, is heading a search committee that will begin its search in the next calendar year, "with the expectation of having a new CEO fully engaged by the next AGM," he said.

"We want to maintain the momentum of the fundraising projects and programs that are underway," Venn added.

One of federation's biggest priorities is the continued development of the Sherman Campus, on Bathurst Street between Sheppard and Finch avenues.

As of last March, federation had raised $100 million for the campus and still needed to raise another $35- to $40 million.

Its family of buildings will replace the old Bathurst Jewish Community Centre and Leah Posluns Theatre, which were demolished in 2009. So far, only the Lipa Green Centre and the Gales Family Pavilion have been completed.

"The federation has a huge and daunting agenda ahead in the year to come just to continue to deliver on the promises and commitments we have undertaken to date," Sokolsky said.

He said the goal is to break ground on the next phase of the Sherman Campus development in late 2014 or early 2015.

According to a handout at the meeting, the start of Phase 2 depends on "sufficient donor funds, municipal approvals and approval by UJA Federation's board of directors. The project will take approximately 24 to 30 months from the start of construction to completion of these new facilities."

Throughout the meeting – which featured a keynote address by Irvin Studin, editor-in-chief and publisher of Global Brief, an international affairs magazine – federation leaders highlighted the organization's programming and financial successes throughout the past year.

According to the handout, federation's total revenue from all sources increased to $142.7 million in 2013 from $87 million in 2012. The value of its assets increased to $462 million, from $445 million, and the return on foundation investments was 10 per cent this year, compared to 0.3 per cent last year.

"The current year shows a significant increase primarily due to one-time donor-designated gifts," said federation council member Jeff Cohen.

"Combining annual revenue for the year of $142 million is a significant leap from the prior year due to an increase in one-time designated gifts, an increase in annual campaign gifts, an increase in gifts to the Jewish Foundation [of Greater Toronto] and a significant increase in income from securities."

From the $60 million raised during the 2012 UJA Campaign, $52.5 million has been allocated to programs including Israel/overseas and national programs, which received nearly $17 million, formal Jewish education, which received $12 million and social service programs, which received $6 million.

Despite the financial successes, Sokolsky said the Pew Research Centre survey of U.S. Jews that reported high intermarriage rates reminded him to "never rest on your laurels and you can never stop tapping into the passions of the next generation."

Trudeau backs Israel, slams Quebec charter

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Days before Prime Minister Stephen Harper was feted by the Jewish National Fund at its annual Negev Dinner, Liberal Party Leader Justin Trudeau appeared before a friendly audience in a Toronto synagogue to present his vision as a potential future prime minister of Canada.

His message was one of steadfast support for the State of Israel as a fellow democracy, backing for international negotiations with Iran to curtail its nuclear program, opposition to the proposed Quebec charter of values as an attack on minorities, including Jews, and an economic approach that would tackle income inequality with a policy for growth, education and international trade.

Trudeau also took part in a Chanukiyah-lighting ceremony at Beth Tikvah Synagogue during his Nov. 28 visit. He was the first speaker in the shul's Visions for Canada series, which will feature representatives of the three main national political parties speaking on issues of concern to the Jewish community.

In a brief interview with The CJN, Trudeau was asked how the Liberals could recoup some of the political support within the Jewish community that the party has lost in recent years to the Tories, in part due to the latter's backing of Israel.

Trudeau acknowledged Harper's "strong and steadfast support for Israel," but he said the Tories have used that support as a "competition point" to attract voters.

"I feel all parties should be equal in our support of Israel, the only democracy in a very challenging region," Trudeau said.

Later, during a public question-and-answer session, when asked by Beth Tikvah spiritual leader Rabbi Jarrod Grover about support for Israel, Trudeau said, "No question that Canada must always be a strong, true friend of Israel," and he accused the Conservatives of turning that support into "a divisive political issue."

Justin Trudeau

Harper and the Tories aren't the only ones to back the Jewish state, he noted. Former Liberal prime minister Paul Martin had shifted Canadian policy on Israel to one that was more supportive at the United Nations, he said.

As for the Iranian nuclear program, Trudeau said it "poses an existential threat to Israel, but goes far beyond that. It poses an existential threat to the Middle East and to the world."

"It is clear that a nuclear-armed Iran is unacceptable."

The recent agreement negotiated by the P5+1 countries, a group that includes the United States and several western European nations, "is a positive step," he said.

But, he cautioned, "it will require an awful lot of vigilance and attention to make sure Iran lives up to its obligations in the next six months."

As for Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's concerns that the deal is a mistake, Trudeau said, "While I understand the skepticism of the Israeli prime minister, I choose to be optimistic."

Asked about Quebec's charter of values, Trudeau called it an attack on the province's minorities.

If you focus too much on its effects on fundamental freedoms, "you already miss the point," he said. It's not about values and solidifying a secular state. "It's about politics."

The Parti Québécois, which governs Quebec, is faced with a poor economy, he said. "They don't want to fight a battle on the economy. So they do what they do, fall back on identity politics, us versus them."

Trudeau called it "a deeply cynical exercise. This is an invented problem by people looking to change the channel."

Questioned on income inequality, Trudeau described it as "the great challenge of our time."

In the past 30 years, the economy has expanded by 110 per cent while median incomes have risen by 14 to 15 per cent. From the 1950s to 1970s, 100 per cent economic growth was matched by 50 per cent income growth, he noted.

Trudeau said he would focus on the importance of education, preparing young people for the new economy, whether in universities, colleges or trade schools.

He also advocated global investment and support for trade initiatives. Companies that engage in international trade pay wages that are 50 per cent higher that those that do not, he said.

"The best way to grow the economy is from the middle out and not the top down," he added.

With the microphone open to the audience, Trudeau was asked his views on issues such as Senate reform – he's against another round of constitutional talks like Meech Lake; the national anthem's French lyrics, which call on Canadians to carry the cross and guns – it's not a priority at this time; free trade – "the Liberal Party is a pro-free trade party," and public health care – he's for it, but it needs "a comprehensive rethink."

Canada and Israel, he said, share common values as well as common threats – "the same threats that we face in Canada and throughout the western world."

Details of Harper's trip were unavailable at The CJN's Monday morning deadline.

A statement from Harper's office said Canada "recognizes the importance of building inclusive and stable societies underpinned by democracy, freedom, human rights and the rule of law. Our government will continue to take a strong, principled stand internationally, including at the United Nations, on all matters related to Israel and the Middle East.

"I look forward to visiting the Middle East early next year to explore ways of strengthening peace and security, stimulating sustainable economic growth, and promoting essential Canadian values, such as tolerance and human rights, across the region," Harper said in the statement.

He called the dinner "a show of affection, of love, and I really appreciate that. And I want to show you a little bit of affection and love in return."

To the surprise of attendees, Harper then introduced Herringbone, the Ottawa-based rock band in which he plays keyboards and sings. With the prime minister on lead vocals, the band played a series of rock classics, including Neil Diamond's crowd-pleasing Sweet Caroline and the Beatles' Hey Jude.

Many in the crowd left as Harper was still singing.

In September, the JNF announced that a project in Israel would be named after Harper.

The Stephen J. Harper Hula Valley Bird Sanctuary Visitor and Education Centre will be located in the northern Hula Valley, a wetlands region that serves as a passageway for migrating birds.

The project calls for a 4,000-square-metre visitor's centre bearing Harper's name to be built in the Hula Lake Nature and Bird Park. Canadian Press called it "a sure-fire photo-op for Harper's eventual trip to Israel."

JNF Canada has raised nearly $6 million for the project. "I'm glad to say this will be our best campaign in our 65-year history," Josh Cooper, JNF's national CEO, told CP.

"The project will bring jobs to the region. It will be an epicentre for environmentalists, for birders from all over the world, to learn and study birds together in Israel," Cooper said.

In 2000, Jean Chrétien became the first sitting Canadian prime minister to visit Israel.

Serving as MCs at the dinner were Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird and Employment and Multiculturalism Minister Jason Kenney, who called Harper's Conservatives "the first and only Canadian government to acknowledge" Canada's "shameful" none-is-too-many policy on admitting war-era Jewish refugees from Europe.

To cheers, Kenney said the government is building a national Holocaust monument in Ottawa, and has invested $100 million in a human rights museum in Winnipeg, where the Holocaust will be front and centre.

Also in attendance was Israel's new ambassador to Canada, Rafael Barak, who praised Harper.

"Your friendship is just not talk, but is evident in your actions on the global stage," Barak said prior to Harper's speech. "We are truly touched by your friendship and we admire your integrity."

Sending regards via videotape was Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, who lauded Harper for "unabashedly, unapologetically," standing up for Israel.

Harper is "a real leader who stood up for Israel time and again," Netanyahu said. "He doesn't want to be politically correct. He wants to be correct." For his "clarity of conviction and thought, I salute you, Stephen."

Dinner co-chairs were Sen. Linda Frum and her husband, businessman Howard Sokolowski.

Linitzer Benefit Society turns 100

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

The Linitzer Benefit Society started up in 1913 as a relief society for immigrants from the town of Linitz in Ukraine.

Now, 100 years later, the society, which has about 370 members ages 35 to 90, concentrates on helping others.

Morris Manna, honorary president, and a member for 35 years, said when Linitzer started up, all society members came from Linitz.

"These people came to Canada as strangers, and they turned to each other for support. The society helped out when a member got sick, had to make a funeral for a loved one, or lost their job. It helped relieve financial pressures," Manna said.

"It was also a place to meet up with each other. Linitzer was the glue that brought loose people together."

As the society grew, he said, it invested in its first group of plots at Dawes Road Cemetery, and eventually bought into Bathurst Lawn Cemetery, where it's now the largest landowner.

"Burial rights have become a very important part of the society. Originally, only men joined, and women were entitled to burial rights. As the society became more progressive, however, women became equal members. It also started accepting those without a connection to Linitz.

"Now we look for members who can assist the society with its goals: helping support Israel, standing behind the Jewish community and fundraising."

Over the years, he said, the society has raised money for a number of charities, including an endowment for a student to attend Hebrew University of Jerusalem, a $25,000 donation to Shaare Zedek Hospital in Jerusalem on Linitzer's 50th anniversary, "and as far back as World War II, we assisted Canada by donating a mobile dental clinic."

In honour of its 100th anniversary, the society held a gala dinner and donated $25,000 to the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind.

Andy Mayer, who joined Linitzer 57 years ago, said the organization is as active now as it's ever been.

"We try to get in there and help out the community. For 45 years, we have been running a bingo with proceeds aimed at underprivileged children. We're currently working on a casino night, which will help out Autism Ontario and the Canadian Diabetes Association."

He is the society's "hospitaler," he said. "I phone or visit any member who becomes ill, and I report back to the other members."

The secret to the group's success over the years, said Jeffrey Leuchter, a "newcomer" who joined Linitzer 20 years ago, is that members are determined that it should be more than a burial society.

"We have Sunday-morning breakfasts with speakers, holiday parties, card nights and barbecues. Everything is subsidized by the society, because we want to make sure everyone can come out."

The group runs events that attract young families, Leuchter said, because "many of them can't afford synagogue dues, and are looking for organizations that are family friendly. This is where we come in."

He said the social aspect of the society is crucial. "Too many societies charge annual dues and offer nothing but a cemetery plot."

Mayer said the Linitzer has been approached by other societies that are interested in amalgamating, "but we're growing on our own and we're looking for young blood."

When he joined, he said, he was 30 years old "and the original Linitzers were dying off. I was the second generation. I'm happy to see new generations join us."

Their challenge, he said, is to train the young members to eventually take over. "They will need to handle the finances and protect our dynamic organization."

Teen who 'Roared' passes away at 16

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

The teenager who touched the hearts of more than one million people passed away Nov. 25 after two years of fighting an inoperable brain tumour.

Olivia Wise was just 16 years old.

Olivia Wise

In early October, shortly after finding out there were no other options for treatment, the teenager recorded a cover of Katy Perry's song Roar, and six weeks ago, it was posted to YouTube. More than one million people have since watched the video, and many commented on her spirit, singing with such strength even in the face of a terminal illness.

The video's popularity soared and even reached the pop star herself, who responded to Wise via video and later tweeted after Wise's passing.

"Olivia Wise, I can hear you singing with the angels now. Your spirit and strength has inspired me and so many others... May you rest in peace," Perry wrote in he tweet.

Hundreds of high school and university students took part in an initiative organized by Hillel of Greater Toronto in which they paid tribute to Wise through a video and physical scrapbook with messages of hope for her.

The family has released the cover of Roar on iTunes and CD Baby, as well as an original song, Simple Girl, that Wise wrote when she was 11. She sang the songs in a Toronto studio with producer Jon Levine, who later added music behind Wise's voice in Simple Girl.

Proceeds from both songs will go to the Liv Wise Fund, which her family set up through the SickKids Foundation and which will donate money to support children with cancer, as well as brain cancer research.

The Liv Wise Fund has raised more than $158,000, surpassing its goal of $150,000. It's new goal is $250,000.

Wise's cousin, Jeff Kassel, told the The CJN that Wise died peacefully in her home surrounded by her family.

The Liv Wise Fund can be found at LivWiseFund.com.

Baby food collected for food banks

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Members of Hillel of Greater Toronto ran a two-day baby food drive after York University student Ariella Markus, learned that it was the most needed product at food banks.

"[Food bank users] can't afford to buy it at the store, but they also can't get it from a food bank," she said.

Since people typically don't have baby food sitting in their homes ready for donation, Hillel members sat outside two Thornhill, Ont., grocery stores on Nov. 21 and Nov. 26 to ask customers for food and cash donations.

This is Markus' third year running the drive and her second year working with Hillel and the Children's Studies Students Association at York, where she is a fourth-year student majoring in both Jewish studies and children's studies.

In total, the students collected more than 500 baby food items, which were donated to the Richmond Hill Food bank and to Chasdei Kaduri, a local kosher food bank for Jewish families in York Region. They also collected $200 in cash, which was donated to the Richmond Hill Food Bank and will be allocated for baby food purchases.

Charter debate has cross-Canada implications

Joe Oliver

As a Quebecer in my youth, it's more with sadness than anger that I consider the proposed charter of Quebec values. This is a painful and complex subject, but I will provide an overview of its content and then its political implications.

My concern, shared by many other Canadians, is that the charter would undermine freedom of religious expression and make religious minorities feel unwelcome in Quebec. It would force the most devout to leave the province, as for example a Sikh or Orthodox Jewish physician who would not be able to wear his turban or kippah while attending in a hospital. It would also foster social divisiveness, when inclusiveness is so important in a diverse society.

Bill 60, the version tabled in the National Assembly, goes further than the original proposal, threatening practices the Jewish community has taken for granted for as long as memory serves. For example, Jewish public school students who take a vacation on Yom Kippur may be targeted. Matzah served at a public school during Passover would be problematic, since one of its functions is clearly to teach a religious lesson. Contractors doing business with the provincial government will not be able to wear religious headgear or "other adornments which, by their ostentatious nature, overtly indicate a religious affiliation."

These restrictions offend a fundamental Canadian value: everyone living here, whatever his or her race, religion or country of origin, should be treated respectfully and have an equal opportunity to be a fully contributing Canadian. I am proud that Prime Minister Stephen Harper has promised that if the legislation is passed and is clearly discriminatory, the federal government will take action.

So what is the political context?

Diminishing the right to religious expression is a serious issue. Clearly, it should not be exploited as a pre-election appeal to a political party's base at a time when difficult economic conditions may be eroding its popular support. Nor should it be employed to advance identity politics in the guise of an attempt to delineate reasonable accommodation in a secular society.

At the moment, it appears unlikely the minority Parti Québécois government will attract the votes it needs to pass the bill. That raises the possibility that bitterness flowing from its defeat would propel the government to an electoral majority. With the elusive "winning conditions" apparently achieved, a referendum to separate could follow, with all the disruption and existential risk that would entail for Canada.

Reasonable accommodation of minorities has been extensively debated in Quebec. Still, changing demographics are clearly keeping this debate very much alive. How the charter issue is resolved could have profound implications not only for Quebec, but for the rest of Canada. Let us hope that Quebecers opt for a result that reflects their best values and the interests of all Canadians.

Joe Oliver is the MP for the Toronto riding of Eglinton-Lawrence.

Cotler honoured by Shaare Zedek

Sheila Dropkin
Special to The CJN

Liberal member of Parliament and former justice minister Irwin Cotler was the recipient of the Kurt and Edith Rothschild Humanitarian Award at the recent annual Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation's From the Heart gala.

"Irwin was the unanimous choice, in recognition of his outstanding leadership and vision," said Bernie Abrams, who, with Norman Bacal co-chaired the event, this year co-sponsored by Beth Tzedec Congregation of Toronto.

"My father taught me the imperative of righteousness, justice and charity, the three English words for tzedec," Cotler said on accepting the award. "My mother taught me that, in order to pursue justice, one must feel injustice. We have a duty of remembrance of the horrors. Not all the victims of the Shoah were Jewish, but all Jews were affected by it."

Irwin Cotler

In addition to teaching law at McGill University and his parliamentary work, Cotler has been a leader in pursuit of justice for such causes as Soviet Jewry, Nelson Mandela, the late Argentine journalist Jacobo Timerman and victims of the brutal uprisings in Darfur and Rwanda.

Cotler's wife, Ariela, is a former director of the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation office in Montreal, and his mother-in-law, a Jerusalem resident, has been a volunteer at the hospital.

Proceeds from the gala will support the hospital's Israel Defence Forces clinic and the renewal of the synagogue.

"In Israel, every hospital has to prepare for war," said Jonathan Halevy, Shaare Zedek's director general. "During wartime, the IDF takes over."

The presentation to Cotler was made by Senator Linda Frum before an audience of several hundred supporters.

"Irwin has directed his intellect and energies to promote human rights around the world," Frum said. "He is a gifted teacher, whose moral courage taught and inspired me. Everything that I've done for justice, I've learned from Prof. Cotler."

Gideon Raff, executive producer and director of the TV series Homeland was interviewed on stage by National Post editor Jonathan Kay to conclude the evening. Born in Jerusalem, Raff is a former paratrooper with the Israel Air Force. He was the originator of the Israeli hit TV series Prisoners of War, on which Homeland is based.

The first season of the Israeli series was written from the perspective of the returning prisoners, and the second was more about those who are still imprisoned and gave insight to the captors, Raff said. "It makes people cry... Homeland is more of a thriller."

Ex-coach to look at Jews' contribution to basketball

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Check the rosters of the 30 NBA teams, and you'll find only a couple of Jewish guys among them.

It's surprising, if not mind-boggling, that at one time, Jews were everywhere in professional basketball.

The first basket ever scored in the NBA was drained by a Jewish player for the New York Knicks – Ozzie Schectman – in the first ever NBA game in November 1946, right here in Toronto versus the Huskies, no less.

The decline in Jewish participation in the sport since those heady days has been pretty dramatic, about as significant in the dropoff in other sports like boxing. Yet Jews continue to play an important role in the sport, at least at the coaching level.

One of the most successful hoops coaches that Canada has ever produced will discuss the Jewish involvement in the sport at an evening program at the Beth Tzedec Congregation on Dec. 4., 7:30 p.m.

Titled, "The First Basket; Jews and Basketball," the lecture is part of the synagogue's "Jews in Sports" series.

The program includes the screening of the film, The First Basket; A Jewish Basketball Documentary, followed by a discussion led by Mike Katz.

Katz coached the University of Toronto for seven years, where he won both OUA and CIS coach of the year honours in 2007-08.

Prior to joining the Varsity Blues, Katz led the Humber College men's basketball team for 19 seasons, amassing a record of 503-175. He led the Hawks to seven provincial championships and five national titles.

Along the way he was named Ontario Colleges Athletic Association coach of the year four times and Canadian Collegiate Athletic Association coach of the year three times. He was inducted into the Humber Varsity Hall of Fame in 2004.

He also served as assistant coach of the Canadian basketball team at the 1994 and 2002 world championships and the 2000 Olympics, which many will remember as NBA point guard Steve Nash's coming-out party.

Katz acknowledges the Jewish connection to the sport is varied and longstanding, but he'll focus on three aspects in particular.

The first is the rather colourful rivalry between two New York City players, Art Heyman and Larry Brown. Currently head coach at Southern Methodist University, Brown also coached championship teams in both the NBA (Detroit Pistons, 2004) and in the NCAA (University of Kansas, 1988).

Heyman was a standout college player at Duke who went on to a eight-year career in the NBA and ABA.

"They never really liked each other," Katz said, right from their days in high school in New York. In college they clashed again when Duke played North Carolina, Brown's team. In a famous incident in 1961 that can still be seen on YouTube, Heyman fouled Brown under the net. Brown retaliated, one thing led to another and a court-wide donnybrook broke out.

Mike Katz

A second point of focus for Katz will be the influence on the sport by Tal Brody. A native of New Jersey, Brody was a star player at the University of Illinois who was picked in the first round of the NBA draft, 12th overall. But after leading the United States to a gold medal in the 1965 Maccabiah Games, he decided to forego an NBA career and instead signed with Maccabi Tel Aviv. He led the team to a European Cup Basketball Championship, defeating a Soviet Red Army team.

"He really put Israel on the map in terms of basketball," Katz said.

A third aspect of the Jewish connection to basketball will be the unfortunate "role that Jews had in a not-so-positive way in the point-shaving scandal of the 1950s."

The scandal involved Jewish gamblers and several Jewish players for New York-area college teams.

Back in the day there were plenty of Jewish players in U.S. colleges and the pros as well. These days not so much. Check the rosters of NBA clubs today and you'll find just a couple of players, Israeli Omri Casspi (Houston Rockets) and American Jordan Farmar (Los Angeles Lakers).

Katz can't say for sure why the numbers have changed so dramatically. It might be that when Jews were closer to their immigrant roots, there was greater incentive to excel than today, especially in a sport that has never required a big outlay of cash to play.

It's hard to believe that at one time, Jews had such an influence on the sport that coaches taught their players the strategies of "Jew basketball," and that was more of a compliment than a pejorative term, Katz said.

Judge orders Lev Tahor kids' removal

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Quebec judge ordered the immediate removal of 14 children from the Lev Tahor Jewish sect and their placement in foster care for at least 30 days.

The Nov. 27 ruling by Quebec Youth Court Judge Pierre Hamel followed the opening that day of a youth protection hearing in St. Jérôme.

A publication ban has since been placed on evidence presented.

The children, ranging in age from two months to 16 years, are from two families. The parents defied an order to show up for the hearing, remaining with the rest of the community, which has settled in the Chatham area of Ontario, near Windsor.

The 14 children were still in Ontario late last week, and youth protection officials from that province and Quebec were conferring on what to do next.

The more than 200 Lev Tahor members, comprising about 40 families, left Ste. Agathe, where they had lived for almost a decade, overnight Nov. 17-18. The community had been under investigation by the Youth Protection Department for months.

Spokespeople for Lev Tahor have denied that the community's children, who number about 130, are abused or neglected, and say the group complied with any requests from child-welfare authorities. The local YPD director Denis Baraby said it was concerned about the children's hygiene and health, both physical and psychological, as well as lack of education. The children were being home-schooled, according to Lev Tahor's extreme religious beliefs.

Lev Tahor says it left Quebec because it does not want to teach its children the province's prescribed secular curriculum.

Meanwhile, the Ontario government was investigating allegations of neglect among the community there.

"At this time no children have been apprehended, and the families have provided access to protection workers for the ongoing investigation," Child and Youth Services Minister Teresa Pirruzza's office said in a statement Nov. 26. "They will continue to monitor the situation to ensure that child safety remains a foremost priority."

In Israel, a parliamentary committee has been hearing horrific stories of abuse from ex-members and relatives of current Lev Tahor followers.

The Israeli daily Ha'aretz, which conducted an in-depth investigation of Lev Tahor in Ste. Agathe 1-1/2 years ago, reported on Nov. 26 that families in Israel have since filed complaints with police of mistreatment of children, including forced marriages of girls as young as 14 to men, and the use of psychiatric drugs to control members.

Lev Tahor was founded and is led by Israeli-born self-styled rabbi Shlomo Helbrans, who was convicted of the abduction of a boy in the United States in 1994. He was granted refugee status in Canada on the basis of his claim that he would be in danger if he returned to Israel due to his anti-Zionist views.

Since moving to Ontario, the normally reclusive group has welcomed the media to hear its side of the story and has been posting regular updates on its website, dismissing allegations of wrongdoing as "blood libel."

They say they wish to settle permanently in Ontario, where they believe the education laws will offer them a better chance of schooling their children the way they wish.

Jewish groups were quick to distance themselves from Lev Tahor, while expressing concern for the children's welfare. Both the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and B'nai Brith Canada denounced Lev Tahor as practising a "perversion of Judaism."

Federation CJA's social service agency Ometz has received complaints about what went on in Ste. Agathe over the years and reported them to youth protection, said CIJA spokesperson David Ouellette. Ometz has also offered its assistance in trying to find foster homes that suit the children's fervently Orthodox upbringing.

Years ago, several chassidic communities formally renounced any association with Lev Tahor and Helbrans, 51, who was raised in a secular family in Israel, where he founded the sect. They left for the United States in 1990.

Ombudsman raps Radio-Canada for Israeli-Palestinian coverage

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Radio-Canada's ombudsman says the network should improve its coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian coverage after his office received 75 complaints, almost all from those who felt the reporting was inaccurate or biased against Israel.

In his annual 2012-2013 report, Pierre Tourangeau says the complaints, which concerned the television, radio and online services, were not trivial and, in fact, were well substantiated. He recommended that corrections or clarifications be made in response to 12 of them.

He recommends that the French-language public broadcaster examine its attitude to this long-standing and "thorny" issue.

"There were, this year again, very real problems in the coverage of the Israeli-Arab disagreement with regards to the Palestinian question," he states.

Tourangeau cites a similar volume of complaints during 2011-2012, rising after the violence in November of that year between Israel and Hamas in Gaza.

While improvements have been made since his previous report, Tourangeau advises, "It is necessary to do more, and maybe even change the attitude with regard to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict…

"I have already invited the news department to reflect in this way. I reiterate this invitation, knowing that this is a continuous process."

Seminar highly critical of Iran deal

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The United Nations clearly betrayed Israel in Geneva in signing on to the interim "P5+1" deal with Iran, a country that remains intent on producing nuclear weapons.

That was the unquestioned consensus of panellists at a Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) synagogue seminar on the "approaching nuclear showdown." The event was planned some time ago, and it was by sheer happenstance that it took place the morning after the deal was signed on Nov. 23. The uptake was that people filled the hall at Shomrim Laboker synagogue to standing-room-only levels – a rarity for CIJR events.

"The Jewish People are facing a severe crisis indeed," CIJR founding director Fred Krantz said. "The situation is now more dangerous in many ways [than] since 1947-48 [the War of Independence]. The U.S. is no longer [Israel's] most reliable ally."

Celebrating Chanukah

DOWNTOWN CHANUKAH: In preparation for Chanukah, the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, the Libbie Cowan Childcare Centre and the Thomas and Marjorie Schwartz Preschool Centre at the Miles Nadal JCC planned a special newsletter for families highlighting the many ways the older and younger students are connected. The children pictured range from the toddler program at the child-care centre through Grade 6 at Paul Penna – from left, Asher Helfand, Ari Hunziker, Shana Colman-Peck, Alex Prashkovsky, Lily Schnoor, Jett Kafka, Lilian Edney, Jonathan Alter, Ella Arnold, Raffi Winters and Dalia Piatigorsky-Roth.

Clarifications/Corrections

The article "Plan limits day school tuition to 15% of income" should have made clear that while anyone is welcome to enrol at Robbins Hebrew Academy, only families new to the Jewish day school system can take advantage of the iCAP pilot program.

The Ahziv connection

Past Forward
Alex Gropper

Ahziv is one of those little-known archeological sites along the coast of Israel, just north of Nahariya. There are a number of things that set it apart from other tells. Its major excavator more than 20 years ago was Eilat Mazar, granddaughter of the legendary Benjamin Mazar, one of the first heads of the Institute of Archeology at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, who would also become the president of the university in the 1950s.

The senior Mazar was one of the most celebrated Israeli archeologists in the early years of the state. He first made his reputation at Beit Shearim in the 1930s, but his most famous endeavour was heading excavations of the Temple Mount after the liberation of the Old City in the Six Day War.

It was while working in Jerusalem on the City of David excavations with my students from the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Studies in the late 1970s and early 1980s that I met and became friends with Eilat Mazar. Eilat impressed me with her scholarship, insight and charismatic personality. I was excited in 1988 when she told me that she was heading a new excavation at the Phoenician site of Ahziv in northern Israel and invited me to join her.

The Phoenicians had fascinated me for a long time, even more so once I became president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies at St. Michael's College at U of T. The Phoenicians were the first to circumnavigate the Mediterranean and establish trading posts and colonies along its shores as far as Libya and Spain. One of their colonies, Carthage, would fight Rome for mastery of the Mediterranean world in the Punic Wars. Under its famous general Hannibal, Carthage almost won.

The Phoenicians established a presence in northern Israel at places such as Ahziv. Their language was closely related to Hebrew, and their script was adopted by our ancestors. That script was the alphabet.

The Phoenicians maintained close ties with ancient Israel. Their craftsmen and renowned cedars were used to build the Temple in Jerusalem. The daughters of their rulers often married into the royal house of Israel.

At Ahziv, we found a Phoenician cemetery that gave us an insight into their daily lives. Among some of the graves we found statues of a number of mounted horsemen. It showed us that the Phoenicians did not use the more advanced chariots of their neighbours. Regardless, it would not have prevented them from being overrun by the deadly Assyrians, who destroyed Ahziv in the eighth century BCE when they conquered the northern kingdom of Israel and deported many of its inhabitants, giving rise to the legend of the 10 lost tribes.

Eilat Mazar is following in her grandfather's footsteps and is now in charge of the excavations at the Temple Mount. Her most exciting discovery there is a monumental building that's being touted as the palace of King David!

A woman for the ages

Midrashic Moments
Rachael Turkienicz

Another Chanukah is ending and we've had a chance to light our candles, fry our food and sing of miracles and victories. When we teach our children about Jewish heroes, we teach them that heroes are people who hold strongly to their values and don't give in to despair. Even if they're outnumbered, outgunned and seemingly powerless, the strength of their values and their commitment to what they know is right will carry the day. Chanukah stands as the historic example of that truth.

We are invigorated by this holiday. It rejuvenates us, and perhaps even redefines us. It's the holiday when we celebrate our determination to face those who threaten us and know for certain we will prevail. We teach our children songs of bringing light into darkness and the courage of a Jewish soldier.

Interestingly in our modern world, we neglect to put emphasis on a part of our community that the sages and rabbis throughout Jewish history have emphasized: the women. According to Jewish tradition, the women were the heroes of Chanukah. Whether it's the description of the behaviour of the women in the books of the Maccabees or the figure of Judith and her attack on Holofernes, the women stand out in their bravery.

According to our ancient records, if not for the women, circumcision would have stopped. The faith and culture of Judaism would have disappeared and, according to a medieval midrash, there would have been no Maccabees at all.

There's another midrash from the Middle Ages that speaks of the daughter of Matityahu who shocked her family and her community on her wedding day. She was facing the "right of first night," which decreed that all Jewish brides would be forced to lose their virginity to the foreign ruler and not their husbands. This young woman challenged her brothers, the Hasmoneans, on the day of her wedding. She ripped off her clothing and yelled at her brothers, shaming them for not ending the humiliation of all Jewish women. "How can you not learn from Shimon and Levi who protected their sister?" she cried.

The midrash states that it was her actions and words that united her brothers under the leadership of her father and formed the Hasmonean revolt and the Maccabees. If not for this brave young woman, there would be no Chanukah.

Jewish tradition so values all these women that we are taught that women must rest while the Chanukah candles are burning. It's sad how many Jewish families are unaware of this very important detail of our candle lighting. As we light the last candle of Chanukah this year, wouldn't it be wonderful if every Jewish woman could feel how much Jewish history values her strength, her bravery and her courage?

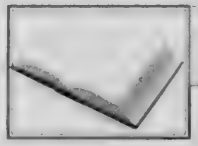
The value of Jewish high school

Rabbi Lee Buckman



Rabbinic Reflections

One of the frequently discussed topics in the Jewish community is day school affordability. The high price of day school education, it's argued, is the main reason why more families don't send their children to Jewish day school. Allow me to shift the conversation from price to value and explain why a Jewish day high school education, for example, is indispensable.

First, a Jewish day high school education demonstrates to teens how Judaism addresses complex issues. A Jewish day high school teaches Bible with the same level of sophistication as biology. It teaches the laws of tzedakah with the same intellectual rigour that it teaches the laws of physics. A day high school education ensures that students are equally literate in two civilizations: western and Jewish.

I often hear students in middle school say that they don't want to continue in a day high school because they already know enough Hebrew and Judaics. Jewish parents don't accept this argument when it comes to math or English and should not when it comes to Hebrew and Judaics, either. A young child simply does not understand that deep questions lie ahead, and they need to be Jewishly equipped to grapple with them.

Second, a Jewish day high school education helps children create meaning. Adolescence is a turbulent time, and a Jewish day high school provides a Jewish context for children to travel through adolescence. Teenagers reject, challenge, question, and doubt their Jewish identity. A Jewish day high school education places them in an environment where peers are asking the same questions under the guidance of teachers who can help them find meaning.

Finally, a Jewish day high school education empowers students to contribute something unique and valuable to society around them. I sometimes hear critics say that if you send your child to Jewish day high school, he or she will never survive in the "real world." The argument often sounds like this: "How will my child ever be able to deal with the open diverse world of the university if he/she is sheltered in a day school all his/her life?" A former high school students of mine once responded to this question saying, "When I get to university, I will have developed such a strong sense of who I am as a Jew that I will be able to contribute to that diversity. And that is only because of my Jewish day school education." What a profound insight!

Most children aren't so perceptive, which is why the choice of a high school is a parenting decision. It's too important a decision to leave up to a child. We do not ask our children whether or not they want an immunization or a dental appointment. Likewise, we should not hand over to a 13- or 14-year-old child the decision where to go to high school.

Yes, day school affordability is an issue. However, becoming a passionate and committed adult who loves his or her Judaism is priceless. That's where the discussion needs to be focused.

Avoiding shivah-lite

From the Bimah
Rabbi Philip Scheim

Two months ago, I used this space to comment on the recent trend of family speeches at funerals. Another development in the past few years has been the posting of visiting hours in shivah listings.

Having been there myself, I know that full days of observing shivah can be extremely taxing. One would hope that people would not choose to visit during meal times, late at night or early in the morning (unless a morning service is taking place), but that's not always the case. Thus, I understand when mourners feel the need to limit visits so that they'll have the breaks necessary to rest and tend to personal needs, without feeling obligated to "host" visitors at all hours of the day and night while coping with the loss they have experienced.

In designating hours for visitation, I would encourage families not to be too restrictive in the parameters they set. More often than not, a total of four hours a day is designated for visits, two hours in the afternoon and two at night. Those able to time their visits to those very limited hours usually confront extremely crowded houses or apartments, with little opportunity to speak to the mourners, because so many are trying to approach them at the same time. More relaxed hours allow for more intimacy, more quiet moments together, more time to offer real consolation and quality visits.

I totally understand the need for breaks during the day while observing shivah. I wish that all visitors had the sensitivity to know when not to visit, so as to prevent the need to list hours. Since, unfortunately, that's not always the case, I suggest that families, when choosing to designate hours, allow closer to eight hours, rather than four or five hours, for visits, in order for the mitzvah to be less rushed and more meaningful at all levels, without over-taxing the mourners.

Of course, there's the larger issue of shortened shivahs, which seem to becoming more frequent in recent years. A full shivah (meaning "seven") in practical terms, is rarely more than 4-1/2 days of actually "sitting," when one factors in the first day only beginning after the funeral and burial service, Shabbat, and the seventh day ending in the early morning. Thus, observing the entire shivah is less onerous than it may appear to be on the surface.

In all my years in the rabbinate, I've never experienced a family that observed the full shivah and expressed regret over not having curtailed their observance to a three-day or even shorter period. Rather, they have found comfort in those who unexpectedly turned out to visit them, sometimes rekindling long-lost relationships, a true comfort during a time of loss. When shivah is curtailed by hours or days, those opportunities are limited, or lost altogether.

Of course, restoring shivah to its rightful place as a meaningful component in the bereavement process isn't the responsibility of the mourners alone. Those who visit have a responsibility to ensure that their visits are timed appropriately, not overly lengthy, without expectation of social niceties, but solely for the purpose of assisting in the minyan, offering words of comfort and a listening ear to those coping with the pain of loss.

Peres addressed Arab, Muslim foreign ministers

Spencer Ho
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — In an unprecedented event, Israeli President Shimon Peres spoke via satellite from his office in Jerusalem to 29 foreign ministers from Arab and Muslim countries at the Gulf Security Conference in Abu Dhabi two weeks ago.

None of the attendees left the room when Peres spoke, and some even applauded his remarks, according to Israeli daily Yedioth Ahronoth, which reported Monday that Peres talked about how Israel can be a contributing factor in the Middle East and said there's an opportunity for dialogue between Israel and its neighbours about their common concerns, including the fight against Islamic extremism and Iran's nuclear program. Peres also presented his vision of global peace.

"There was a lot of excitement from both sides about [Peres' address]," said an official who was involved in organizing the event. "Everybody understood that this was something historic: the president of the Jewish state sitting in his office in Jerusalem with an Israeli flag and [the foreign ministers] sitting in the Persian Gulf discussing security, the war on terror and peace."

Shimon Peres

Peres, who was chosen by the summit's organizer, the United Arab Emirates, to open the conference, was interviewed via satellite by UN Under Secretary-General Terje Rød-Larsen. As per the conditions for Peres' appearance, the president and the foreign ministers spoke only through Larsen, and none of the content was leaked to the press.

Among the countries represented were Bahrain, the United Arab Emirates, Kuwait, Oman, Yemen, Qatar, Indonesia, Malaysia and Bangladesh.

New York Times columnist Tom Friedman, who was at the Abu Dhabi event, initially noted Peres' address at the conference in an article two weeks ago.

While Israel and much of the Arab and Muslim world are generally at odds, they have recently found some common ground in their opposition to Iran's rogue nuclear program and concerns about U.S.-led negotiations to thwart that program.

Olmert to Netanyahu: stop slamming U.S.

JTA

JERUSALEM — Former Israeli prime minister Ehud Olmert accused his successor, Benjamin Netanyahu, of declaring war on the United States for its policy on Iran.

"We've declared war on the American government. You can't deny this," Olmert said Sunday at a panel discussion during a conference at the Institute for National Security Studies in Tel Aviv, according to Israeli media. He was referring to the recent agreement on Iran's nuclear program.

Olmert said Israel should not be leading the international effort against Iran's nuclear program, adding that this role should be left to the United States.

"Israel should be a partner in this fight, but cannot and should not lead the international fight," Olmert said. "This was the [Ariel] Sharon government's position and the position of my government as well."

Netanyahu has publicly called the agreement arrived at between Iran and the world powers in Geneva last month a "bad deal" and a "historic mistake." The deal provides some sanctions relief for Iran in exchange for rollbacks in its nuclear program.

Ehud Olmert

"I hope this will not be perceived as an attack on the prime minister," Olmert said, "but the State of Israel should cease to criticize the policy of the U.S. and the policymakers of the United States."

Netanyahu, in Rome for an audience with Pope Francis, responded to Olmert's barbs. According to the Jerusalem Post, he said, "When I see that our vital interests are at stake, I will not shut up."

Anti-Israel group fined in France

JTA

PARIS — A French court imposed a $1,300 fine on members of an anti-Israel group who called on supermarket shoppers to boycott Israeli products.

The Court of Appeals of Colmar near Strasbourg fined each of the group's 12 members individually last week for their participation in a pro-boycott activity in 2009-2010, which the court qualified as "provocation to discrimination." The court also gave the activists a suspended jail sentence, according to a report by CRIF, the umbrella group for French Jewish communities.

The ruling reversed a 2012 verdict by the Correctional Tribunal of Mulhouse, which found the defendants not guilty. Prosecutors filed the appeal, CRIF said in a statement.

The actions for which the defendants were sentenced took place in 2009 in a supermarket in Mulhouse and again in 2010. Some of the defendants received a double fine for each action, CRIF reported.

The perpetrators were sentenced in accordance with strict anti-discrimination laws, including one passed by the French Parliament in 2003 known as the Lellouche Law, after the lawmaker who drafted it, Pierre Lellouche.

In September, seven activists were given a $650 fine for a similar action in 2010 in a supermarket in Alençon.

Yet the Court of Cassation – France's highest criminal court of appeal – on Nov. 19 acquitted several anti-Israel protesters who staged a boycott action in a supermarket in Evry near Paris in 2009.

In a separate ruling, a French court of appeals last Thursday slapped a $36,000 fine on the comedian Dieudonné for "inciting racial hate" in films in which he ridiculed the Holocaust and expressed anti-Semitic views. It was Dieudonné's seventh conviction related to anti-Semitism.

Peres, Abbas have invited pontiff to Israel said Murray Watson, a Christian-Jewish relations expert.

"The Vatican's support for the Jewish community in various European countries, where either kosher slaughter or circumcision have recently been called into question or forbidden by law" would likely have come up as well, said Watson, a co-founder of the Centre for Jewish-Catholic-Muslim Learning at King's University College at the University of Western Ontario.

"I suspect that this is an issue where the Pope would want to demonstrate his active solidarity with Europe's Jews, and to use whatever diplomatic and moral influence he has to reject those trends, which are sometimes indicative of a larger, more worrisome xenophobia or marginalization of those deemed to be the other," he said.

The two were likely also discussing the recently brokered nuclear deal in Geneva between Iran and six world powers, he said.

Attempts to bring about a meeting between the two leaders have not always gone smoothly. In October, Netanyahu's office issued a statement announcing that the prime minister would be meeting with the Pope at the Vatican shortly thereafter to discuss nuclear talks with Iran and the ongoing peace negotiations with the Palestinians.

However, it later emerged that the PMO's announcement was premature, as there were no confirmed plans for a meeting with the Pontiff, which typically has to be scheduled further in advance.

Peres and Abbas both invited the pontiff to Israel and the Palestinian territories, and Pope Francis has said he would like to visit the Middle East.

Rabbi Abraham Skorka, who is closely affiliated with the leader of the Catholic world, said in October that the Pope aimed to visit Israel in March 2014. Rabbi Skorka said that Francis' "lifelong dream" was to visit the Holy Land and "to embrace" the rabbi in front of the Western Wall.

Around that time, Knesset Speaker Yuli Edelstein met Pope Francis in the Vatican, and invited him to Israel and to the Knesset.

Pope Francis replied emphatically, "I'll come! I'll come!"

Pope Francis' visit would coincide with the 50th anniversary of Pope Paul VI's visit to Jerusalem in 1964, which took place before the Vatican recognized the State of Israel.

The future trip would mark Pope Francis's second visit to the Holy Land. He arrived here in 1973, just as the Yom Kippur War broke out. As the Times of Israel revealed in April, Jorge Mario Bergoglio (as he was then) spent six days confined to his Jerusalem hotel, studying the Letters of Saint Paul to the Corinthians.

U.S., Israel to hold military exercise: report

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel and the United States will hold a joint military training exercise in May, just as the interim agreement with Iran on its nuclear program will be expiring.

The exercise "is going to be big," an unnamed Israel military officer told Time magazine, who identified the officer as "high ranking."

"The wind from the Americans into the Israeli sails is, 'We will maintain our capability to strike in Iran, and one of the ways we show it is to train,'" the officer told Time. "It will send signals both to Israel and to the Iranians that we are maintaining our capabilities in the military option. The atmosphere is we have to do it big time, we have to do a big show of capabilities and connections."

Israel and the United States routinely hold joint exercises.

The exercise scheduled for May was planned independent of the Iran deal and other current problems in the region, a spokesperson for the U.S. European Command told Time.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has called the deal signed by six world powers and Iran on Nov. 23 "a historic mistake."

Under the deal, Iran will freeze some nuclear activity in exchange for some sanctions relief. Netanyahu likely will continue to decry the deal and work to make sure it doesn't become permanent.

Temple Mount closed after Jews, Muslims clash

A man walks at the Al-Aqsa Mosque compound during prayers on Nov. 9.

JTA

JERUSALEM— The Temple Mount in Jerusalem was closed to visitors after a fight broke out between Jewish visitors and Muslim worshippers.

The Jews visiting the site Sunday morning reportedly began singing Chanukah songs and praying. In response, a group of Muslim worshipers attacked them, Israeli media reported.

Two Jews and two Muslims were arrested in the incident.

Jews generally are not permitted to pray or bring any ritual objects to the Temple Mount, which is considered Judaism's holiest site, in order to avoid confrontation with Muslim worshipers at the Al-Aqsa Mosque, Islam's third-holiest site. The site is overseen by the Muslim Waqf, the Muslim religious administration charged with managing the Temple Mount site.

The Temple Mount was closed to non-Muslim visitors during this year's Sukkot holiday over fears that Muslims would be incited to violence by the crowds.

Days later, on Oct. 14, the Temple Mount was shut down to visitors after police removed 10 Jewish men for praying and singing. The men were detained after praying and bowing on the Temple Mount, then singing Hatikvah, the Israeli national anthem, waving an Israeli flag and dancing.

About an hour before the incident, police detained three other Jewish men for questioning after they prayed and bowed during a tour of the Temple Mount.

Israel experiences dry start to winter

Spencer Ho
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel has recorded its lowest rainfall levels so far this winter compared to the national multi-year average, according to figures released Sunday by the Israel Meteorological Service.

"Compared to the past, it must be emphasized that the variance of rain in November is quite great, and there are quite a few years where there is very little rain [in November]," the Meteorological Service said, according to Walla. "However, the almost complete lack of rainfall in the month, as happened at some of the stations, is uncommon."

The Meteorological Service said that in some parts of Israel, the winter of 2013 has so far been the driest in 55 to 70 years.

Most measurement stations around the country recorded less than 10 millimetres (2.54 inch) of rainfall for the month, compared to averages of 80 to 110 millimetres in the northern mountains, 70 to 85 millimetres on the coast and 50 to 60 millimetres in the hilly centre of the country and the valleys in the north.

Most of the stations recorded less than two millimetres, and some recorded no precipitation at all. And while some areas recorded good amounts of rainfall, in most cases it came all at once in one or two days at the beginning of the month.

The lack of rain was most pronounced in the north, where levels like those of this year have only been recorded three times: in 1946, 1962 and 2010.

In October and November combined, levels in most of the country are at about one-third of the multi-year average and in some parts less than 10 per cent.

For instance, in Kibbutz Kfar Giladi in the north, levels are at their lowest since 1943, when rainfall reached only six per cent of the average, and in Kibbutz Kfar Blum, it has been the driest year since 1949.

Along with the dry weather came warmer temperatures, as most days of November recorded a higher temperature than average, and the lowland coastal plain in particular experienced the hottest November in 60 years.

Israelis protect themselves in central Tel Aviv, Nov. 19 during the first rain of the season. [Roni Schutzer/Flash90 photo]

However, on a more positive note, despite the shortage of rain, as of Dec. 1 the waters of the Sea of Galilee are a whole metre higher than they were on the same date in 2012. This can be attributed to the relatively high precipitation last winter compared to the year before.

Sigma Phi an affiliate of Alpha Epsilon Pi

Jews form new fraternity at U of Manitoba

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — After an absence of about 40 years, Jewish fraternity life has returned to the University of Manitoba.

In early September, five friends and fellow U of M students formed Sigma Phi, an affiliate of Alpha Epsilon Pi.

"We felt that Hillel is largely for Jewish-related activities," said Alex Dashefsky, one of the chapter's founders. "We perceived a need for an organization strictly for social activities like BBYO at the high school level."

Along with Dashefsky, a second-year science student, the other founding Sigma Phi members are fellow science students Harrison Katz and Daniel Kroft, actuarial student Bradley Abells, and Simon Garfinkel, who is taking a mix of arts and science subjects.

The first step they took was to contact AEPi's head office in New York and have a representative of the international fraternity come to Winnipeg. Dashefsky noted that AEPi has branches at several other Canadian universities.

"We are slowly growing our membership," Dashefsky said. "We currently have 11 initiates and four more potential members."

The chapter held its first public program – a kick-off social – in mid-November. The "foam party" at a local night club, featuring a foam-making machine, attracted about 150 people.

Dashefsky said fraternity members are using the profits from the event as seed money for future chapter activities.

Up next is a gathering at the Metropolitan Centre in downtown Winnipeg in mid-December to watch a Winnipeg Jets hockey game on the Met's big screen.

"We also want to do a lot of philanthropic programs," Dashefsky said. "For example, on Halloween, we went door to door collecting cans for Winnipeg Harvest [the city's largest food bank]. We collected over 200 cans.

"We are also planning an ice hockey tournament outdoors that will be open to anyone. Our goal will be to raise money to buy hockey equipment for kids who can't afford to buy the equipment."

Dashefsky talks as well about joint programs with other fraternities and sororities on campus.

And some of Sigma Phi members are planning to attend AEPi's national convention in Toronto in August, he said.

Recalling my dear father,
Leo Berman ל"ז
on the 43rd Anniversary of his passing, on December 5, 1970.
May his memory ever be for blessing.

Canary District project brings developers together

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

For more than 40 years, the Canary Restaurant served truckers, film crews, cops and an assortment of commuters the traditional fare you'd find in a "greasy spoon."

While the once bustling commercially vibrant West Don Lands around it deteriorated into vacant "brownfields," the restaurant kept dishing out home fries, right up until it served its last meal in 2007.

Gone but not forgotten, the landmark cafe is now lending its name to a new development that is aimed at revitalizing the West Don area. A partnership of Dundee Kilmer Developments and the Kilmer Group is busily constructing the Canary District Condominiums, an ambitious project that will see the creation of a new neighbourhood just to the east of the Distillery District.

The project will begin life as an athlete's village for the Toronto 2015 Pan Am/Parapan Am Games. Two of the principals behind the project, Jason Lester, president of Dundee Kilmer, and Ken Tanenbaum, vice-chair of the Kilmer Group, say the project is on schedule and on budget. That marks something of a departure from the city's Pan Am efforts, which are reported to be experiencing cost overruns. Opposition critics are charging the provincial government of misleading the public when it announced the bill for the Games would come in at $1.4 billion, an amount that did not include the cost of the athletes' village.

One of multiple bids on the project, Dundee and Kilmer set a goal of "building something that Toronto could look back on and be proud," said Lester.

To prepare their bid for the Pan Am housing project, they studied failed projects to learn what had gone wrong. Their takeaway, Lester said, "is being late is not an option."

They put together a large team of architects, designers, finance experts and marketing mavens, and hired Ellis Don to handle the construction. As a result, "it's on time and on budget," Lester said.

Expect the first buildings to be completed in March or April 2014, more than a year before the Games. The last of the buildings should be completed about a month before the opening ceremonies.

The project itself, which Lester said will come in at around $800 million, will feature 808 market housing units, including condominiums, town homes and lofts, 253 units of affordable housing in a variety of styles, 30,000 square feet of retail, with a focus on health and wellness, a 500-bed residence for students attending George Brown College, an 82,000-square foot YMCA with a pool, gym, fitness centre and community facilities, pedestrian networks, an 18-acre Don River Park and pedestrian-oriented streetscapes.

The project has already raked in several awards, including the 2012 Canadian Architect Award of Excellence as well as a variety of marketing and branding accolades.

It's being marketed as an urban village that is "open, inclusive and welcoming" with an emphasis on green spaces, walkability, health and wellness.

About 80 per cent of the first condominium has been sold; sales for a second building will be launched soon. "We have more end users than other condo developments," said Lester, referring to the expectation that purchasers will actually live in the units and not merely view them as an investment.

"That mix of buyers makes for a great neighbourhood," said Tanenbaum. "Here people are moving in to live long term."

The neighbourhood, which is bounded by Old Eastern Avenue, Cherry Street, Mill Street and Bayview Avenue, is attracting young people and empty nesters who want to be downtown and enjoy the amenities, Lester said.

Units range from $250,000 for a 400-square-foot residence to $800,000 for a 1,400-square-foot home.

Canary marks the first collaborative project for Lester and Tanenbaum. "We each brought a set of skills to the table that were valuable to the project," Tanenbaum said. "Dundee brings absolutely superb world class real estate management and development. Kilmer has its roots in construction and construction materials and is involved in public/private partnerships."

While the partnership on the Canary project is a first, it doesn't figure to be the last. "Everything is leading to a very successful project and it makes business sense to pursue other opportunities when we can leverage our skills," said Lester.

As for the building that gives the project its name, it'll still be there once the Games conclude and people start moving in. The exterior is being rehabilitated, but as to the building's long term future, that's a big unknown. Waterfront Toronto is expected to call on developers and operators to make proposals for the site after the Games.

Just don't expect to wander in and order a plate of fries.

Novel successfully combines realistic and gothic elements

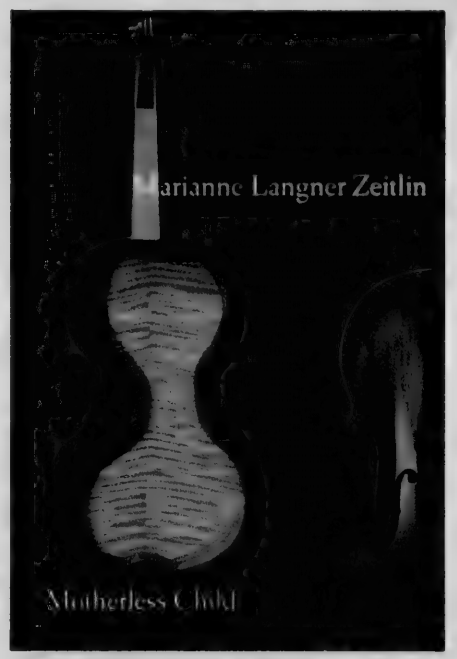
Motherless Child
Marianne Langner Zeitlin
Zephyr Press

Motherless Child, Toronto-born author Marianne Langner Zeitlin's third novel in as many decades, is a superbly wrought romantic page-turner that has elements in it of Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice and Daphne du Maurier's Rebecca, with more than a touch of the latter's gothic essence.

Set during a snowy New York winter in the 1970s, the story is essentially an identity quest by its heroine, 26-year-old Elizabeth Guaragna, a "snippet of a girl" and a gifted musicologist who is not afraid of speaking her mind. Elizabeth needs to know more about her mother, who left her family for a new lover and died a few years later while Elizabeth was still a toddler.



Elizabeth grew up in "a house of silences upon silences, with knowing looks exchanged among the grownups; with the children left to figure everything out for themselves." Her father, a brilliant concert pianist, died without ever speaking to her of the matter, and now she felt "the unsleeping blood of her father still cried out for vengeance from the black earth."

From an aunt and others, Elizabeth heard whispered stories that painted her mother as callously indifferent to her children, and Alfred Rossiter, her mother's lover, as a monster who had sabotaged her father's career out of pure malice.

Loaded with these prejudices, she applies for a job with Rossiter, an accomplished manager of musical talent who has just started his own agency. To her enormous surprise, she wins the high-level position solely on the strength of her knowledge and personality: she had been unable to supply credentials because she had applied under the pseudonym of Lisa Sullivan. Still bearing her secret antagonisms, she serves as a capable Girl Friday to the increasingly kind and likeable Rossiter, who puts up with Lisa's frostiness because she is superb at what she does.

Scene by scene, Langner Zeitlin always seems to find the emotional centre of her characters as they express themselves in excellently rendered dialogue and action. Witness, for example, the exchange between Lisa and Rossiter on her first day of work after she tries to correct what she sees as his lack of sensitivity toward artists.

"Rossiter's eyes blinked spasmodically behind his reading glasses. 'You've got quite a bit of sass, girl. Ease off. First day on the job and already you're telling me how to handle an agency.'

"Pulling herself up stiffly, she said: 'Mr. Rossiter, I'd appreciate it if you wouldn't call me 'girl.'"

"Two large crimson spots appeared on his cheeks as he took off his glasses and stared. For a moment, she thought he was going to fire her then and there – to give her her walking papers, as she had once heard her aunt express it when her father was let go by the Royal Conservatory... But Rossiter was going to do no such thing. His eyes were as washed out as sheets hanging on a line and he suddenly looked very old. 'All right, then, I'll try to remember. I'll call you Sullivan then, okay?'

"Just call me Lisa."

Like the hit TV show Mad Men, which brilliantly recreates the inner world of a leading Manhattan ad agency in the 1960s, Motherless Child takes us inside a powerhouse musical management firm in Manhattan in the 1970s and presents utterly realistic behind-the-scenes glimpses of the world of professional music. Langner Zeitlin's dialogue crackles with reality and her characters burst with energy and purpose.

George Wentworth, a highborn newspaper reporter writing an authorized biography of Rossiter, is the symbolic chivalrous knight who falls in love with Lisa and attempts to unravel all of her mysteries and secrets. Lisa loves him too, but, entrapped by her own ruse of falseness, prepares to run away to her native Toronto rather than risk her real identity being discovered. It is left to George to penetrate the obstructing maze and brambles of Elizabeth's defences.

Gothic stories often contain some or all of the following elements: a crumbling house or castle in partial ruin, a degenerate family line in need of restoration, dark secrets, hidden chambers, family crypts, a mad person in the attic, the sharp tug of the dead upon the living. In a gothic romance, these elements of decay and decomposition are usually swept aside by the power of true love, a transformation represented by winter turning into spring.

Several of these elements are evident in Motherless Child. A key scene occurs in a cemetery. Visiting her mother's grave with her mother's favourite flowers in hand, Lisa rushes to hide in a nearby crypt as another visitor – Rossiter – arrives with a similar bouquet of gladiolas.

Lisa also seems at times on the verge of a sort of madness as she struggles to revise her long-held prejudices and impressions. A masterful writer, Langner Zeitlin provides a satisfying and unexpected ending to the story – which, as she explained in an interview last month, came partly from her own life experience.

Born in Toronto, the author is the daughter of the late Rabbi Mordecai Langner, who was rabbi of the Junction Shul on Maria Street in the 1920s and 1930s. She moved to New York City in 1947 and married acclaimed concert violinist Zvi Zeitlin. During her own longtime career in the musical field, she worked as an orchestra manager and an employee in one of the largest music management firms in the United States.

Along with her husband, she worked with and befriended many legendary musicians including Igor Stravinsky, Leonard Bernstein, Aaron Copland, Jascha Heifetz and Itzhak Perlman. Motherless Child benefits tremendously from its author's wealth of inside knowledge about the international classical music industry.

The novel was initially released in 2012, but Langner Zeitlin ceased all promotional efforts after the death of her husband, a former professor at the Eastman School of Music in Rochester, N.Y. She moved recently from Rochester to Las Cruces, N.M., to be near her daughter. She has given readings of Motherless Child in both cities as well as in New York and Toronto.

Her previous novels are Mira's Passage (1981) and Next of Kin (2000). The latter is based on her upbringing in the Junction and was nominated for a City of Toronto Book Award.

Netanyahu among singer's mourners

JTA

JERUSALEM — Arik Einstein, an iconic Israeli singer as well as a songwriter and actor, died last week.

Einstein died Nov. 26 at a Tel Aviv hospital, where he was rushed after suffering an aortic aneurysm. He was 74.

Israeli television channels halted their regular programming to broadcast clips and remembrances of the singer, considered the godfather of Israeli rock, whose first recordings were released in the 1960s.

Fans holding a vigil outside the Sourasky Medical Center cried when the hospital's director general, Dr. Gabriel Barbash, announced Einstein had died.

Fellow veteran Israeli singer Shlomo Artzi, who was playing a concert in Tel Aviv when news broke of Einstein's death, halted the show after playing his song Ha'ish Hahu (That Man) as a tribute. He said later that he'd played the whole show knowing Einstein was in the hospital, and started crying on stage when the news came.

"He was one hell of a person," said Artzi. "We lost a piece of ourselves."

Thousands of people, including Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, gathered in Tel Aviv Nov. 27, the day of Einstein's funeral, to pay their last respects. Einstein's body lay in state in Rabin Square on a platform decked out in mourning black, at the centre of which his coffin, draped in black, stood surrounded by red flowers.

Arik Einstein

Led by Einstein's friend, Shalom Hanoch, musicians staged a concert in his memory for the thousands who had crowded into the square.

Einstein had not performed in front of an audience since the early 1980s following a road accident in which he was seriously injured.

His first album, Shar Bisvilech, or Singing for You, was released in 1966. He was part of the rock band The High Windows with Shmulik Kraus and Israeli-American Josie Katz. He also formed the Lool, or Chicken Coop, comedy troupe.

Among his well-known songs were Ani Ve'ata, or You and Me; Atur mitzchech zahav shachor, and Sa Le'at, or Drive Slowly.

"We all grew up on his songs. The words of Arik Einstein were the words of the land of Israel," Netanyahu said in a statement posted to Facebook. "Arik was a wonderful musician and a wonderful man... I loved him very much. Israel bids farewell with great sadness to a giant of culture who will be missed. My wife and I are greatly pained by his passing."

Tony Award-winning comedy stars Canadian actors

Marvin Glassman
Special To The CJN

Despite decades of acting in film, stage and television, Montreal-born actor Linda Kash is best known as the Philadelphia Cream Cheese angel in Kraft television commercials, for the past 11 years.

Kash, 52, trades in her halo to be a funny mother in the Studio 180 Theatre comedy God Of Carnage, now playing through Dec. 15 at the Panasonic Theatre.

Originally written in French by Yasmin Reza in 2006, the comedy was translated into English by Christopher Hampton and won a 2009 Tony Award for best play while on Broadway for two years. The plot centres on a schoolyard fight between two boys and the two sets of parents who meet to resolve the problem between the boys.

"The play has the four adults who aim to have peace and friendship. But, as the story evolves, the adults put away the masks of civility and start to lose their tempers and behave like children. We end up sparring about issues centring on racial prejudice, homophobia and women's issues in ways to provoke the audience to laugh because the characters go to such extremes," Kash said.

"My character, Veronica, is liberal, wrote about Darfur and is so much fun to play. One may think of the play as an update of television situation comedy series such as All In The Family or The Simpsons, because the audience has no idea what the characters are going to say."

Also starring in God Of Carnage is Sarah Orenstein, a veteran actress who has played at the Shaw Festival for 13 years. Orenstein plays Annette, a woman who lives off the financial success of her husband.

"Annette is hilarious, and has some funny scenes that the audience won't forget. It's an honour to work with our cast, and working with Linda is so much fun," Orenstein said.

Kash has been adept at comedy for decades, starting as part of the famed Second City comedy troupe in Toronto, working with Eugene Levy and Andrea Martin.

As is the case with many Canadians who excelled in comedy, Kash went to Hollywood for seven years to fast track her career in 1993. She portrayed funny characters in many highly acclaimed television situation comedy series, including Ellen, Everybody Loves Raymond, Seinfeld and many others.

Surprisingly, Kash left Hollywood in 2000 when her career was blossoming and returned to Toronto to resurrect her career.

"It was a personal choice for me to return to Canada. I could have continued in Hollywood, but felt that I would have more of a family life back in Toronto. I have no regrets and am lucky to have continued my career here."

Kash may have been born to be onstage, being the daughter of famed Canadian opera singer Maureen Forrester and conductor/violinist Eugene Kash.

"My four siblings found it normal to be travelling and to have parents in show business. My mother performed all over the world and would do over 100 concerts each year. It was natural for my brother Daniel [an actor] and for me to have a strong desire to be on stage."

Forrester, an acclaimed Canadian opera singer, was named to the Order Of Canada and the Canadian Hall Of Fame, and was awarded 20 honorary degrees from the most prestigious universities in the world, among other citations.

Forrester converted to Judaism to please her in-laws when she married Kash in 1957.

"My father and mother fell in love soon after they met. Their life together was like a tale from a romantic movie. However, my father's family would have been against the marriage if she did not convert to Judaism. She was concerned about being Jewish enough to raise us as Jews, and we know everything about our heritage," Kash said.

Among her many roles, Kash relished playing memorable Jewish characters over the years, among them Sarah Glick in the television series Max Glick, Carol Goldstein in Robson Arms and Dr. Silverstein in Less Than Kind, a television series about a Jewish family in Winnipeg.

Being immersed in performing has also helped Kash cope with tragedy. She was a caregiver for her mother, who suffered from Alzheimer's disease until her death in 2010.

Kash was starring in Neil Simon's Lost In Yonkers at the Jane Mallet Theatre on May 18, 2012, when she learned that her husband, actor Paul O'Sullivan, had died in a car accident that day near their home in Peterborough, Ont.

"It was a shock, as Paul was beloved by everyone in show business. We knew each other from our days with Second City and worked together in Peterborough, establishing a performing arts academy there."

Kash has three daughters and is raising them in the Jewish tradition, while living on a farm near Peterborough. She is also a co-host of a morning drive radio show there.

"There's a vibrant, if small, Jewish community there, and I enjoy living there, even if it is a long commute to Toronto," she said.

Linda Kash and Sarah Orenstein star in God Of Carnage, a Studio 180 Theatre production, playing now through Dec. 15 at the Panasonic Theatre, 651 Yonge St., in downtown Toronto. For tickets, call 416-872-1212, or go to ww. studio180theatre.com

From Degrassi to Broadway

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

When Jake Epstein moved to New York City 14 months ago, he had no clue that he would soon be swooping around the Broadway stage as Spider-Man.

In that debut performance, the 26-year-old Toronto-born actor donned the iconic red and blue spandex suit and starred in the most expensive musical production of all time: Spider-Man: Turn Off the Dark.

But now, less than a year later, he's taking off that suit and heading to something with a little more gravity: Beautiful, a musical based on the life of songwriting legend Carole King, played by Jessie Mueller.

"It's about this factory of songwriters... all these Brooklyn Jews that started writing every single hit in America at the time," said Epstein, who plays King's songwriting partner and first husband, Gerry Goffin.

Goffin, who was inducted with King into the Rock and Roll Hall of Fame in 1990, wrote a slew of hits with her, including chart-toppers Will You Still Love Me Tomorrow and The Loco-Motion.

He has always been a very private man, partly due to his mental health issues including bipolar disorder, which at the time was not widely understood. That made it a little difficult for Epstein to learn how to act like him.

"There are no YouTube clips of Gerry Goffin," Epstein said. "A lot of my research came from conversations with the writers, who had spent a lot of time with Gerry."

That's how Epstein learned how to emulate Goffin's mannerisms, both in terms of how he spoke and how he moved.

Epstein called it a very strange experience to be part of the creation of a character based on someone who is still alive. He said he was nervous knowing that Goffin was going to see the show, and specifically requested that no one tell him which day Goffin was planning to attend.

"I was really worried about the way the play was interpreting this guy who is really alive," he said.

Goffin did attend a show when it was playing in San Francisco for a month prior to moving to the Stephen Sondheim Theatre on Broadway, and he called it exhilarating.

"While it's not quite me, I think Jake does a good job of capturing the essence of what I was going through at that time," he told The CJN.

But it's not quite accurate.

"Jake has more class in the show than I ever had," he said.

Epstein is no stranger to playing people with mental illness. One of his most famous roles was when he played Craig Manning, a musician with bipolar disorder, in Degrassi: The Next Generation.

Although he worried a little about being typecast in roles that involve mental illness, he said he realized the disorder was set in a completely different context, and he's approaching it in a very different way.

"When I shot those first episodes in Degrassi... I didn't know what bipolar was at the time, and I was learning about it," he said. "To go back to something I'd done a little research on as a teenager, as an adult on Broadway, it felt like looking at it from a different lens."

Epstein said although Beautiful is completely different from Spider-Man, there were still lessons he was able to take away from his experience there.

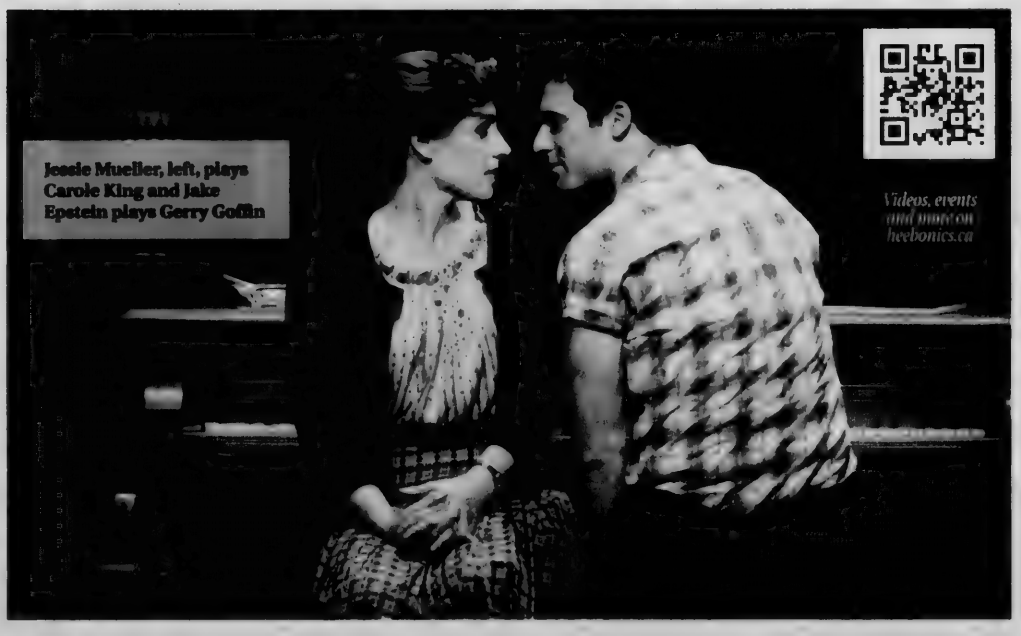
"Talk about what a way to get your feet wet on Broadway, to play the main part in the most expensive, biggest musical ever. Nothing will ever be bigger or scarier than that," he said. "That was a huge confidence builder for me to know I could carry a show."

He also learned what it takes to do a long run of a show, with eight performances every week.

Although it's a tough gig, he said the show is a really good fit for him, and it's an incredible feeling to be performing on Broadway.

"My whole experience here has been such a dream," he said. "It's so exciting and so unexpected. I feel like I was meant to be here."

Beautiful: The Carole King Musical is in its preview run until its official opening on Jan. 12.



Deadline reminder: Dec. 9 is the deadline for the issue of Dec. 19. Dec. 16 is the deadline for the issues of Dec. 26 and Jan. 9. The CJN is not publising an issue on Jan. 2. All deadlines are at noon. Phone 416-391-1836, ext. 269; email whatsnewcjn@gmail.com.

CWH joins GivingTuesday

CJN Staff

Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (CHW) has joined GivingTuesday, an international project that encourages charitable donations during the holiday season. Canada is a participant for the first time this year.

GivingTuesday was launched Dec. 3, the Tuesday after Black Friday, the big shopping day in the United States after U.S. Thanksgiving, and continues through the month.

CHW is asking donors, in the spirit of Chanukah, to join a growing network of Canadian philanthropists signing onto GivingTuesday.

Donors can choose to direct gifts towards any of the projects benefitting women, children or health care that CHW supports.

The organization is also asking its supporters to share their stories of giving via CHW's social media presence on Facebook, Twitter, and LinkedIn.

"In solidarity with GivingTuesday, we are providing our supporters with the opportunity to 'choose their impact', and to make a gift to CHW that is meaningful to them," said national president Marla Dan.

"We are looking forward to joining with hundreds of other Canadian non-profits across the country to share the importance of the good work that we do, but, more importantly, to acknowledge that our success can only happen because of the generosity of Canadians.

"This is our chance to collectively say thank you, while raising awareness about the needs in our communities and beyond."

Her husband, Aubrey Dan of Toronto, has pledged a $10,000 matching gift in recognition of his 50th birthday and to honour her recent birthday.

Gifts CHW receives through GivingTuesday up to Dec. 31 will be matched dollar for dollar up to $10,000.

CHW is among 15 Canadian organizations that have so far joined GivingTuesday, which was initiated in Canada by CanadaHelps, GIV3 and several other partners.

Those who are interested in joining CHW's GivingTuesday initiative can visit www.chw.ca. For more about the GivingTuesday movement, visit www.givingtuesday.ca.

GivingTuesday was created by the 92nd Street Y, in partnership with the United Nations Foundation.

Parental perfection

Married With Kids
Lauren Kramer

One of the joys of being a parent is that for a short time, you epitomize perfection in your children's eyes. As you scurry around trying to do your very best, they look up at you with utter admiration. Before them stands an adult who can answer any question, resolve any problem, make everything that's wrong, right again. It's humbling to see that trust and belief from your kids, because it reminds you what a powerful figure you are in their eyes – for a short time, anyway.

In a distant memory that goes back 35 years, I'm sitting in the bathtub with my little sister and we're talking about our mother. "She's the most beautiful woman in the world," I say sagely, comparing her to other moms I know and to the women I've seen in James Bond movies. My sister agrees. To both of us, our mom is nothing short of a deity and we would do anything to win her praise and attention.

Walking past the bathroom door, my mother overhears this conversation and is filled with an overwhelming feeling of love for her two little girls. Beauty she doesn't care for – she knows that's something that comes and goes. But to be seen in such a light by the children who have invested all their trust, belief and hope in her is a special moment indeed.

It's a short-lived one, because as they grow past the ages of six or seven, kids become more inclined to see their parents with a growing degree of objectivity. Criticisms become scathing, doors slam in loud objection and rules are hotly contested. The parent moves from deity to dictator and walks a fine line between effective parenting and reasonable restrictions. There's a relatively short time to mould those kids into decent, respectful human beings, and as parents try to do so, the home can become a war zone of different viewpoints. Phrases such as "old-fashioned," "out of touch" and "just plain mean" are tossed like grenades around the kitchen. It takes strength and conviction to withstand the barrage without second-guessing your rules and decisions.

Which is why the years from birth to age five need to be cherished so dearly. In my experience, that's when parents are revered the most and the love they receive is at its purest and least adulterated.

"Is there anything dad can't do?" my daughter, Maya, almost five, asked me recently. Her eyes were wide and her curiosity genuine. In her eyes, her dad is nothing short of brilliant, a man who can fix anything, soothe burning scratches and hurt feelings, eliminate hunger and lead with decisiveness.

Not sure what to say, I pointed to a few of his shortcomings. His cooking skills could be improved, I noted, and he's not that good at cleaning up his clothes. But those are small things, I added. In the areas where it counts, her dad is a real treasure.

She snuggled up to me on the couch, thrilled to have a few private minutes of cuddle time. "I love you to the moon and the sun," she declared. "Mom, I'm a big fan of you." I folded her in a close embrace, knowing how precious this moment is and how little time I have until she starts examining my imperfections.

Her love and admiration is like a large puddle of sunshine in my life, and I want to bask in its warmth as long as I can.

MENORAH MAKING: Home Depot in Richmond, B.C., in conjunction with Chabad of Richmond, hosted a menorah-making workshop Nov. 24, creating menorah woodwork kits for some 93 Jewish children. Home Depot custom-designed the menorah kits, cutting lumber and using nuts donated by H. Paulin & Co., one of its vendors. "It's a great opportunity for us to give back to the community," said Josh Bliss, assistant store manager. "We're definitely interested in doing this again." Pictured is Ari Malowicki assisting Amy Aginsky in the art of menorah making.

Food and memories – an unbeatable combination

Barbara Silverstein
Special to The CJN

The laughter was loud and the nostalgia was palpable at Beyond Bubbie, an evening of storytelling that linked food and family lore.

Nine presenters, eight of them local foodies, served up memories of their grandmothers' and mothers' cooking to an audience of some 300 people at the Al Green Theatre.

Beyond Bubbie was presented by the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre; UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Ontario Jewish Archives; Shoresh, a Jewish environmental organization; and Reboot, a think tank and project incubator that grapples with issues of Jewish identity.

Rose Reisman Catering and The Pickle Barrel sponsored the event, which was held to promote, Beyond Bubbie, an interactive community cookbook (www.beyondbubbie.com). Award-winning food writer David Sax hosted the evening, and the Varsity Jews, a University of Toronto a cappella choir provided the musical entertainment.

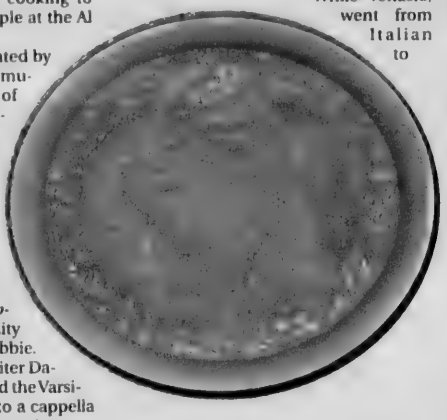
Celebrity chef Rose Reisman, an author, caterer and restaurateur, says her late mother, Mary Finson (Finkelstein), never encouraged her to cook. "She liked to cook fattening foods for me."

Reisman showed a clip of the cooking show, Loving Spoonful with host David Gale, which featured a bake-off between Reisman and Finson. Reisman prepared chocolate biscotti while Finson made mandelbrot. For Finson, the winning recipe was clear. When she tasted her daughter's biscotti, she politely said, "That's nice." But when she took a bite of her own mandelbrot, she told viewers: "These melt in your mouth."

Executive chef Anthony Rose of Rose and Sons spoke of summer weekends at his grandparents' cottage on Lake Simcoe, where, following an afternoon of fishing with his grandfather, Simon Gottlieb, his grandmother Esther would fry the freshly caught fish and serve it on toasted challah with slices of gefilte fish. Rose calls the dish Gefilte and Fish Schnitke.

Restaurateur Judy Perly, the originator of Klezmer Sundays at the Free Times Cafe, reminisced about her grandmother, Gertie Wasserman who was always worried the family didn't eat properly, because her daughter, Bella Wasserman Perly, worked at Perly Maps, the family business. Wasserman often phoned her daughter to ask, "Bella did you eat?" – which is how the Free Times Cafe Sunday brunch got its name.

Dino Venasio, owner of the kosher deli Ben & Izzy's (3513 Bathurst St.), said he learned to cure meat from his Italian grandmother. An observant Jew today, he can't eat any more of her cooking, but he shared fond memories of making pasta with his grandmother every Sunday. Venasio generously treated everyone in attendance to smoked meat sandwiches from Ben & Izzy's after the presentation.



While Venasio, went from Italian to Jewish cuisine, chef Alida Solomon of Tutti Matti learned to make pasta from her adopted grandmother in Tuscany. Her mother, Maureen Solomon, a retired teacher, helps in the restaurant. And now Alida Solomon has taught her mother how to make homemade Italian pasta.

Other presenters that evening included food writer and broadcaster Sarah Elton, playwright and novelist Sean Dixon and First Nations cultural co-ordinator Denise Booth.

In a mixing bowl combine eggs, sugar and oil until well mixed. Add flour, baking powder, cereal and almonds and mix well. Form 2 logs and place on baking sheet. Sprinkle with cinnamon and bake 30 minutes. Cool 10 minutes.

Reduce temperature to 300. Slice logs into 1/2 inch slices. Turn each piece on its side and bake another 40 minutes or until crisp.

ROSE REISMAN'S CHOCOLATE AND DRIED CRANBERRY BISCOTTI

1/3 cup oil
1 cup sugar
1-1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
1-1/2 cups flour
1/2 cup cocoa
1/2 cup rolled oats
1 tsp. baking powder
1/2 tsp. baking soda
1/8 tsp. salt
1 cup dried cranberries
3/4 cup semi sweet chocolate chips

Line a baking sheet with foil sprayed with oil. Preheat oven 350.

Mix eggs, oil, sugar and vanilla. Add remaining ingredients and mix well, just until all ingredients are incorporated. Form dough into 2 long rolls or logs. Bake for 30 minutes.

Turn oven to 300. Slice log into 1/2- to 1-inch slices. Place cookies on their sides. Bake another 40 minutes or until done to your liking.

BUBBIE GERTIE WASSERMAN'S CHUNKY APPLE SAUCE
(Judy Perly's grandmother)

4 large apples (any kind but Macintosh), peeled and cored
1/2 lemon cut in eighths
1/2 cup white sugar
1-1/2 cups water
1 cinnamon stick

Cook apples, lemon, sugar and cinnamon stick in water on medium heat. Adjust sugar and water to taste. When cooked, mash apples or leave them chunky. This recipe makes enough apple sauce for 4 dozen small latkes.

A FESTIVE END TO CHANUKAH – FESTIVE POTATO PANCAKES

4 c frozen shredded potatoes • 2 lg eggs, lightly beaten • 1/4 c Panko bread crumbs • 1 c fresh cranberries • 5 raw Brussels sprouts, grated • 1/2 tsp pepper • 1/4 tsp salt • 1/4 c oil, for frying

Using paper or linen towel, squeeze as much liquid from shredded potatoes as possible; the drier, the better. Place potatoes into a large bowl; add remainmg ingredients, except oil. Mix until well combined. Add oil to large frying pan over medium heat. When ripples start to appear in oil, it is ready to be used. Form 2-3" pancakes or smaller if desired. Very carefully place patties into hot oil. Don't overcrowd which will prevent the pancakes from getting crispy. Cook over medium heat for 3 min. on each side. Place on cooling rack lined with paper towel to drain excess grease. Add more oil to pan for cooking additional batches. Drizzle with warm maple syrup, applesauce, or sour cream.

Mandela remembered for his great humility

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

At the request of one of Nelson Mandela's lawyers in South Africa, human rights activist and Liberal member of Parliament Irwin Cotler was part of Mandela's international legal team during his 27 years in prison.

But Cotler also got to meet Mandela twice, and in an interview with The CJN, remembered him last week for his indomitable spirit, great humility and complete absence of rancour or bitterness toward his jailers after he came out of prison.

Cotler met Mandela on a state visit to Canada by the South African president in 1998, and when Mandela became an honorary Canadian citizen in 2001.

"He embodied three great struggles," Cotler said the morning after Mandela's Dec. 5 death at age 95, "the march to freedom for black South Africans, the fight for democracy and the struggle for equality.

"He had a transformative impact to make, but there was no bitterness. He was a model for nation building.

'Buycott' counters holiday boycott drive

United Church-linked group targets firms in West Bank

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Jewish groups are urging Canadians to buy goods from companies being targeted in a holiday boycott campaign endorsed by the United Church of Canada against Israeli firms that make products in the West Bank.

"[The goal is] to really send the message that when people try to isolate Israel by calling for a boycott of any product, the immediate consequence will be exactly the opposite," said Sara Saber-Freedman, executive vice-president of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which organizes what it calls "buycott" campaigns to thwart such efforts.

With the start of the Christmas shopping season, the United Network for Justice and Peace in Palestine/Israel (UNJPPI), which consists mostly of United Church members, is encouraging consumers to boycott products from Ahava cosmetics, SodaStream and Keter Plastic, which all have plants in the West Bank that employ both Jews and Arabs.

The group held a press conference Dec. 3 at Toronto's Metropolitan United Church to launch its drive.

$15M Donation

TORONTO — Mount Sinai Hospital last week received a $15-million gift from board members Gerald Schwartz and Heather Reisman, which will see the significant physical expansion of the hospital's emergency department and a first-of-its-kind research institute that will drive new knowledge and innovation in the field of emergency medicine. The donation follows previous gifts totaling $13 million, bringing their total investment in Mount Sinai to $28 million. Schwartz is CEO of Onex Corp. and Reisman, is CEO of Indigo Books and Music. The expansion of the hospital's Schwartz/Reisman Emergency Centre to 28,100 sq.ft. will enable Mount Sinai to accommodate expected growth in emergency patient volume from 56,000 to an estimated 80,000 annually over the next few years. The new centre will encompass half of the main floor of the hospital.

Full Parole Denied

TORONTO — Garth Drabinsky, former chief executive officer of theatre company Livent Inc. was denied full parole last week, after appearing before a Parole Board of Canada panel. Drabinsky was convicted of fraud in 2009 and received a five-year prison sentence. After serving more than one-third of his sentence he was granted day parole. Since February he has been living at a halfway house. As a result of the Parole Board panel's failure to reach a unanimous decision on the matter, Drabinsky will receive a new parole hearing within the next two months.

WORLD

Kabbalah Centre Sued

LOS ANGELES — The Los Angeles-based Kabbalah Centre is being sued for over $1 million by former followers. In two lawsuits filed in Los Angeles County Superior Court on Nov. 27, claimants allege that the center pressured them "to give money until it hurts," in order to receive "the light" from its leaders. The late Rabbi Phillip Berg founded the Kabbalah Centre in Jerusalem. The first American operation was begun in New York in 1965. Since 1984, the center's worldwide operations, with 50 branches, have been headquartered in Los Angeles.

Hampstead To Defy 'Racist' Charter

MONTREAL — The Town of Hampstead will not abide by Bill 60, the secularism charter, should it become law, its council resolved on Dec. 2.

William Steinberg

Mayor William Steinberg, who proposed the resolution, said the municipality "will not comply with a racist and immoral law."

"The Town of Hampstead holds the right of religious freedom as a fundamental right for all human beings," he said in a statement. "In the event that the Quebec government passes this odious bill, which will force people to choose between their religious beliefs and their jobs, it will not be enforced in Hampstead."

About 80 per cent of the town's 8,000 residents are Jewish.

The resolution states that the wearing of religious symbols does not "harm anyone and [does] not interfere with the ability of employees to do their jobs."

The proposed charter, it says, has "already fanned the flames of intolerance and racism and led to attacks on minorities and this will only get worse if the charter becomes law."

Senior choreographs her own dance routines

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

With a passion for dance, 93-year-old Marion Green lights up the Joseph E. and Minnie Wagman Centre at Baycrest with enviable grace and sunny joie de vivre.

Green was a former chorus girl in the late 1930s through the 1940s at the Casino Theatre on Queen Street in Toronto.

"I never had a dance lesson – ever. I just had natural rhythm and when I heard the music, I used to make up my own little steps. My parents used to say I had shpilkes," laughed Green.

"Step shuffle, step left, kick right," recalls Green, who told The CJN, "I was 17-years-old when I began to dance professionally. I would write everything down so I would remember and practice. At the time there were no Jewish girls dancing in a theatre. In fact, it was burlesque for the first year I was there. Every week we would learn three new routines. I did four shows a day. On Saturday and Sunday, there were five shows and during the war years, a midnight show. Once you hear applause, you're always coming back for more, and I loved it."

Andreah Barker, a dance and movement therapist at Baycrest, first met Green about two years ago.

"Marion thought I was going to teach her, but actually I wanted her to lead me and share her experiences and knowledge by choreographing something with me," Barker said.

With classes once a week for 45 minutes, Green choreographs and teaches Barker the moves right down to designing the costumes.

"We are dancing together, and it is a mutually fun thing for both of us. The creativity of being able to express oneself through movements in ways we can't with words is part of my dance movement therapy," said Barker.

Forty-three years ago, Green volunteered to assist seniors at Baycrest with a program called Arthur Murray's Dance Class.

"We would gather the seniors and dance to music from the old country. Even if they couldn't dance, and were in wheelchairs, we would hold their hands and dance in front of them," Green recalled.

Experts say that dancing improves gait and balance, and can decrease the risk of falling. It also encourages seniors to move in different directions from everyday movements, and it helps improve overall balance, stamina and walking speed, which are major risk factors in falling.

When my husband died suddenly, my whole world stopped. I didn't even know where to begin with the arrangements. It was 2am. I called Benjamin's. To my surprise, Michael Benjamin himself answered the phone. They took care of every imaginable detail. They even had umbrellas for guests when it rained at the gravesite. I will never forget their wonderful care.

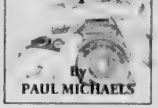
The reason Israel is worried

As mentioned in last week's column, according to the Geneva agreement, Iran is supposed to curtail some of its nuclear program in exchange for limited sanctions relief.

In just one of several widely differing interpretations of the deal, the Americans believe the relief amounts to only about $7 billion – a very small portion of the overall long-standing sanctions – while Iran believes the sanctions program has been dealt a major blow.

Indeed, as reported by the Financial Times, right after the agreement was reached, Iranian President Hassan Rouhani bragged that the sanctions regime "had been broken, whether others like it or not." American officials strongly disagreed. Yet, as the Times noted, "With the passage of time, [Rouhani] predicted, the cracks 'will widen.'" On that score a growing number of western observers argue Rouhani may well be proved right.

According to Reports



By PAUL MICHAELS

The Obama administration's "fact sheet" on the deal claims that the sanctions relief is "limited, temporary, targeted, and reversible," and that "the overwhelming majority of the sanctions regime, including the key oil, banking, and financial sanctions architecture, remains in place." Included in limited sanctions relief are commodities such as "gold and precious metals, Iran's auto sector and Iran's petrochemical exports."

Humanitarian transactions – those related to Iran's purchase of food, agricultural commodities, medicine, and medical devices – are already allowed by U.S. law and, according to the White House, "will not provide Iran access to any new source of funds."

However, as the Times of Israel reported on Dec. 3, "Several U.S. and European companies are preparing to cash in on the sanction relief that Iran negotiated in the nuclear talks last month, and they could be positioned to rake in billions of dollars. The opportunities come not so much from the removal of sanctions on products that the companies sell, but rather from the enabling of financial methods to pay for them."

While companies such as GlaxoSmithKline, Sanofi SA, Siemens, Procter & Gamble and Nestlé were able to sell humanitarian products, their sales were limited by restrictions placed on Iran's banking sector so that Iran couldn't pay for the transactions. Now, under the Geneva plan, a limited number of banks will be allowed to conduct transactions, thereby opening the door to a potentially vast increase in trade for American and European corporations.

This is just one way that a planned "limited" increase in business with Iran could quickly become something much larger.

In the December issue of the Globe and Mail's Report on Business magazine, Eric Reguly observed: "While Israel will never believe that Iran's uranium-enrichment activities are aimed at anything but bomb-making, businesses around the world can't wait for Iran to rejoin the global trading and banking system."

With a fitting touch of irony, the magazine's sub-heading on Reguly's column put it this way: "Iran and its opponents now seem to agree that they need to make a deal to end sanctions, because economic potential is a terrible thing to waste."

The American administration might try to keep the sanctions relief very limited while it works toward a comprehensive agreement, but, as Rouhani anticipates, the hunger of the international business community to re-engage with Iran could create what some analysts are calling a "psychological dynamic" that, even if Iran fails to live up to its commitments, would be hard to stem, let alone reverse.

Israeli Prime Minister Netanyahu fears this very dynamic becoming the norm, which is one reason he spoke out so strongly against the interim plan.

As Herb Keinon noted in the Jerusalem Post, while in Rome on Dec. 2, Netanyahu charged that "[t]here [already] appears to be a general relaxation of sanctions, and a rush to accommodate Iran, and to make it legitimate, as if Iran has changed anything of its actual policies."

Keinon added: "If the sanctions regime against Iran collapses, Netanyahu said, that would signal the end of chances to peacefully stop Iran's nuclear program."

This is just a brief glimpse at why Rouhani is so confident: he sees real sanctions relief while Iran retains, despite temporary constraints, its nuclear breakout potential.

No wonder Israel is so worried.

Time to roll up our sleeves

Guest Editorial

No one committed to the safety and security of Israel could be faulted for being outraged by the Interim Agreement reached by the P5+1 and Iran. The sense of betrayal – especially by the U.S. – of its sole democratic ally in the Middle East was as palpable as it was self-evident. Few countries, Canada being a singular exception, were prepared to speak truth to power and decry what was, in effect, international capitulation to a rogue state sponsor of terrorism intent on pursuing its nuclear weapons program.

Yet just a few weeks following the news, the international community has moved on, and so too those who railed against the agreement. That is the nature of intense outrage; it burns itself out quickly, leaving only the faintest echo of its original sentiment behind.

Israel, indeed the entire Middle East, requires a more sustained response. Opposition to the Interim Agreement must not be limited to a retrospective protest against western surrender; it has to be prospective about how to undo the damage. As the pioneering American politician, Pat Schroeder, once observed: "you can't wring your hands and roll up your sleeves at the same time".

We have six months to reverse the gains Iran stands to achieve through this momentary "pause". The focus of our collective effort must be to mitigate and reverse the consequences of the deal struck in Geneva.

The greatest challenge is one of perception. Those who expressed support for the agreement must be made to understand that the agreement between the P5+1 and the Iranian regime places the global community at greater, not lesser risk, and it leaves the Middle East – and Europe – in an exponentially more dangerous situation, not one of enhanced stability.

Changing such perceptions is no easy task. It requires two essential ingredients: sustained and consistent attention and clear, simple messaging. And the message could not be more straightforward – Iran does not require a $57 billion uranium enrichment project to acquire nuclear energy. It can model the approach adopted by Canada, Sweden, South Korea, and more than a dozen other advanced economies by purchasing rather than producing the necessary nuclear material.

Canada is uniquely placed to serve as a credible agent of this message and our efforts have to be directed at encouraging the Canadian government to deliver that message in every forum, in every bilateral engagement, and all international venues.

The international community fundamentally understands the threat of a nuclear Iran. If it didn't, the economic sanctions regime that was so arduously constructed would never have been put into place. Unfortunately, the world blinked and Iran's game of 'three card monte' has been given new life. Throughout this period, Canada has kept a sharp eye and a clear mind. Canada can expose this shell game and challenge our traditional allies south of the border and in Europe to get back on track by promoting this simple, yet effective solution.

Our task is to push forward, not look back, and ensure Canada accepts this mission. To achieve this, we must roll-up our sleeves, not wring our hands.

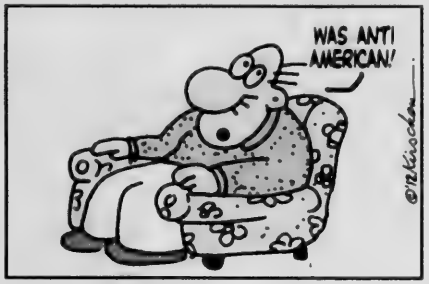
Dry Bones



Harper deserving of JNF honour

I was very upset to read the letter ("Harper honours not deserved," The CJN, Nov. 28) written by Stephen Lewis and others.

First of all, it was a low blow against a major Jewish organization, the Jewish National Fund, which was holding this fundraiser. Secondly, it was a malicious letter directed against Prime Minister Stephen Harper, a leader who has been the greatest friend of Israel ever. Thirdly, there are many experts who say that Lewis and his group, the Jewish Refugee Action Network, are totally wrong in their assessment of the government's refugee policy.

Personally, I am very glad and proud to say that I was one of 4,000 people who turned out at the Negev Dinner to support Harper, a true great friend of the Jewish people.

Howard Price
Toronto

The letter criticizing Prime Minister Stephen Harper has nothing to do with the Jewish National Fund honouring our prime minister.

It is an honour greatly deserved.

For years both the NDP and the Liberal parties of Canada either sat on the fence or had a negative attitude towards Israel.

Harper and the present Canadian government are Israel's best friend in the world. They constantly support the State of Israel.

A letter like this has one intention and one intention alone. It is strictly political.

Letter writers Stephen Lewis and Michelle Landsberg can see the Jewish support in Canada has swung in favour of the Conservatives and will say anything to try and undermine this support.

Selwyn Calner

Tuition help falls short

I understand the desire of Jewish day schools to limit tuition to make it more affordable for parents ("Plan limits day school tuition to 15% of income," The CJN, Nov. 28). With fees of approximately $15,000 to $20,000 per child, middle-income families must make significant sacrifices to send their children to Jewish day school.

Although I commend Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA) for trying to do something about this by limiting the total tuition to 15 per cent of income, their definition of middle income is totally off the mark. A family with income between $200,000 and $300,000 should not need financial assistance. They are the ones who should be able to afford the full amount. A family with two or three children with an income of under $100,000 cannot afford to pay half their gross income for education, and they are the ones who truly need help.

RHA's new policy may be a step in the right direction, but it is far too little to help the vast majority of Jewish parents.

Michael Kinrys
Toronto

Advocacy efforts ineffective

Regarding the article "New group's advocacy methods ruffle feathers" (The CJN, Nov. 14), imagine it is 1939 and you can choose one group to oppose the rampant anti–Semitism you witness in your neighbourhood. You could choose the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA), which advocates and justifies "muted responses" and "remaining quiet as acknowledgment draws more publicity." Or you could choose the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center (FSWC), which advocates and justifies non-action and "avoiding knee-jerk reactions." Or you could choose StandWithUs, a newer group which runs counter to the attitudes of CIJA and FSWC.

Despite the fact that StandWithUs has demonstrated success in countering anti-Semitic campaigns, CIJA and FSWC still vigorously defend and justify their lack of reaction.

We are witnessing more anti-Semitism than ever, yet both CIJA and FSWC continue to advocate antiquated reactions that we recognize as misguided and dangerous from our pre-Holocaust experience. Next time you want to donate money, consider where your dollar will best counter anti-Semitism and provide the most effective pro-Israel campaign.

Movie shows Poland is dealing with difficult past

Wladyslaw Pasikowski's Aftermath (Poklosie) played to a sold-out crowd at a special screening of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival recently.

Attended by the Polish consul and the film's producer, the screening was an important event not just here in Canada but also for Poles thousands of kilometres away.

Loosely based on the events of the Jedwabne pogrom in 1941, the film tells a fictional story of two brothers who discover the horrific history of their village, mainly the burning of the village's 126 Jewish residents by their Polish neighbours.

The thriller is unsettling not only for its story, but also for its one missing piece: the presence of any living Jews. Eerily symbolized by gravestones dug up by the film's protagonist, the Jews of the story are invisible, only momentarily conjured up as names in archival books of land ownership.

While garnering high box-office returns, the film – not unlike Jan Gross' book Neighbours, which tells the story of the Jedwabne tragedy – has stirred a great deal of controversy in Poland. Such a history is difficult to accept for any nation, but it's particularly hard for Poles, who also see themselves as victims of first the Nazi then the Soviet occupation of Poland. What adds to this atmosphere of denial and difficult acceptance is that for more than 50 years, history lessons taught to all Polish children have portrayed Poles as victims of Nazi Germany's expansion.

Marcin Wisniewski

Every year, the Polish school year begins on Sept. 1, with no exceptions. This is also the fateful date of Hitler's attack on Poland. When I was growing up in Poland in the 1980s, every school year began with sirens going off across the country and a minute of remembrance to recall what had been done to us.

To be fair, the subject of the Holocaust as an extermination program of all European Jews was not forbidden. I can still remember larger-than-life photos of Jewish prisoners or their belongings exhibited in glass cases at the Treblinka extermination camp. Glasses, patches of hair, books and ovens have left images in my mind that will never be erased. At eight years old, I was overwhelmed and utterly depressed by the historical artifacts I saw. Though I understood what I was seeing and hearing, my mind couldn't comprehend what it all actually implied. To some degree, it still can't.

But Treblinka is part of a larger narrative, one in which Jews and Poles suffered together, and it was taught as such. Gross' book and Pasikowski's film stand in strong opposition to that overarching narrative. What they offer is an intimate and complicated history, one in which people who lived side by side for decades, nay centuries, turned on each other in a such a brutal way.

Yes, it was incited and supported by the Nazis, and as Gross recently remarked, the pogroms happened during a complete deterioration of the moral fabric of society that only a war can bring. Still, as the film points out, these were people who knew each other by name, and possibly whose children played with one another and who got involved in romantic affairs.

A group of Jewish students and teachers in Jedwabne, 1938. [Yadvashem.org]

A scene from Wladyslaw Pasikowski's Aftermath

So where can such actions come from? Anti-Semitism is only a possible answer, for the communities lived side by side for centuries without such violence. It's the impossibility of a clear answer that troubles many Poles, people schooled in the loyalty, bravery and righteousness of their nation. As a Pole, I don't stand outside of such national ideals and narrative. After all, I'm partially a product of the country's educational system.

On a very personal level, the film overwhelmed and devastated me as a human being, leaving behind the existential question of what it says about humanity, and on a more intimate level, the question of how neighbours could do this to neighbours and be fine about it. Of course, maybe they weren't fine, as is suggested by the general absence of dialogue on a national and personal level.

Another question that lingers is how Poles can make this episode part of their national narrative? We all know that we don't want to be singled out for our shortcomings, and so many nations skim over their dark pasts in their history books. Yet some steps have been taken by the Polish government to deal with this dark past. It re-opened the Jedwabne case, supporting the conclusion that it was Polish neighbours who carried out the killings.

Pasikowski's film and the debate it restarted is another such step. It's important to remember that many prominent Poles supported and defended the film when it came under attack. It's also critical that such a film comes from Poland, heralding the fact that on some level, the country is beginning a cathartic process of dealing with its difficult and complicated past.

For boycotters, the 'occupation' began in 1948

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

For those who believe that the anti-Israel boycotts and other forms of political warfare will end if an agreement is reached with the Palestinians, think again. Many of the organizations that lead these campaigns aren't focused on the post-1967 "occupation," but rather target all of 1948 Israel, from Kiryat Shmonah along the border with Lebanon (and Hezbollah) to Eilat at the southern tip.

For these political advocacy NGOs and their allies, any form of Jewish self-determination and sovereignty equality is, in their language, a form of racism, ethnic cleansing and apartheid. And Israeli Jews who live in the Negev or Tel Aviv are "settlers."

For example, the NGO known as Zochrot seeks to "raise public awareness of the [1948] Palestinian Nakba" (meaning the catastrophe) and supports a "right of return" – a total distortion of international law. They erase the Arab rejection of 1947 UN Partition Plan and the brutal war that followed, while attempts to flood Israel with millions of Palestinians are equivalent to seeking the elimination of any Jewish sovereignty. Arab refugees are sanctified, while roughly the same number of Jewish refugees who were expelled from Arab countries are wiped from the history books. Even if the peace negotiations succeed in defining borders and ending the "occupation," Zochrot and its allies would continue their demonization.

Until recently, the tiny group of fanatics that run Zochrot had little visibility or impact, but their activities and impact have increased significantly, thanks to large budgets (close to $500,000 in 2011) for travel, publicity and one-sided "conferences."

The core funders who enable Zochrot's 1948-based demonization of Israel include European governments that claim to support a two-state agreement. The state-funded groups (including Christian humanitarian aid frameworks) come from Germany (via the Catholic Misereor group and the Rosa Luxemburg Stiftung), the United Kingdom (Christian Aid), Belgium, Ireland, Switzerland, France and Finland. Germany's Remembrance, Responsibility and Future Foundation (EVZ), established primarily for restitution to forced labourers from the Nazi era, belatedly stopped funding for Zochrot in 2012.

While Zochrot is a particularly sharp example, it's not unique in promoting demonization campaigns that target Israel. Indeed, supporters of boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) and "Israeli apartheid" events on university campuses often refer to "occupation" while seeking the destruction of Israel. And much of the funding comes from frameworks that receive their budgets from irresponsible European governments, as well as some private funders.

Another example of NGO-led "1948 occupation" campaigns exploits the complex issues surrounding land claims on behalf of Israel's Negev Bedouin population. The Negev, with the city of Be'er Sheva, Ben-Gurion University and Soroka Medical Center, constitutes more than half of the country's territory. As the Israeli Bedouin population grew significantly, due both to Israeli prosperity and to polygamy, with very high birth rates, illegal building, without planning or environmental considerations, has expanded. As is true for any other competent government, the Israeli leadership has sought to change course, in form of assisting the Bedouin by creating new towns with schools, clinics and other necessary facilities.

In response, political NGOs launched global campaigns attacking the plan, including language such as "ethnic cleansing," "racial discrimination," and "human rights violations." In publications, videos, and presentations before the United Nations and European parliamentary groups, NGOs have falsely referred to the Negev Bedouin as "Palestinian victims" and Israeli Jewish residents in the Negev as "settlers." The campaign erases 4,000 years of Jewish history in the Negev (from the arrival of Abraham in Be'er Sheva), thereby delegitimizing Israeli sovereignty. Noted Israeli columnist Ben-Dror Yemini reviewed a slick propaganda video produced by Rabbis for Human Rights portraying Israel "as the cruel anti-Semitic ruler, expelling and disinheriting and destroying and robbing."

As in the case of Zochrot, funders bear responsibility for the damage caused by NGO warfare that exploits the language of human rights to target Israel. The European Union and its members (Germany again stands out), as well as the New Israel Fund (NIF), provide the money for the false claims and hypocritical Bedouin Negev campaigns.

By enabling fringe groups to mix the post-1967 "occupation" with the 1948 "green line," NGO donors have led many centrist Israelis to question the claim that a two-state agreement will end the demonization campaigns. If European governments and the NIF want to change Israeli perceptions, they can't allow their money to be used in these campaigns.

Hi, I'm Jewish

Andrea Freedman in Toronto

Recently, during a chance meeting, a woman struck up a conversation with me and began to divulge some of her personal history. She seemed friendly, and our chat was going along fine until she began to regale me with a story about a gentleman she knew.

When she said, "He's Jewish," as one of the first points of her description of him, an invisible warning sign went up for me. I felt the need to say that I, too, am Jewish, in case she was about to say anything derogatory against Jews. Immediately after I had provided that information, she went on to say how much she liked the man.

While I may never know the woman's true feelings, I prefer to keep it that way. She may well have said the exact same thing about him had I not mentioned that I was also Jewish, but I felt the need to head her off at the pass nonetheless. Past experience has taught me to be cautious.

If a person is important to me or is or may be in my life in a serious way, I actually would want to know what his or her feelings or possible racial prejudices are; however, if I will only be dealing with people as casual acquaintances or colleagues, I would just as soon not know how they feel about my religion or anyone else's.

There have been too many times in the past when I have been in a group setting, enjoying what I thought was a pleasant gathering, only to have that familiar sinking feeling when someone said something negative about Jewish people right in front of me.

In order to attempt to avoid such situations, I find myself trying to find the perfect segue to slip the fact that I'm Jewish into a conversation when I meet someone new. Better safe than sorry. I try to mention it casually, but what I'm really trying to say is, "If you were about to say anything against Jews, please don't, at least not until I am out of earshot."

Perhaps when I introduce myself to people, it might be easier to simply say, "Hi, I'm Andrea and I'm Jewish," or better still, to smile, extend my hand and say, "Hi, I'm Jewish." After all, people tend to forget names. An introduction such as that one, however, would likely be remembered.

I know some people who find it offensive when they are asked if they are Jewish. I, on the other hand, would rather have it out in the open, in the hope that, if the person I am talking with does happen to believe any negative stereotypes about Jews, once they find out my background, they will at least be smart enough to keep their feelings to themselves.

Where I may have hesitated to answer questions about my background in the past, and although I question why someone would inquire about another's religion in the first place, I would just as soon answer, in the hope of avoiding an uncomfortable incident.

Although my religion does not define me, it is a part of who I am, and words can be scathing. Try as people might to hide it, the look I have seen cloud faces in the past when they learned I was Jewish is unmistakable, but often masked by inappropriate comments in an attempted cover-up.

"You're Jewish!"

"Oh yes, I knew a nice Jewish chap once," or "I worked with a Jewish fellow." Sometimes they go on as if nothing has happened, other times they may change the subject.

Having travelled a fair bit, I have met people from all walks of life. There are those who, even in this day and age, have never met a Jew. It is still something foreign and, in some cases, exotic.

I have even heard someone refer to her son's wife as "my Jewish daughter-in-law," which spoke volumes about how difficult it was for the woman to accept her daughter-in-law. Otherwise, why would she bother mentioning the fact that she was Jewish?

Whether at work, travelling or in a social setting, I have come to realize that, for me anyway, instead of risking potential awkwardness for everyone involved, I would rather introduce myself with, "Hi, I'm Jewish." In other words, if you have any opinions about that, please, keep them to yourself.

Richmond Hill shul grows to 325 families

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Since becoming spiritual leader of Beit Rayim Synagogue more than a year ago, Rabbi Chezi Zionce has seen its membership grow by about 100 families.

An egalitarian, Conservative congregation located at the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Richmond Hill, the synagogue, which celebrated its 36th anniversary in the spring, now has a membership of more than 325 families.

The congregation started when a small group founded the Richmond Hill Jewish Community. It later became known as Shaareh Haim Congregation, but closed its doors in 1992. It started up again in a community centre later that year and changed its name to the current Beit Rayim.

At one time, Rabbi Zionce said, the synagogue was the same size as it is now, but "the congregation dwindled. It survived, however, and it has experienced exceptional growth at a time when many synagogues are floundering."

A member of United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, Beit Rayim also runs the largest supplementary Hebrew school in York Region, with 200 students from junior kindergarten to Grade 7.

"Beit Rayim literally means 'house of friends,' and our exceptional growth speaks volumes regarding our genuine focus on making everyone feel warmly welcomed," Rabbi Zionce said in a telephone interview.

He said half the membership is made up of young families, which dispels the myth that young people aren't looking to join a synagogue.

A Toronto native, Rabbi Zionce, 55, said that growing up, he attended a number of large synagogues, and they didn't foster a positive atmosphere. "Many did not allow young children in the sanctuary during services," he recalled.

He encourages young children to run around, he said, and he and Beit Rayim's cantor, Eli Bard, aren't bothered by the noise.

"I have them come up to the bimah, and they follow the cantor as he marches with the Torah. The parents and grandparents kvell, and it makes the kids happy to come to synagogue. If we engage the kids now, they'll want to keep coming," he said.

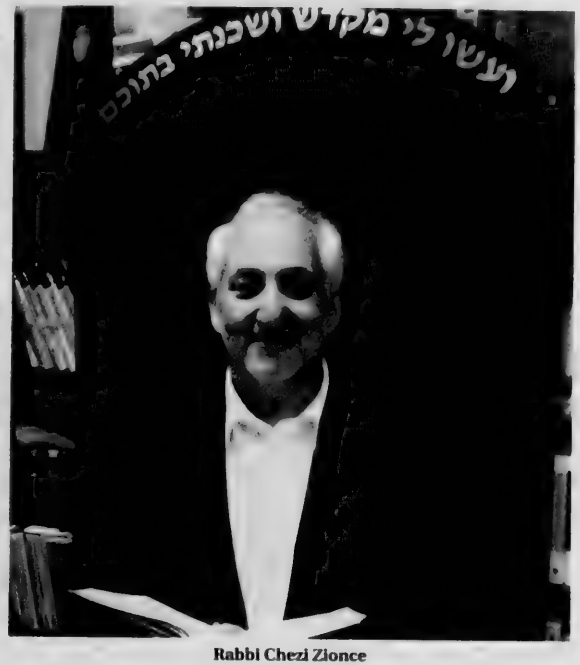
He and the cantor sit side by side with the congregation during services, he said.

"Even during the High Holidays, when we had about 1,000 people at the services, our seats were in the midst of the congregants. We complement each other, and we are close friends. This becomes evident during services."

When Hebrew school started up again in the fall, he said, he stood in the parking lot to welcome parents and students.

"I want to make sure I know as many people as possible, and let them know I'm accessible."

Many families search for a place to take their young children, Rabbi Zionce said, and "this is it. We're located in a growing area, and we have a young family committee, so they can have a say in what we offer."



Rabbi Chezi Zionce

Country a paradox, says Schneeweiss

Israel faces unprecedented challenges: consul general

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, DJ Schneeweiss, keynote speaker at last week's Empire Club of Canada meeting, talked about the challenges and opportunities facing Israel today.

In his lecture – which marked the first time in 37 years that an Israeli diplomat has been invited to present a talk for the speaker's forum – Schneeweiss spoke about Israel as a paradox, "a country faced by unprecedented threats and challenges, yet safer and more full of promise than any time in its history."

DJ Schneeweiss

He said Iran's "relentless drive toward nuclear weapons" is one of the threats to Israel's existence that makes "the view from Jerusalem look stark indeed."

Iran and six world powers came to Geneva last month to hammer out a six-month agreement that aims to curb Tehran's nuclear program in exchange for limited sanctions relief.

"Having come so far, having brought Tehran to begin to seek a way out of the stranglehold of the sanctions, Israel believes that the interim deal reached in Geneva is a mistake," he said.

"Through its de facto recognition of an Iranian right to enrich uranium, the core of the Iranian military nuclear program – and a right, I may add, that no other nation on earth has ever demanded or received – through allowing Iran to keep its centrifuges intact, and maintain other components of its military program… [the deal] reverses the very psychological and economic momentum that brought Iran to the negotiating table in the first place," he added.

Schneeweiss insisted that the deal weakens the possibility that the six world powers will be able to negotiate a comprehensive deal in the future.

"Freezing the situation is not enough. We need to roll back and dismantle Iran's enrichment capacity… We have to prevent Iran from having the capacity ever to build such weapons. We believe in and support a negotiated settlement – one that ends the threat, not one that perpetuates it," he said.

Turning his focus to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Schneeweiss said that Israel has made "repeated offers of territorial compromise. We have withdrawn from territories, we have removed ourselves from governing the daily lives of Palestinians, recognized the need for a Palestinian state and more. But we continue to come up empty handed."

Schneeweiss said he recognizes that some of Israel's actions have negatively impacted Palestinians, making them feel "victimized or worse. But it is a simple undeniable fact that this conflict began long before the Israeli community was established in the West Bank."

He said that Israel is committed to participating in negotiations with Palestinian leadership, adding that Israel is "ready for Palestinian statehood and for territorial compromise… but we also insist that the Palestinians recognize our own inalienable national rights and abandon further claims on our country."

In spite of the security threats that plague the Jewish state, Schneeweiss said that Israel is better off than it's ever been.

He said Israel still enjoys peace with Egypt in Jordan. Palestinian terrorism is on the decline due to a "mix of deterrent and defensive measures and diplomatic initiatives," and Israel's development of a missile defence system in response to the missile threat posed by Hezbollah and others has been successful.

"Meanwhile, in economic and diplomatic terms, Israel is more integrated than ever in the global economy," he said.

"Israel's technological prowess has become legendary. We are ranked top in the world by the World Economic Forum for the quality of our scientific research institutions and fourth overall for our innovative capacity."

Late last month, Apple purchased PrimeSense, an Israeli tech company, for $350 million.

"This makes it the 13th Israeli high-tech company to be acquired by foreign investors in 2013. Why isn't Canada getting a greater piece of this seriously nutritious pie?"

Schneeweiss said that despite Canada's long-standing friendship with Israel, "the Canada-Israel relationship is not where it should be.

"Bilateral trade was less than $1.5 billion in 2012, far from its potential… Firms are not even fully utilizing the funds the government has made available for [research and development] collaboration… As like-minded peace-loving democratic nations… and as nations whose economic success is directly linked to maintaining our respective competitive edges, it is bordering on negligent if we don't work harder to harness the synergies and opportunities that reside in the strengths that we both bring to the table."

$194,000 in grants obtained for new service

March of Living to create digital archive

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

For years, Joe Mandel turned down the opportunity to join the March of the Living on its annual trip to Nazi death camps.

Mandel was a Holocaust survivor who was liberated by American troops on May 4, 1945, in the Gunskirchen Concentration Camp. And in 2012, he changed his mind about the trip. It was a propitious decision.

That was the same year that the March, which brings hundreds of Jewish teenagers and survivors to Poland to visit the destroyed Jewish communities as well as the Nazi death camps, invited U.S. liberators on the trip.

And there, in eastern Europe, a remarkable coincidence was recorded for posterity. Mandel met Mason (Mickey) Dorsey, a veteran of the 71st Infantry Division, the man who actually blew open the gates of Gunskirchen in Austria.

When Mandel learned that his liberator was present, he sought him out and identified himself, and the two men shared an emotional embrace.

"Who could have scripted a thing like that?" asked Eli Rubenstein, national director of March of the Living Canada. "The students saw the survivor thank him, hug him. No student will forget that. It's a memory they'll have for the rest of their lives."

March of the Living, a department of Jewish Federations of Canada-UIA, recorded the reunion as well as the testimony of hundreds of survivors who joined the March over the years. Thanks to grants from the Canadian government, the Claims Conference and Dennis and Laura Bennie, totaling $194,000, the digitized version of the meeting will soon be accessible to the wider public.

The grant will permit the March of the Living to take their footage of survivors' testimonies, digitize and organize them into archives that will be made available on the web to anyone with an interest in the Holocaust.

Resembling Steven Spielberg's Shoah Foundation, which records testimony of survivors and witnesses, the March's project goes one step further, Rubenstein said. The March videos were recorded on site, in eastern European villages and death camps. They pack an additional emotional punch by virtue of their location, the reaction of the students and chance circumstances such as Mandel's reunion with his liberator. That's something you don't get in a recording made in someone's living room, he said.

Rubenstein points to the testimony of another survivor, Sidney Zoltak. Zoltak grew up in the Polish village of Siemiatycze. At the age of 11, he escaped to live in the forest. In his story, recorded at Treblinka where nearly one million Jews were murdered, he tells how of all his classmates, he is the only who survived.

"This is where my village was wiped out," he tells March students. The rest of you can have class reunions, but the only place for my class reunion is here, he said.

"The power of that testimony and as a teaching tool is exceptionally moving," Rubenstein said.

Given the location and the presence of the students, many survivors provide more details than they might have otherwise, he added.

With the grants in place, March of the Living will hire personnel to assist in retrieving videos taken over the past 25 years, which are scattered in the organization's offices in Toronto, Montreal and Winnipeg. The testimonies will then be transferred to a common digital format and edited. In the end, the expectation is that survivors' testimony will be organized by theme – hidden children, prewar life, resistance, liberation – and be made available online, perhaps in co-operation with Canadian Holocaust centres.

The goal is to "create a web portal so students in the future can access the testimony and give the general public access to the material," Rubenstein said.

Mount Sinai Auxiliary marks 60 years

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Karen Goldlist joined Mount Sinai Auxiliary about 13 years ago to help out with a program that provides new moms with layettes.

Now, as the auxiliary celebrates its 60th anniversary, Goldlist, 53, is part way through her two-year term as president.

"I originally joined because my friends were assembling about 200 layettes a year, for a program called Baby's First Comforts, and they needed an extra hand. As I began to realize the extent of the auxiliary's work, I got more and more involved."

The seeds for the auxiliary were planted in 1922, when a group of Jewish women began raising money to build a hospital where Jewish doctors could practise medicine without discrimination and where immigrant communities – Jewish and non-Jewish – could receive high-level care.

In 1933, after the women raised $12,000, a down payment was placed on a building on Yorkville Avenue that became the original Mount Sinai. In 1953, the institution moved to University Avenue, and in 1973, it moved to its current location a bit further north at 600 University Ave.

The auxiliary, a consolidated volunteer organization, was founded in 1953 and has since raised and contributed $30 million to the hospital. It was one of the first philanthropic volunteer groups to organize big fundraising galas in Toronto.

The original group was made up of wives of doctors and dentists at the hospital, "and it grew from there. Now it is made up of people who have a strong commitment to [Mount Sinai,]" Goldlist said

Proceeds from its 60th anniversary gala, held in the fall, will support the auxiliary's $4.5-million pledge to support the hospital's women's and infants' health program.

In the past 60 years, the auxiliary established volunteer services at the hospital, opened and still operates the gift shop, created the baby photography program, and developed and maintains a hospital, lecture series held in four languages, to educate immigrants and patients about important health-care topics.

Goldlist said the auxiliary has always been "this incredible machine that was fuelled by a drive to make Mount Sinai all that it could be, and really, all that it is today. It was the organization against which all other auxiliaries were measured. It was, and still is, extraordinary."

Karen and Barry Goldlist

Joseph Mapa, Mount Sinai's president and CEO, said that funds from this most recent gala and other auxiliary programs, "have always been something the hospital can count on. The auxiliary funds are like an annuity for Mount Sinai. For so many years they have provided a reliable stream of revenue, funds that literally helped us to build Mount Sinai and continue to help us define ourselves as providers of the best medicine."

Goldlist said one of the auxiliary's biggest challenges is engaging new people. "We're mindful of creating a growing volunteer base for the hospital, and new groups such as Mom's for Sinai and Future Sinai, have been started.

She said that the that these two groups are planning the annual Chef's Challenge, to be held in February, which usually brings in a whole new group of volunteers and donors. The event, which raises money for specialty care and research into women's cancers, this year features Chef Giada DeLaurentiis.

"I have a great team behind me, and two of the longest-standing members, Henrietta Chesnie and Florence Cooper, still belong. [The] team can practically run these events with their eyes closed."

Goldlist works hard for the auxiliary, but she gets back as much as she gives, she said.

"When I think about all that the auxiliary has accomplished, and what the driving force has been these past 60 years, I have always come back to the same thing – friendship.

"Women got involved and continue to run this wonderful community because of like-minded women who are inspired to join together to make a difference. All that the auxiliary has built for Mount Sinai, it has built through friendship."

Dancing good for the brain

"Any type of dancing where people are improvising is good for the brain, as it involves making split-second decisions," said Barker.

"The more you do, the more you can do. I have had a hip replacement and I have a bad knee, but when the music comes on, I forget my name. There is no stopping me," said Green.

For her sister's 100th birthday party last March, Green danced the Charleston and hopes to do it again for her 101st.

"It is important to learn from the older generations, and to take what they know, and bring it into our work. Our most recent routine, Ballin' the Jack, was choreographed completely by Marion Green and will be performed to the seniors at Baycrest's Wagman Centre," Barker said.

The duo gave The CJN a sneak peak which was captured on video. To view it, go to cjnews.com.

Correction

The photo "Math whizzes" (Nov. 28) should have said that Associated Hebrew Schools' Grade 4 student Justin Schwartz placed second, and Ami Gorodzinsky, Grade 3, placed fourth in the world in the Caribou Mathematics Competition, not in Ontario, as originally stated, competing against 2704 other students.

Len Rudner, CIJA's director of community relations and outreach, said fewer than 10 people attended the event, and he saw no new media there.

"[Attendees] were all folks already committed to the cause," he told The CJN.

The press conference was followed by what UNJPPI co-ordinator Dale Hildebrand called a "public witness event" outside the Canadian Tire store at Bay and Dundas streets.

Rudner described it as roughly 10 people carrying placards and handing out flyers to passersby, while Hildebrand estimated the number of participants in Toronto was closer to 20.

"There was absolutely no indication that their messaging found any traction in front of the store," Rudner said, noting that inside, it was business as usual.

The UNJPPI initiative is aligned with one the church launched in June based on its August 2012 General Council resolution. The campaign, called "Unsettling Goods," urges church members to "pray, choose, speak for peace in Palestine and Israel" by boycotting products made by Israeli firms in the West Bank. The campaign calls Israeli settlements there an "obstacle to peace."

The United Church sent out materials to congregations last month inviting them to join in the campaign, which includes the boycott, Hildebrand said.

He described his group's demonstrations as "public witness events," as opposed to protests, since members were engaging people in conversation, rather than chanting slogans or acting in a confrontational manner.

Hildebrand called the overall campaign a success, with some 100 people taking part in events across the country last week. He said the Toronto event "was successful in that we talked to a lot of people on the street."

But Rudner suggested that people who did take the group's pamphlets were unlikely to be swayed, because the area near the store is filled with activists.

"Let's face it, we're in Toronto. You can stand on the corner and hold a piece of paper and people will take it because we're polite," he said.

B'nai Brith Canada released a statement saying it became clear anti-Semitism was at the heart of the Toronto protest after its national vice-president, who declined to give his name to The CJN, was "harassed" in front of the store.

Spokesperson Sam Eskanasi said the B'nai Brith executive was handed a boycott card and then showed a protester that he had just purchased a SodaStream product. The B'nai Brith executive engaged the person in a "pleasant but useless" conversation, then she called him a "stupid thief" and a "religious fanatic," Eskenasi claimed.

Hildebrand said he was unaware of the incident, but that kind of confrontation goes against his organization's guidelines.

"We ask people to be very respectful," he said. "What we want to do is to engage people in a reasonable and straightforward conversation about the issues. We're not interested in confrontation, and we're not interested in acrimonious debate."

Saber-Freedman said CIJA launched its "buycott" in response to UNJPPI's efforts. The CIJA-affiliated website BuycottIsrael.com regularly urges readers to buy items being targeted by anti-Israel boycotts and encourages them to post pictures of themselves with the goods on Facebook and other social networking sites.

Saber-Freedman said SodaStream, which makes home soft-drink carbonation machines, is actually the model of what peace should look like, noting that around half of its employees are Palestinians who are treated and paid the same way as Jewish Israeli employees.

Although she called the Toronto press conference and boycott launch a failure, given the lack of attendance, she said it's important for the pro-Israel community to have a clear understanding of what it's dealing with.

"We're not responding to… something that calls for yelling and screaming," she said. "It's something that calls for smart, thoughtful action, and we think that's what a buycott is."

In a statement, the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies said it was "horrified to learn the United Church is intensifying its campaign against the Jewish People… in support of the 'Unsettling Goods' boycott, divestment and sanctions campaign against the Jewish state."

Israeli MK says children must be saved

Canada gets warning about radical sect

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The chair of the Israeli parliamentary committee hearing allegations of mistreatment within the Lev Tahor sect says her government launched the inquiry on its own after seeking collaboration with Canadian authorities.

Knesset member Orly Lévy-Abecassis told La Presse in an interview published Dec. 2 that it's "urgent" authorities in Canada and Israel now co-operate fully "to save the child victims of this sect. Each day counts."

Many ex-members of the anti-Zionist haredi group and relatives of members living in Israel have given "blood-chilling" testimonies of violence, forced marriages and ill treatment of children, she said.

Lévy-Abecassis said the Israeli government is holding the inquiry into the sect, which was based in Ste. Agathe, Que., until last month, when most of the group left for southwestern Ontario, because many of its members are Israeli. There is also an affiliated group in Israel.

"It was the duty of our state to know exactly what was going on over there and to collaborate with the Canadian authorities to put an end to the ill treatment and to ensure the safety of the children…

"We have learned that some abuses were known for several years in Canada. Therefore, we started to act alone."

More than 200 Lev Tahor members, the great majority, have moved to Chatham, Ont., where they appear to be settling. Local media reported they have left motels and moved into apartments while they look for property to buy.

The group, led by Israeli-born Rabbi Shlomo Helbrans, had lived in Ste. Agathe in the Laurentians for a decade. Their houses and other buildings are up for sale.

Orly Lévy-Abecassis

Lev Tahor had been under intense investigation by Quebec's Youth Protection Department for several months and departed overnight just ahead of a scheduled tribunal was to examine allegations of child neglect against two families.

On Nov. 27, a St. Jérôme youth court judge ordered the families' 14 children immediately placed in foster care for at least 30 days, on the basis of evidence, including from a former group member, which is subject to a publication ban.

As of Dec. 4, the children were still in Ontario with their parents, who defied an order that they appear at the hearing.

A leader of the group, Uriel Goldman, told the media on Dec. 2 that the families would abide by the court order if an Ontario judge certifies it.

As Lev Tahor leaders have said repeatedly, Goldman denied the allegations of abuse and neglect and said the reason the group left Quebec is that it cannot comply with the province's education curriculum because of its religious beliefs.

Lévy-Abecassis said she thinks Lev Tahor "took advantage of the flexibility of Canadian laws, of the respect for individual freedom that exists in your country…

"They knew that, over there, they would be less watched, less easily worried by justice."

Among the testimonies was that of a woman who said she was not allowed to see her child for two years because she started to question what was going on in the sect.

The Knesset committee also heard of frequent "cruel" corporal punishment of children, including making children keep their hands in snow for hours, and the "brainwashing" of youth.

She warned Canadians to be more vigilant because other sects, "attracted by this spirit of tolerance, could find refuge with you."

Persecuted writer granted asylum

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Award-winning Hungarian-Jewish writer Akos Kertesz, 80, has been granted political asylum in Canada, where he fled last year, claiming to be the victim of a state-led "hate campaign."

Kertesz arrived in Montreal in February 2012 saying his life in Hungary had become intolerable because of his outspokenness abroad on Hungarians' role in the Holocaust and his denunciation of the country's right-wing government.

He has been granted refugee status despite the Canadian government having placed Hungary on a list of "safe" countries in a controversial move one year ago.

In an article in the American Hungarian-language newspaper Amerikai Nepszava, Kertesz expressed gratitude to Canada for "ensuring security" for himself and his wife, calling this country "an island of peace and tolerance."

He said his "painful decision" to leave his homeland was not an indictment of the Hungarian nation, but rather "its current political authorities which seek to destroy the country's newborn democracy."

Eva Balogh, the Hungarian-born U.S. academic who edits the pro-democracy website Hungarian Spectrum, wrote that, with the granting of asylum to Kertesz, the "fiction" that the Hungarian government tries to promote abroad that there is no anti-Semitism in their country is "definitely dead."

Kertesz is the author of more than 20 books and plays that have been translated into several languages, but not English. One of his best-known novels, Makra, is expected to be published in Canada next year.

Winnipeg Jewish nursing home rabbi retires

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Rabbi Neal Rose has enjoyed a lengthy and varied career as a teacher, a community and congregational rabbi and a family life counsellor.

However, he says, the most important work he has done has been serving for the past 13 years as the first official rabbi for the Saul & Claribel Simkin Centre, the Winnipeg Jewish nursing home.

On Nov. 28, Rabbi Rose lowered the curtain on that part of his life so that he and his wife, Carol, can spend more time with their children and grandchildren in Jerusalem, Philadelphia, Edmonton, St. Louis and Boston.

"Rabbi Rose has made an enormous contribution to Jewish life at the centre," said Dr. Edward (Ted) Lyons, chair of the board of the Simkin Centre. "He has brought comfort to many families in times of need, and he has been a guiding light for us as a Jewish organization. He has also built important relationships with other clergy to the benefit of our residents who aren't Jewish."

The rabbi said he had been thinking about retirement for some time, but with two changes in CEO at the centre over the past two years, he felt that he should stay on a little longer to help with the transition.

Rabbi Neal Rose, his wife Carol and their grandchildren

Originally from New York, the Roses came to Winnipeg in 1967 after the rabbi was offered a position teaching at the University of Manitoba in the Judaic studies department. In the early 1970s, the couple established an alternative yom tov service, which developed a loyal following. They are still leading the annual service.

In early 2000, shortly after retiring from his teaching position at the university, Rabbi Rose was invited to become the first official rabbi at the Sharon Home (as the Simkin Centre was then known). The longtime Jewish nursing home was in transition. It was in the process of relocating from its decades-old building in north Winnipeg to a new facility in south Winnipeg, where a majority of the Jewish community had already immigrated to.

"Since the centre had never had a rabbi-in-residence before, I was able to craft the role as I saw fit," he said.

Over the years, Rabbi Rose was able to introduce many innovations that have made worship easier and more meaningful for the home's residents and their families. One of his first innovations was to create a new siddur and machzor with larger print and more graphics, changes that made the prayer books more accessible to the residents.

He also shortened the Shabbat service to an hour and yom tov services to an hour and 20 minutes, and simplified the Pesach seder to take into account the shorter attention span of most of the residents.

With the help of a Jewish-owned printing company, he produced a mini-Chumash for Monday and Thursday morning Torah readings.

"I worked with the recreation department to train the staff [most of whom aren't Jewish] to do programming for Shabbat and all the Jewish holidays," he said.

Another of his innovations was to develop a davening program for residents suffering from Alzheimer's disease.

Rabbi Rose also designed a special tallit for residents in wheelchairs. He noted that he had the fabric and the work donated by local Jewish suppliers.

He prevailed upon a Jewish-owned lighting retailer to supply electric Shabbat candlesticks for the residents.

"We have been very fortunate in that we have received a lot of help from the community," he said. "And we have been particularly helpful with residents and their families when people are dying.

"I think my greatest accomplishment while at the Simkin Centre was to put spiritual care at the forefront of the needs and services that the centre provides – so much so that this past fall, the board created a spiritual care and Jewish identity committee."

As for the future, Rabbi Rose is working on a book of midrash, and he and Carol plan on continuing their counselling career and leading their High Holiday services.

Rabbi Rose will honoured by a tea at the centre on Dec. 16.

Kosher restaurant fire may be arson

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Arson is suspected as the cause of a fire at a kosher restaurant in Notre-Dame-de-Grâce early on the morning of Dec. 2.

The blaze broke out at the Fuego Steakhouse at 6136 Côte St. Luc Rd., which is certified by the Vaad Ha'ir, at around 4:45 a.m. About 40 firefighters were called in to put out the three-alarm fire.

It was initially thought to be the result of an electrical problem, but investigators reportedly discovered several signs that the fire had been deliberately set.

The fire, which took almost two hours to extinguish, caused an estimated $200,000 in damages.

A man who answered the phone at the restaurant on Dec. 4, identifying himself as the person who runs the business, told The CJN investigators have not confirmed the cause of the fire.

"I cannot assume anything [at this time]," he said, refusing to give his name. "We are waiting for the experts to get the information."

Fuego opened about 18 months ago, he said.

"We have no clue when we will reopen. We hope to serve our customers soon."

Last June, two kosher restaurants on Queen Mary Road, Chops Resto-Bar and Café Shalom, were firebombed within two nights of each other.

Although police released video surveillance images of suspects and the owner of Chops offered a financial reward for information leading to an arrest, no one has been apprehended. Police said there was no evidence to confirm that those attacks were motivated by hate.

Young adults, survivors connect over dinner

Vicky Tobiannh
Special to The CJN

About 225 young adults and 33 Holocaust survivors dined and shared stories at the ninth annual Dinner of Miracles at Petah Tikvah Synagogue on Dec. 2.

"The goal is to give young people a chance to hear stories they might not know," said volunteer co-ordinator Jenn Morawetz. "It's a more comfortable environment when we're all together, instead of listening to a lecturer on stage. You invest personally when you speak face to face... to make sure it doesn't happen again."

Since its inception, the event has brought Holocaust survivors together with more than 2,000 young adults who ask questions and learn from the seniors' experiences in a personal, informal setting. The event targets a key demographic: young Jews who are old enough to be out of school and therefore no longer learning about the Holocaust and young enough that they might not have a direct connection to the Holocaust within their own family.

Developing a connection to the Holocaust and to Jewish heritage through events such as this one, is essential, said Przemyslaw Dudek, 30, who was born in Koszalin, Poland, and, like many young Polish Jews today, only found out he was Jewish a few years ago.

Young professionals listen to a Holocaust survivor share his story at the 9th annual Dinner of Miracles at Petah Tikvah Synagogue.

"It was mentioned by my uncle that we were Jewish," Dudek said. "But [with] 100,000 people in the city but no Jewish community, I didn't see how it would affect my life."

That changed completely when he went on a Birthright trip in 2009 and found a deeper connection to his Jewish heritage. Since then, he's participated in many programs and seminars that bring together young European Jews.

"Five years ago, if someone would've told me I'd be giving a speech in Toronto at the Dinner of Miracles, I never would've believed it," he said.

While the current Jewish community in Poland – estimated to be around 8,000 – doesn't come close to the almost 400,000 Jews who lived in there before the Holocaust, Dudek said he wants people to know that the Jewish community, albeit small, still exists.

"I want people to know that we are there, that we're doing all that we can to live a Jewish life," he said. "It's very important for us that Poland is not only mentioned as the place of the Holocaust, but that we are there. Come and see today's Jewish life. It still exists."

Throughout the evening, Holocaust survivors told their story to the young adults seated at their table. For Holocaust survivor Amek Adler, talking about his past wasn't always easy.

"Up to 10 years ago, I didn't want to associate with anything about the Holocaust, I didn't feel welcome," he said. "In the beginning, it was uncomfortable being a survivor. Now, we're on a pedestal."

Adler was 11-years-old when the war broke out in 1939.

"We cannot take you back to Egypt, to where our ancestors were slaves, but we can take you back to Poland and show you what they did," he said. "It's very important we educate the young generation."

That's what motivated Adler to share his story. He's been on the March of the Living five times, has written a book and speaks in schools and synagogues.

"We're putting a very big burden on your shoulders to carry on our experiences to the next generation," said Adler, now 85. "We've got to prevent it so it doesn't happen again."

making people's lives BETTER

Installed as university's 16th president

Meric Gertler takes the reins at U of T

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

As the recently installed president of the University of Toronto, Meric Gertler says he'll strive to leverage the campus' location more effectively, strengthen its international partnerships and produce more "job-ready graduates."

Gertler – who became U of T's 16th president last month, three decades after joining the university as an assistant professor in the geography department – spoke to The CJN about his ambitions and addressed some issues related to the Jewish community.

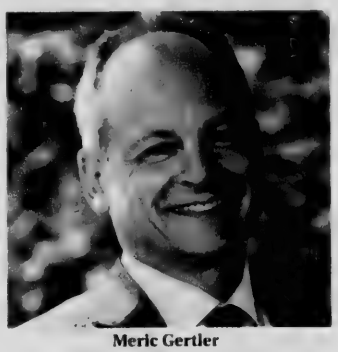
Although Gertler has only been in the president's chair for about a month and half, he said one of the things that prepared him for this challenging role was his five years of experience as U of T's dean of arts and science.

"That is equivalent to being president of a university at many other institutions, in the sense that arts and science alone has 30,000 students. It's bigger than most universities in Canada and has about a half-billion dollar budget," Gertler said.

He said that since last March, when the announcement about his presidency was made, until September, he has travelled to a number of large cities that are home to some of the world's best universities.

"I went to cities like Chicago, New York, Baltimore, Boston, and also to London in the U.K. I had a look at the activities of universities there."

He said he wanted to get a sense of how the universities "leveraged their location, how they take advantage of their situation in large metropolitan regions to enhance their own strengths. Often that [is done] indirectly by helping to make their city stronger, and in doing so, making the university stronger by making it easier for them to attract and retain great faculty, great students, great staff."



Meric Gertler
(Brian Summers photo)

After spending two months job-shadowing outgoing U of T president David Naylor, and having conversations about transitioning into his new role, Gertler hit the ground running.

In just his second month in charge of Canada's highest-ranked university (according to the Times Higher Education World University Rankings), Gertler is actively working toward his many goals, one of which is to better prepare U of T graduates for the working world.

"We're under a lot of pressure to produce job-ready graduates, but the question is, how do we do that while retaining the best of a liberal arts education or a broadly-based undergraduate education? That is something that will continue to be a pressing challenge," he said.

Another of his ambitions is to strengthen U of T's international partnerships.

Gertler, a world-renowned urban policy and planning expert who gave a lecture on urban studies at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem two years ago, said U of T has a very strong relationship with the Israeli school.

"We also have a great relationship with the Technion in Haifa, which is only getting stronger. We just had the president, Peretz Lavie, in Toronto," he said.

"We're very interested in what they're doing in the whole area of innovation and entrepreneurship and the whole start-up nation phenomenon, in which they've played such an important role."

Gertler said he's interested in bringing U of T into a new partnership with Technion and China's Shantou University.

Chinese billionaire Li Ka Shing is funding a joint project between the Israeli and Chinese schools, and has created a new centre called the Technion Guangdong Institute of Technology.

"Soon after meeting with president Lavie, I went to China, spent eight days there, and met the director of the Li Ka Shing Foundation and had a chance to talk about that relationship with Technion," he said.

"There is a lot of interest on both sides and I anticipate more interaction there, possibly a three-way between us, them and China."

He said U of T also has meaningful partnerships with the Weizmann Institute, Tel Aviv University and the University of Haifa.

When it comes to calls by promoters of boycotts, sanctions and divestments who demand that U of T cut ties to Israeli academic institutions, Gertler said his university has always taken a very clear stance on the issue.

"We feel that academic boycotts are just completely counter to the fundamental values of the University of Toronto, and we object in principle to any boycott or ban that tries to politicize academic discourse… because they disagree with the policies of their government. That is just a non-starter."

Gertler also addressed an ongoing issue for Jewish and pro-Israel students at schools across North America: Israeli Apartheid Week, which originated at U of T in 2005. Last month, the students' union at U of T's Scarborough campus voted to endorse the annual event.

"The university does not sponsor or endorse any of this activity, or any student-organized events. We also fully recognize that the very term 'Israeli apartheid' is distressing to many people.

"The second thing I would say is that universities… have a unique role and an important role to provide a safe venue for difficult discourse on controversial topics. We also have a responsibility to make sure that the discourse takes place in a respectful way and that… organizers… understand the difference between free speech and hate speech."

Gertler, the son of a Holocaust survivor, boasted about U of T's Centre for Jewish Studies, which continues to expand its reach.

"What I love about it is that it builds on all the academic strengths that we have at the university in history, philosophy, languages, in literary and cultural studies, in so many areas in politics and more," he said. "Jewish studies has attracted burgeoning enrolments, not just from Jewish students, but something like half the enrolments in courses are from non-Jewish students."

Gertler, who described Toronto's Jewish community as "the most significant, best-organized, most vibrant communities we have in the city," said he hopes to continue to build on the relationship between the university and the community "and leverage that partnership for mutual benefit."

ZAREINU DONATION: Members of the Lodge Ilan Ramon chapter of the Hebrew Order of David International, a non-profit fraternal organization, recently donated $5,000 after a chapter-wide fundraiser for the Zareinu Educational Centre of Metropolitan Toronto. Children from the new, integrated Zareinu class at Netivot HaTorah Day School lent a helping hand to accept this most generous donation. Pictured, from left, back row, are Les Prosser, Adrian Lichtman, Cyril Braude and Leonard Laser; and front row, from left, Chiam-Dov, Mendel, Shoshana and Yael.

Knishes for your kitchen

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Of all the challenges the Jewish People have had to overcome throughout the ages, this is not one of them. But oy, what a nuisance it has become.

A fire at Gabila's Knishes on Long Island, billed as the world's biggest maker of these greasy delights, caused consternation and headlines around the globe (New York Times: "From small fire, a great fried-knish famine"). [http://bit.ly/knish11]

The impending shortage was even memorialized by a limerick on National Public Radio:

For tasty, filled Jewish kuh-dishes,
The timing is simply kuh-vicious.
Supplies are all gone-ukkah,
Right before Hanukkah.
It seems we've run out of kuh-nish-es. [http://bit.ly/knish1]

Although the makers suggested that knishes are too difficult to create at home, the trove of online recipes seems to belie that claim. We'll get to the recipes in a moment. But first, some history.

The Oxford Companion to American Food and Drink calls the knish a "canonical" Jewish American food whose name comes from Ukrainian Yiddish (from the verb "to crease"). Knishes successfully made the jump from eastern Europe to the United States and into the Jewish vernacular. "The round, potato-stuffed knish became an American Yiddish metaphor for stupidity ('the brains of a knish'), unexpected good fortune ('to be hit with a knish'), and sexual favours ('looking for some knish')." [http://bit.ly/knish2]

The Jewish-food Knish Archives (yes, there are knish archives!) lists an impressive 32 varieties including Corned Beef, Indian Potato and Tuna, and several recipes from Manhattan's venerable Yonah Schimmel Knishery – with chicken, kasha and cheese fillings. [http://bit.ly/knish3]

Another Jewish recipe goldmine offers a dozen others including Fruit-filled, Jennie Grossinger's and Knishelach (Little Knishes). [http://bit.ly/knish12]

For years, filmmaker Laura Silver was on the hunt for the holy grail of knishes – Fannie Stahl's, founder of Mrs. Stahl's knishes and one of Brooklyn's "legendary purveyors of the stuffed, baked eastern European savoury pastries." Silver's quest took her to San Francisco, where she tracked down Fannie Stahl's granddaughters, who agreed to share their bubbie's recipe with Laura – and you. [http://bit.ly/knish4]

Since the fire, it seems as though everyone has been getting into the act. Brooklyn's Center for Kosher Culinary Arts ("the only kosher cooking school outside of Israel to offer career training in culinary and pastry arts") has created a Gabila-like recipe "for all those 'knish-a-holics' suffering through the knish crisis." [http://bit.ly/knish13] And there's even a vegan version (hold the liver – bring on the tofu), care of PETA, People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals. [http://bit.ly/knish5]

If you need help with the technique, you can observe experts ply their trade on YouTube. [http://bit.ly/knish6] But for a real heimishe ta'am, I recommend watching Rukhl Schaechter and Eve Jochnowitz instruct you in Yiddish (with English subtitles). [http://bit.ly/knish7]

What will a knish do to your waistline? According to fitday.com, a standard potato knish packs 214 calories with about half from fat. [http://bit.ly/knish10]

If you love the food, but can't find like-minded fans, fear not. Join the Facebook group, The International Knish Society, and you'll never be alone. Archival photos, "lost" recipes and more. [http://bit.ly/knish8]

For those who rely on Gabila's, the news is good. The knish shortage is almost over. But isn't the news even better if you can bake one yourself?

Kashrut agency adds safety mandate

Lauren Kramer
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — How safe is your food? That could depend on whether or not is has the Kosher Check certification.

Formerly known as BC Kosher – with its BCK hechsher – the Vancouver-based agency now known as Kosher Check is expanding its requirements for kosher certification to include food safety standards beyond the minimum regulations laid out by Canada's Food Inspection Agency.

Kosher Check is insisting that present and future clients adhere to advanced food safety protocols such as Canada's Hazard Awareness Critical Control Points (HACCP), British Retail Consortium standards (BRC), Safe Quality Foods (SQF), the Foundation for Food Safety Certification (FSSC), among others.

"We feel customers have a right to know that their food is safe," says Rabbi Avraham Feigelstock, who sits on the Vancouver Rabbinical Court.

What's more, the market is demanding additional levels of food safety inspection, he adds, with Europe being way ahead of North America.

Two to three decades ago, such food safety scrutiny might not have been necessary.

"It used to be when you went into a bakery or butcher shop, the chances of your products having ingredients from China, India or Sri Lanka was low, but today it's the opposite," Rabbi Feigelstock says. "The food market has become global, which is good because it brings down the price, but other countries don't have the same level of food safety that we do. The need for a system to ensure these products are safe is essential."

Kosher Check is taking the lead in this respect and is the only kosher agency worldwide making this move.

It's a non-profit that has distinguished itself from other kosher certifying agencies since the mid-1980s, not long after its inception.

In 1985, Rabbi Feigelstock, the organization's founder and supervising rabbi, began operating in Asia and today has representatives throughout the world. That makes Kosher Check Canada's only kosher certification agency that operates internationally in a significant way.

Companies that already have a BCK hechsher are now required to have food safety certification as well, though more than 95 per cent of the companies Kosher Check certifies are already in compliance, he says. Kosher Check certifies some 14,000 products, with 2,000 of them manufactured and certified in Asia.

Obtaining the extra level of food safety certification isn't necessarily all that complicated for food manufacturers, thanks to Icicle, cloud-based software created by Burton Software in Richmond, B.C. Companies pay to subscribe to the software, enter their ingredient lists and are given data on what they have to do to achieve kosher certification and HACCP certification.

What Kosher Check is doing is nothing short of revolutionary, Rabbi Feigelstock says.

"For the first time in history, a customer can know just by looking at a product label that a product is HACCP certified," he says. "We're the only agency in the world that is offering customers some kind of certification that tells them, 'This food is safe.'"

Kosher Check's 500 customers include Canada Safeway, Rogers Sugar, Garden Protein, Golden Boy Foods and Sunrise Soya.

Rethinking Israel's Bedouins

From the Reut Institute
Alissa Breiman

What comes to mind when you think about Israel's Bedouins? Warm hospitality in a Bedouin tent during a family mission or a Taglit-Birthright Israel trip? Camel rides and sweet tea? Or maybe the Israeli-Arabs that serve in the army?

For many Israelis, similar associations will spring to mind. However, the place of Israel's Bedouin community in the Zionist narrative and the Israeli imagination has begun to shift over the past few weeks. Political tensions and violent protests have opened to doors to a new conversation and a new overt challenge facing Israel's leadership and the country's identity.

In June 2013, the Bill on the Arrangement of Bedouin Settlement in the Negev (also known as the Prawer Plan or the Prawer-Begin Plan) passed by a slim majority in the Knesset. The bill outlines the relocation of a large proportion of Israel's Bedouins from unrecognized townships to government approved townships.

The uncertainty and impermanency that have defined the status of Israel's Bedouins since the establishment of Israel are at the heart of the government's attempt to create a new order. While the government sees the plan as an investment in basic services and access to economic and education opportunities for Israel's Bedouins, opposition to the bill frames it as land grab and as part of a broader effort to strengthen Jewish settlement, made without proper consultation with the local Bedouin population.

But the uncertainty and impermanency that surround Israel's Bedouins is not new. In many ways, the Israeli government has, in the main, made a concerted effort to maintain this status quo for much of the past 65 plus years. The overwhelming "otherness" of Israel's Bedouins – the difference in organization, norms, laws, values and needs – have allowed a policy of non-policy to reign for more than six decades.

An effort to streamline settlement and infrastructure for a community that is fundamentally different in its make-up to that of the majority population is not unique to Israel. While there are a number of key differences, attempts to streamline government policy in areas of settlement and infrastructure among Australia's indigenous peoples, for example, highlight the complexity of the challenge and the unquestionable importance of cultural sensitivity, thorough local consultation and the dangers of failed urbanization.

For the Jewish People, however, Bedouin resettlement presents a new and unfamiliar challenge. While for centuries, Jewish leadership was largely concerned with meeting the needs of the local Jewish community and often communicating these needs to the relevant governmental powers, the government of Israel is responsible to act in the interest of all its citizens in a way that brings value to all its citizens.

So while a status quo of uncertainty has left the Bedouins on the periphery of the Israeli national narrative, recent events have created an opening for Israel's Bedouins to occupy a new place. These protests and subsequent media storm have forced Israeli society to question Israel's policies of settlement and maintaining the status quo and have created a renewed conversation around the challenges facing a Jewish majority rule in a country with significant minority communities. Indeed, the issue of Bedouin settlement and land rights is complex and presents a unique challenge to Israel's leadership and Israeli society at large.

Alissa Breiman, an immigrant from Australia, led the Reut Institute's task force on engaging the Israeli Diaspora and changing relationship between Israel and the Jewish world.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

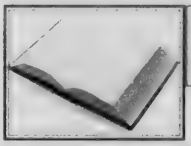
"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

A blessing for our sons



Rabbinic Reflections

Rabbi Mark Fishman

"May HaShem bless you like Ephraim and Menashe."

One of the very special moments I have on Shabbat takes place each Friday evening after we return from shul. Shalom Aleichem and Eishet Chayil are sung and then comes the moment we all look forward to. The blessing of the children.

Our daughter, being older, is first and, with eyes closed, she receives from her parents those time-honoured words. "May God make you like Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel and Leah," the foremothers of our nation, with their challenges and struggles, their overcoming the odds and their underlying righteousness. With these hopes and dreams for the future, we bless our daughter, praying that she will grow up to emulate the heroines of our nation.

For our son, who is just one year old, it can sometimes be a challenge to put our hands on his head and keep him still. Yet, when we bless him, we do not wish that he will emulate the values of the forefathers (thus mirroring the female blessing), but rather we somewhat unexpectedly bless him by praying that he grow up to be like Ephraim and Menashe.

Strange? Ephraim and Menashe are Joseph's two sons, born in Egypt. They look Egyptian, speak Egyptian, dress like Egyptians, and for all intents and purposes, these are not two fine young boys that have any cultural or ethnic "Jewishness" about them. And yet, when Shabbat comes, we follow in our patriarch Jacob's footsteps and bless Jewish boys by praying that they should grow up to become like Ephraim and Menashe.

The answer to this riddle can be found by taking a sweeping look back on the entire book of Bereshit. Throughout these long and painful weekly readings, there has been one theme that constantly recurs – the theme of sibling rivalry, beginning with Cain killing Abel: "The Lord said, 'What have you done? Listen! Your brother's blood cries out to me from the ground.'" Then we have Isaac and Ishmael: "Get rid of that slave woman and her son, for that slave woman's son will never share in the inheritance with my son Isaac." Jacob and Esau continue the theme: "The days of mourning for my father are near; then I will kill my brother Jacob." Joseph's brothers say: "Let's kill him, throw him into one of the cisterns, and say that a wild animal has eaten him." Throughout, there is one clear message: siblings do not get along.

Yet, there is one departure from this all too familiar theme: the blessings given to Ephraim and Menashe. In fact, the blessings are given to the younger Ephraim over the older Menashe. And we never hear of any bitterness, rivalry or animosity.

The blessings we, in turn, give to our sons is that they should not only love their siblings, but deeply respect them, care and look out for them. The brotherly rivalry of Bereshit comes to a close with the partnership of two brothers who feel no jealously and no resentment toward the other. This is the blessing we give to children.

Netanyahu aims to ease tensions with U.S.

Ilan Ben Zion
The Times of Israel

WASHINGTON, D.C. — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, in a high profile address Sunday, attempted to allay tensions between the United States and Israel while reiterating his warning that Iran was continuing its drive toward a nuclear weapon.

Netanyahu addressed the Saban Forum in Washington, D.C., over video from Jerusalem, and lauded the strong relationship between the United States and Israel. He called it "the crucial anchor of stability in the Middle East" and an "indispensable alliance." He also assured viewers that despite the public spat between Jerusalem and Washington over the Geneva agreement reached last month between the P5+1 and Iran, Israel and the United States see eye to eye on most things.

"I want you to know we can have different perspectives… Most of the time and on most things, if not the major things, we see eye to eye because we're anchored in deeply democratic societies," he said.

Originally slated to be interviewed by Charlie Rose of CBS News, Netanyahu opted to give a speech instead, and did not answer questions afterward, as other speakers at the forum, including U.S. President Barack Obama and Secretary of State John Kerry, had done.

Netanyahu offered praise for Obama, who spoke Saturday, saying that defence and intelligence co-operation between Israel and the United States under his presidency had reached "new heights."

Obama had indicated Israeli demands on the Geneva deal with Iran were unrealistic, and mentioned that he and Netanyahu did not view the deal, which eases sanctions in return for curbs on uranium enrichment, the same way.

"You'll hear arguments, including potentially from the prime minister, that we can't accept any enrichment on Iranian soil. Period. Full stop. End of conversation," said Obama. "In an ideal world," he said, "Iran would destroy every element and facility, you name it." But, he went on, "We have to be more realistic."

Along with the Iranian issue, the other core of Netanyahu's address was the ongoing peace talks between Israel and the Palestinians, and the prime minister lauded Kerry's "tireless efforts for peace."

"Tireless. I mean, this man doesn't sleep," Netanyahu said, adding that some of his cabinet ministers were growing jealous at how much time he was spending with the American diplomat.

The prime minister dismissed charges that the Israeli-Palestinian conflict was the core of the region's instability, noting the Sunni-Shia conflict, the Syrian civil war, terrorism in Iraq and Iran's nuclear program as examples.

"That's not to say that peace with the Palestinians is not important – it's vital," Netanyahu said, "first and foremost for Israel and for the Palestinians." He called a lasting peace accord with the Palestinians a "strategic goal of the State of Israel" and his government.

"I've made hard decisions to further peace negotiations," he said, perhaps in reference to his government's agreement to release Palestinian prisoners from Israeli jails as a precondition to peace talks, which began in July. "I'm willing to make even harder decisions to achieve peace, and I hope [Palestinian Authority] President [Mahmoud] Abbas is willing to do so, because peace can only be and must be a two-way street."

Netanyahu said he was ready for a "historic compromise that ends the conflict between us once and for all," but said the core of the conflict has been the Palestinians' refusal to recognize Israel "with any border." He said Palestinian recognition of a Jewish state's right to exist was "not too much to ask" and was a "minimal requirement for peace."

Any such peace accord, he said, must provide guarantees for Israel's security, as a treaty between Israel and the Palestinians was likely to yield "a cold peace."

"Any agreement that we make must enable us to protect the peace, or conversely to protect Israel in case the peace unravels," Netanyahu said. "So there must be ironclad security arrangements to protect the peace, arrangements that allow Israel to defend itself, by itself, against any possible threat" with Israel's own forces.

Turning to Iran, Netanyahu said a nuclear-armed Iran was the greatest threat to a potential Israeli-Palestinian accord.

A nuclear-armed Iran, he said, "would undermine the chances of arriving at a negotiated peace. I would say it would undermine those peace agreements that we've already reached with two of our neighbours" – Jordan and Egypt.

He called Iran's virulent rhetoric about Israel "not just a matter of sticks and stones." In Tehran's case, "talk has consequences," he said, and called on the world to demand, alongside the Geneva talks, a change in Iran's "genocidal policy" vis-a-vis Israel.

"I don't think I can overstate – I don't think any of us can overstate – the Iranian danger," Netanyahu said. "Steps must be taken to prevent further erosion of sanctions," he added, because the sanctions are critical to international efforts to press Iran to dismantle its nuclear program.

"For diplomacy to succeed, it must be coupled with powerful sanctions and a credible military threat," he said. "A diplomatic solution is better than a military option, but a military option is necessary for diplomacy to succeed, as are powerful sanctions."

Peres would meet Rouhani

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli President Shimon Peres said he would be willing to meet with Iranian President Hassan Rouhani.

"Why not? I don't have enemies; it's not a matter of a person but of a policy," Peres said Sunday in Tel Aviv at the Globes Business Conference during an on-stage interview with CNN's Richard Quest. "The purpose is to convert enemies into friends."

Peres said Israel and the world powers have to "concentrate all our efforts to make sure Iran doesn't become a nuclear danger to the rest of the world. President Obama constructed a coalition and he can't go alone," he said.

Peres said there is no question that the world prefers a diplomatic solution.

He added: "All options remain on the table to give weight to the words. The ones who are meant to listen must realize they could face a far more complicated situation. No one wants Iran to have a nuclear bomb, no one wants to have an Iranian danger hanging over our skies."

Peres said that Israelis and the Palestinians could learn from the late South African leader Nelson Mandela.

"If there was something that seemed impossible it was solving apartheid, but it happened and it was far quicker than we thought," he said.

Speaking on the current Israeli-Palestinian peace talks, Peres said, "There are two major problems. Israel's security after our experience when we left Gaza which made many Israelis reluctant to do likewise in the West Bank. On the other hand is the problem of our existence as a Jewish state, a state where the Jewish people are a majority. It's not a matter of declarations; it's a matter of numbers."

Cotler scheduled to attend memorial services

"The most remarkable thing about him is that he emerged from prison, not only to preside over the dismantling of apartheid, but to become president."

In Parliament, Cotler said: "We are all, wherever we are, deeply saddened and profoundly pained at the passing of a great world historical figure [who] made possible, as president, the establishment of a democratic, multi-racial, free South Africa.

"Nelson Mandela was really the metaphor and message for the struggle for human rights and human dignity in our time. If apartheid was the ultimate assault on human rights and human dignity, South Africa was the first post-World War II country to have institutionalized racism as a matter of law.

"We should not forget that apartheid was not just a racist philosophy, it was a legal racist regime, and it was Mandela who fought and gave full expression to that struggle for human rights and human dignity against this racist legal regime."

Cotler recalled being arrested in 1981 in South Africa after speaking there at the invitation of South African anti-apartheid movement leader Helen Suzman.

"[South African politician] Pik Botha asked to meet me, and there was a picture of [Soviet prisoner of conscience] Natan Sharansky in his office.

"He thought Sharansky was a freedom fighter and a democrat and that Nelson Mandela was a communist and revolutionary, and asked me to go around the country to see how democratic South Africa really was.

"When I got back, I told him: 'Sure, South Africa is democratic. But only if you're white.'"

Even though Israel was one of the only countries to continue to do business with the apartheid regime despite international sanctions, Mandela recognized Israel's right to exist and had "very warm" feelings for the Jewish People despite the fact that he could be critical of Israel's treatment of Palestinians, Cotler said.

Cotler also noted that Mandela's autobiography, Long Walk to Freedom, shows that Mandela read Menachem Begin's memoir The Revolt, and it served as something of an inspiration. Mandela wrote: "I was encouraged by the fact that the Israeli leader had led a guerrilla force in a country with neither mountains nor forest, a situation similar to our own."

In 1999, asked why he had finally decided to visit Israel, Mandela replied, "To the many people who have questioned why I came, I say: Israel worked very closely with the apartheid regime. I say: I've made peace with many men who slaughtered our people like animals. Israel co-operated with the apartheid regime, but it did not participate in any atrocities."

Cotler said Mandela's greatest legacy will be his role in establishing a free, multi-racial South Africa.

When Mandela became an honorary Canadian citizen, Cotler said in the House of Commons: "This honorary citizenship will have a historic and inspiring resonance for Canadians, for good relations between Canada and South Africa, and for... our common humanity."

Cotler left with the Canadian contingent to South Africa Sunday to attend memorial services for Mandela.

Mandela was close to his country's Jews

Moira Schneider
JTA

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — In the early 1940s, at a time when it was virtually impossible for a South African of colour to secure a professional apprenticeship, the Jewish law firm Witkin, Sidelsky and Eidelman gave a young black man a job as a clerk.

Nelson Mandela in 2008

It was among the first encounters in what would become a lifelong relationship between Nelson Mandela and South Africa's tiny Jewish community, impacting the statesman's life at several defining moments — from his arrival in Johannesburg from the rural Transkei region as a young man to his years of struggle, imprisonment and ascension to the presidency.

Mandela, who died Thursday at 95, wrote of the early job in his autobiography, Long Walk to Freedom, and acknowledged the disproportionate role that Jews played in the struggle against apartheid. Lazer Sidelsky, one of the firm's partners, treated him with "enormous kindness" and was among the first whites to treat him with respect.

"I have found Jews to be more broad-minded than most whites on issues of race and politics, perhaps because they themselves have historically been victims of prejudice," Mandela wrote.

South Africa's Jews remembered Mandela, the country's first democratically elected president, as a close friend, one with deep ties to prominent community figures and a partner in the decades-long effort to end apartheid.

"I was extremely privileged to lead the community during his presidency," said Mervyn Smith, who was chairman and later president of the South African Jewish Board of Deputies, the community's representative body. "We met with him on many occasions and the talk was direct and open."

For Mandela, who rose to prominence as a leading opponent of the discriminatory racial regime known as apartheid, Jews were vital allies. Jewish lawyers represented him in multiple trials, and Jewish activists and political figures played leading roles in the fight.

Netanyahu to skip memorial

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel's Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu will not attend a memorial service in South Africa for Nelson Mandela due to the high cost of transportation and security.

The decision was announced late on Sunday, hours before Netanyahu's scheduled Monday departure for the memorial event to have been held Dec. 10 at Johannesburg's FNB stadium. Some 70 world leaders, many heads of state, as well as all living U.S. presidents and more than two dozen members of the U.S. Congress, are scheduled to attend the event, which will include about 150,000 people.

It was unclear if Israeli President Shimon Peres would decide to attend the memorial once it was announced that Netanyahu would not attend. The costs to send the president reportedly are significantly lower.

Netanyahu's decision comes less than a week after the disclosure of the large amount of taxpayer money spent on the Prime Minister's official residence, and his two private residences.

The cost to send Netanyahu to the Mandela memorial would have been close to $2 million, including chartering a private plane and transporting security personnel and equipment, according to Ha'aretz. Netanyahu's visit reportedly would have been protested by pro-Palestinian demonstrators in South Africa.

Parliamentarians pass resolutions on Iran

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

The International Council of Jewish Parliamentarians (ICJP) last week passed a pair of resolutions that called on Iran to end its nuclear enrichment program while urging European lawmakers to adopt protocols that address a "disturbing" rise in anti-Semitism.

And in a separate resolution, the Jewish lawmakers criticized a number of European governments that had passed measures against male circumcision, calling those steps a denial of religious liberty.

The ICJP is an initiative of the World Jewish Congress that includes lawmakers from the United States, Canada, France, Israel, Costa Rica, Hungary, Ukraine, Belarus and elsewhere. It meets periodically to promote democracy and human rights while advocating for measures that address anti-Semitism and racism. It met last week in Washington and New York where its steering committee elected U.S. Congressman Eliot Engel as chair and Canadian MP Irwin Cotler as deputy chair.

Irwin Cotler

Cotler called the resolution on Iran "comprehensive." It acknowledges the recent agreement between Iran and the P5+1 nations, but points out that UN Security Council resolutions have repeatedly called "for suspension of enrichment, and that this agreement is a violation of international law."

The ICJP asks the P5+1 "to adhere to international law and ensure that Iran does not enrich [uranium] en route to a nuclear breakthrough," Cotler said.

On the issue of anti-Semitism, U.S. State Department Special Envoy to Monitor Global Anti-Semitism, Ira Forman, told the parliamentarians that anti-Semitism had become "dramatically worse in the last decade," particularly in France, Hungary and Venezuela.

The ICJP resolution cited a survey by the EU Fundamental Rights Agency that found 76 per cent of European Jews believed anti-Semitism had become "more acute and has increased in their country in the last five years."

The agency also reported that in a 12-month period, 21 per cent of respondents experienced at least one incident involving verbal insult, harassment or physical attack because they were Jews.

European and Latin American parliamentarians briefed their colleagues on developments in their countries. They "spoke movingly about the intensification of anti-Semitism there," Cotler said.

The ICJP is in the position of being able to raise public awareness on this issue and on Iran, he added.

Red-Dead pipeline water approved

Stuart Winer
The Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israel, Jordan, and the Palestinian Authority were set on Monday to ink an agreement to build a long-anticipated pipeline from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea, part of an initiative that would produce millions of cubic metres of drinking water for the parched region and slake the critically dwindling Dead Sea.

Representatives of the three parties to the agreement – Israel's Minister for Regional Co-operation Silvan Shalom, Jordanian Minister of Water and Irrigation Hazem Nasser, and Palestinian Authority Minister for Water Shaddad Attili – were scheduled to gather at the World Bank in Washington for an official signing ceremony.

"We're talking about a historic process that realizes a dream of many years," Shalom told Yedioth Ahronoth, which broke the story. "We have here strategic co-operation of national significance between Israel, Jordan, and the Palestinian Authority."

The Red Sea-Dead Sea canal, known informally as the Red-Dead project, is expected to cost $250-$400 million (US), to be raised from donor countries and philanthropic sources as well as a cash injection from the World Bank, the report said. Within a year, international tenders will be published for the construction of the pipeline in Jordanian territory along the Arava valley.

The surface of the Dead Sea lies some 427 metres (1,400 feet) below sea level, and water would naturally flow to it from the Red Sea. The project will be completed in four to five years, the report said.

According to the report, around 200 million cubic metres of sea water are to be pumped from the Red Sea, at the very southern tip of Israel, per year. A desalination plant in the Jordanian city of Aqaba, across the gulf from the Israeli resort town of Eilat, will produce drinking water. Israel is to receive around 30-50 million cubic metres, for the benefit of the port city of Eilat and communities in the arid Arava region, while Jordan will use 30 million cubic metres for its own southern areas.

One hundred million cubic metres of the highly saline byproduct of the process will be piped north to the Dead Sea to replenish the lake, whose level has dipped precariously in recent decades. Environmentalists have warned that pumping the water into the Dead Sea will endanger the environment.

In addition, Israel will pump from the Sea of Galilee 50 million cubic metres of fresh water for Jordan's northern regions and 30 million cubic metres for the Palestinian Authority-controlled West Bank.

The idea of a conduit between the two bodies of water was first put forward by the British during the 19th century. In the 1990s, after Israel and Jordan signed a peace agreement, the idea of laying a pipeline from the Red Sea to the Dead Sea began to gain momentum.

Israel/Germany sign arms deal

Yifa Yaakov
The Times of Israel

Germany has signed a multimillion-dollar arms deal with Israel, Germany's Bild newspaper reported Saturday.

Within the framework of the deal, Germany will reportedly supply Israel with two guided missile destroyers, each valued at one billion euros.

The destroyers will be used to protect Israel's gas pipelines.

In April, Der Spiegel reported that Israel may sell technologically advanced attack drones to the German military.

According to the German weekly, the German defence ministry proposed the purchase several months ago, and German representatives have already held two meetings with Israeli Defence Forces officials to discuss the matter.

When I met Nelson Mandela

Bernie Farber

It was June 1990, a hot summer day and one I have never forgotten. Only a few months earlier the iconic leader of the anti-apartheid movement, Nelson Mandela, had been released from serving a 27-year jail sentence and was in the midst of a tour of Europe and North America.

During these visits, amongst the many state leaders and others he saw, Mandela specifically wanted to meet with Jewish leaders. It was no secret that many Jews in South Africa were amongst the few whites that were strong and keen activists within the anti-apartheid movement and Mandela very much wanted to show his gratitude by meeting with Jewish leaders wherever his travels took him.

Nonetheless it was still very much a surprise when I came to my office early that morning of June 20 to receive a phone call from the head of the Mandela Canadian visit asking if we could bring a small delegation to meet with Mandela at his Royal York suite for that afternoon.

With only a few hours to prepare I simply did not have the time to contemplate the historical and unique opportunity I would be participating in. I immediately got in touch with then Canadian Jewish Congress president Les Scheininger and chair of the executive Moshe Ronen. Along with my colleague, Manuel Prutschi, we made our way downtown for our rendezvous with this most prominent of world champions.

We were met in the lobby of the hotel and ushered into Mandela's hotel suite. It is said that when you are in the presence of greatness you will know. I finally understood what that meant. Walking up to us, his arm outstretched, that beatific smile and eyes that swallowed us all, was Nelson Mandela. I was first struck by his height, well over six-feet-tall, strong and assured but with an easy manner and a gentle way.

I will never forget what he said as he greeted us. "Hello" he said in a quite but firm voice. "I'm Nelson Mandela and it is truly an honour to meet you."

The humility of his greeting shook me to my core. In those few words I understood the essence of Nelson Mandela. As he approached to shake my hand I found myself tongue tied at first but his gentle manner and kind eyes unfroze my tongue. "Mr. Mandela I'm humbled and feel so privileged to meet you" I mumbled.

He led us into the living room of his suite, introduced us to his wife Winnie and a short time later another guest joined us, then minister of external affairs, Joe Clark. At any other time to meet Clark would have been a huge honour in itself. That day, Clarke, like our delegation, was in awe of this man of conscience.

We probably spent 25 minutes talking with Mandela but it seemed like an entire afternoon. His modesty yet depth of purpose seemed as though they shouldn't fit, yet they merged in a manner that is hard to describe. In the many years I worked with CJC, I had the great privilege of meeting kings and presidents, philosophers and Nobel laureates, however I very much doubt I will ever have the experience again of being with a man who in his simple yet courageous and elegant way was an astonishing agent of change, a man who truly helped make this world a better place. As we say in our tradition may his memory be for a blessing.

In his capacity as then associate director of community relations, Bernie M. Farber met Nelson Mandela on June 20 ,1990.

Anaheim Ducks owner an acquirer of Israeli start-ups

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

When U.S. communications chip giant Broadcom needs to develop a new technology for its customers, it scours the world looking for start-ups, and often, according to Broadcom chair Henry Samueli, "we end up finding those companies in Israel."

In fact, he said, "it's actually somewhat amazing – no matter what technology we need, there is usually an Israeli company already doing it, and they are often the best in the world at it."

Broadcom is a serial acquirer, buying out more than 60 companies since it was established in 1991 – 11 of them in Israel. Among the technologies Israeli companies have helped develop for Broadcom are Passive Optical Network processors (developed by Broadlight, a recent acquisition); mixed signal semiconductors for microwave backhaul systems (Broadcom acquisition Provigent); system-on-a-chip (SoC) solutions for femtocells for better Internet connections (Percello); switch fabric solutions for data centre networking equipment (Dune Networks), and more.

The Israeli teams are now part of Broadcom global units, which typically tackle a specific product (LTE, networking equipment) on a worldwide basis, instead of dividing teams up by geographical location, as most other multinationals do.

In some ways, running work groups as single units with offices around the world makes it easier to manage teams, said Samueli, but in other ways, the challenges for Broadcom are greater than they are for companies that typically assign a task to a team in a specific location, and later on try to integrate their work into what other teams are doing.

Henry Samueli

"One of my primary challenges is to meld these teams, all of which have different corporate cultures, to get them to work together," Samueli said. "But the rewards are worth it, because all our employees see themselves as part of a global corporation, which encourages them to be motivated and see the value of their work."

Samueli was in Israel for a first-ever Broadcom technical conference, in which representatives of the units in Israel discussed the new technologies they are working on. It's been said, and not just by Broadcom, that 99.8 per cent of all data traffic in the world touches a Broadcom chip; the company's technology is in products as diverse as microwave transmitters, wide area network switches and mobile device-driven communications items.

Samueli declined to give specifics on the technologies his Israeli acquisitions or Broadcom in general were working on. He did say, however, that a lot of it was tied up in developing technology for the LTE (4G) cell network. While 2012 was Broadcom's most profitable year ever, there was a bit of a falloff in recent months, a result of the heavy investment Broadcom is making in LTE.

"We're in investment mode now, so it makes sense that profits would fall somewhat while we spend money to develop new technologies," Samueli said. "We expect the payoff to come within three years, when LTE really begins flourishing."

Partnering with startups was more crucial in the chip business now than ever before, he said.

"When we started out, you could design a chip with a few guys in a basement," he said, describing the roots of Broadcom, which he started in 1991 with partner Henry T. Nicholas III. "Now a chip is likely to have 20 different technologies and a huge amount of intellectual property, and it could cost as much as $100 million to design. Economies of scale are hugely important, so only the largest companies – who get to market first – are able to succeed in semiconductors today."

"By now, we usually look at Israel first," he said.

That search for innovation continues. During his visit, Samueli and Joseph Klafter, president of Tel Aviv University (TAU), signed an agreement under which Broadcom will establish a research fund for TAU scientists that will focus on finding solutions for cyber threats.

When it comes to teamwork, Samueli is an expert, in part because he is owner of the Anaheim Ducks hockey team.

"Buying it was an opportunity that was just there," said Samueli. "But it's turned out to be really fun."

While Samueli didn't get any new technologies when he bought the Ducks, he did get lessons in teamwork that apply just as well to a multi-national tech company.

"To succeed in hockey you need teamwork," he said. "A team may have some great players, but typically the team that works best together does the best. I look at running Broadcom in the same way. We have a culture where people have different skill sets, but they are happy to leverage their skills to help others, and to help the company. If you want to succeed you have to make sure your colleagues succeed as well. In that, hockey is a lot like the tech business."

Apple acquires company and its 3D technology

David Shamah
The Times of Israel

TEL AVIV — Ending weeks of rumour and speculation, Apple has confirmed it will obtain Israeli tech firm PrimeSense for $350 million (all figures US).

PrimeSense and Apple have been in intense negotiations over a possible Apple acquisition since at least July, when reports on the proposed purchase surfaced.

PrimeSense developed the Kinect 3D system for Microsoft. Since then, it has developed 3D sensors for consumer electronics, cars, game devices, digital signage, medical devices and more. The company's sensors are installed in over 20 million devices.

According to industry insiders, Apple has been working on three-dimensional technology for some time. Last year, it took out patents on a method of presenting 3D content on devices without the need for glasses. If Apple wants to add 3D to its iPhones and iPads, it would need not only a 3D sensor, but also technology to enable the device to understand and apply gestures properly – a major programming task.

PrimeSense has already overcome many of the programming issues that Apple would face. The company's technology uses depth-sensing to enable devices to identify movements and gestures, enabling the device to differentiate between specific gestures that trigger specific events – such as an arm sweep to change channels on a TV or a hand movement to change the volume.

PrimeSense's technology also enables devices to differentiate between objects like furniture, and to weed out gestures that are not meant to be picked up by the device. The technology is based on an innovative "light coding" method, which codes a scene with light from the near-infrared spectrum, interpreting actions based on where activity takes place.

PrimeSense's technology would most likely be applied to new, smarter Apple TVs, devices that let users subscribe to Internet television and media services. Apple TV is one of the leading set-top boxes for delivering Internet content to TV sets, but it has recently been challenged by Google, which released its ChromeCast device several months ago.

Although Apple TV offers more entertainment options right now, including services like Hulu and HBO, the Google device offers more flexibility in connectivity and the formats it plays – and is one-third of the price of Apple TV. Adding 3D gesture sensing to Apple TVs would give the Cupertino-based company a big leg up on its Google competitor.

German Jew hunted down Kommandant of Auschwitz

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Hanns and Rudolf, The German Jew and the Hunt for the Kommandant of Auschwitz
Thomas Harding
Simon & Schuster

When Rudolf Höss, the Kommandant of Auschwitz, was reassigned to Berlin in 1943, his wife, Hedwig, and their children stayed behind.

After all, life there was pretty good. They had a spacious villa adjacent to the camp fence, servants at their beck and call, an affluent lifestyle and excursions to the banks of the nearby Sola River. Oh, and there was a second-floor view, if gazing upon crematoria chimneys could be considered a desirable view.

"His wife called life at Auschwitz paradise," said Thomas Harding, author of Hanns and Rudolf, The German Jew and the Hunt for the Kommandant of Auschwitz.

For Höss, running a death camp was something he left behind at the end of a long day at work. A longtime Nazi who viewed Jews as something less than human, Höss could "compartmentalize" his work from family life, Harding said in an interview.

His work consisted of designing the mechanism of death at the camp, and then implementing it. He was pretty good at his job, so much so that in the end, some 1.1 million people, the vast majority of them Jews, would be sent to their deaths, mostly in gas chambers.

Höss is the Rudolf in the book's title. Hanns refers to Hanns Alexander, who, it turns out, is Harding's great-uncle. Alexander was appalled at the murders committed under the Nazi regime. A Jew facing discrimination in 1930s Germany, Alexander had left Germany for London well before the outbreak of war, along with his twin brother, Paul, and the rest of their family. He enlisted in the British army in 1939.

In 1945, he was recruited into the British Army's 12-man War Crimes Investigation Team as an interpreter. At the time, it was the only unit investigating crimes against humanity in postwar Germany. The assignment afforded Alexander the opportunity to take revenge on Nazis for their cruelty, Harding said.

Sent to Bergen-Belsen in May 1945 shortly after it was liberated, Alexander was appalled by what he found: corpses stacked one on top of the other, emaciated survivors, mothers clutching dead babies.

His experience in the camp changed him. "Up to then, he'd been happy-go-lucky. Something happened to him. It was like a light being tripped," Harding said.

During the interrogation of SS personnel at Bergen-Belsen, Alexander learned that many had been transferred from Auschwitz before it was liberated by the Red Army in January 1945. One of them was Josef Kramer, the Kommandant of Belsen who had been Höss's adjutant.

As Harding tells the story, his great-uncle felt the need to "hunt down these Nazi bastards."

Given permission to search for missing war criminals, Alexander tracked down the former gauleiter (political leader) of Luxembourg, Gustav Simon, and delivered his corpse to local authorities. Simon had died, mysteriously, while in custody. Alexander was thanked for his efforts, but cautioned that dead men tell no tales about other Nazis.

Alexander's next big assignment was locating Höss, who had gone to ground in northern Germany, working on a farm under an assumed identity.

Harding describes in detail the detective work that led to Höss's capture. Alexander had learned his lesson from the Simon incident, and when he and about two dozen British soldiers – many of them Jews – finally arrested Höss a year after war's end, they made sure he remained alive, though they did take a box of axe handles with them to aid in the arrest.

Delivering Höss alive, if somewhat worse for wear, was a wise decision. Unlike other senior officials in the know, Höss was willing to tell all about the Nazi mechanism of death. In fact, he was angry at the top German leadership, who distanced themselves from the Nazis' crimes or denied outright their involvement when facing trial in Nuremburg.

In that respect, Höss and Alexander shared the same goal – to set the record straight.

A dedicated Nazi who could count SS leader Heinrich Himmler as a mentor, Höss had been tasked in 1939 with getting the decrepit, run-down facility at Auschwitz up to speed so that it could accept vast numbers of prisoners. In Harding's description, it all appeared as a technical issue for Höss, a problem in search of a solution, which he provided.

As a devotee of "scientific anti-Semitism," Höss saw Jews as "a threat to the National Socialist project," Harding said.

For his part, Alexander was born in Berlin to an affluent family that was well integrated into German life. But when the Nazis' anti-Jewish legislation took effect in the 1930s, he and his family fled while they could.

Hanns spent the rest of his life in Britain, though Paul lived for a time in Toronto. In 1964, Hanns visited the city to attend the bar mitzvah of Paul's son, John, at Congregation Habonim. Harding spoke there recently during a visit to the city.

Hanns never visited Germany after the war, Harding said. He was angry that so many perpetrators never faced justice and could enjoy normal lives.

Alexander died in late 2006. The rabbi delivering the eulogy mentioned that in addition to raising a family and working as a banker, beyond helping his synagogue, he had done great things as a young man – he had tracked down the Kommandant of Auschwitz.

That piqued Harding's interest, since he had not known of that aspect of his great-uncle's life and wanted to tell the story of a Jew who fought back.

The story he aimed to tell is not of one-dimensional caricatures, but of more complex characters. Still, what he learned about Höss, the cold callous killer, was truly frightening, he said.

Rudolf Höss, the Kommandant of Auschwitz, was a family man who presided over the death of some 1.1 million people, the vast majority of them Jews.

Fusion band is the musical equivalent of fine dining

Jordana Divon
Special to The CJN

To the uninitiated, klezmer and Afro-Cuban music may seem as compatible as gefilte fish with a side of fried plantains.

But like all talented fusion artists, David Buchbinder has the chops to demonstrate how, with the right touch, the two disparate traditions can make for the musical equivalent of fine dining.

The award-winning Toronto musician recently released Walk to the Sea, the second critically acclaimed album from his Jewish-Cuban collective, Odessa/Havana. The group's self-titled debut earned Buchbinder and Co. a Canadian Folk Music Award on its 2007 release, and they're nominated for the same honour again this year.

Odessa/Havana's well-attended CD release party this fall at Lula Lounge, a venue that hosts some of the most interesting and diverse world music acts that pass through the city, proved, at the very least, that there's a strong appetite for whatever Buchbinder is serving.

"We had a really solid house and I think, for a Toronto audience, we had people who were pretty loud. Lots of yelling and clapping. It was nice. It felt really celebratory," Buchbinder said of the show.

The nine tracks on Walk to the Sea are a fascinating blend of chromatic scales and complex rhythms that Buchbinder and his co-collaborator, Hilario Durán, a Cuban born star of Toronto's jazz scene, have spent the last few years exploring for their inter-musical potential.

Rather than try to force either style to intersect, Buchbinder is content to let the Jewish and Cuban sounds to speak to one another in organic and often unexpected ways, using his ear as a filter.

"In general, my goal has been to just maybe, with some small orientation toward one culture or the other, create my version of that space. Many of the tunes will come from a particular impulse, but then they evolve however they evolve," he explained.

Though it's difficult to say whether audiences are coming out for the Old World Jewish sounds, the syncopated Latin American grooves or simply to hear how this strange but inspired hybrid creature might sound, they appear to be enjoying the result, "and I think that is partly because it's a unique style of music we've created that's not exactly anything any of us have played before," Buchbinder said.

David Buchbinder

But while he shares composing and arranging duties with the Juno Award-winning Durán, the project is ultimately the fruit of Buchbinder's musical curiosity and his sensitivity to the subtleties that link two beloved musical styles.

"I first made the connection [between Jewish and Cuban music] for myself many years ago, because I was playing salsa before I played traditional [Jewish] music," he said. "But it wasn't my own idiosyncratic discovery. It turns out they're historically connected in Medieval Andalusia, which was the Golden Age for Jewish culture and for world culture in general."

Buchbinder followed his intuition to Spain's southern region earlier this year, where he uncovered an even more intricate and fascinating history.

Before the Inquisition wiped out much of the ethnic presence in pre-Renaissance Spain, Jews, Muslims and Catholics lived together in brief but relative harmony, a situation that resulted in a rich, collaborative tapestry of cultural and intellectual achievement.

After the expulsions began, many of Spain's Jews fled east, establishing large Ladino populations across the Mediterranean, eastern Europe and Turkey.

When the Spanish conquistadores later began to infiltrate the New World, Buchbinder noted, many carried with them a strong musical culture influenced by Jewish, Roma and Arab sounds that would connect with the West African influence brought west by the slave trade.

Though he's inspired by the history, however, Buchbinder admits he's far more interested in creating new narratives and mythologies through a space where two worlds meet.

"I feel like what we're doing in this band is to create something... out of these powerfully rich traditions that we're using in a non-traditional way," he said. "Ours is one of many projects like this that are re-finding or finding each other for the first time."

He also cites Toronto as the ideal place for creative fusions like Odessa/Havana to flourish, referring to its multicultural mosaic as a sort of Andalusia of the modern era.

"It was a different world, but Toronto is a place that has the entire world in it, and that's a huge part of my thinking around this band."

With plans to see where the project leads him, Buchbinder is currently hoping to take the new CD on an international tour. In the meantime, he said, he'll continue to play locally with the same progressive, open-minded and open-eared enthusiasm with which he's always approached his music.

"I'm all for the continued life of and therefore evolution of all streams of music, just like languages," he said, although fans of his traditional klezmer music will be relieved to know he has no intention of abandoning that avenue either.

"To me there's something profoundly important about keeping all that stuff in a living stream," he said, finishing his thought

Discover Catalonia's Jewish heritage

Sam Mednick & Jordan Susselman

The bridge leading into the charming village of Besalu, north of Barcelona.

Barcelona's allure is usually associated with its strong affinity for fiestas, siestas, tapas and the Mediterranean lifestyle. It's also known for its gorgeous architecture and "Moderniste" movement, which was led by the famous, Antoni Gaudí and his contemporaries during the end of the 19th century. What visitors sometimes don't realize, however, is that it's also a city with a rich and elaborate connection to Judaism and Jewish culture.

Although today the city currently has a population of approximately 5,000 Jews, centuries ago it was one of the world's largest and most prosperous Jewish communities. The 12th and 13th centuries were considered the Golden Age of Spanish Jewry and Jews comprised a mainly affluent, 15 to 20 per cent of the population. To give it some perspective, modern-day North America is approximately 2 per cent Jewish, and Barcelona today is less than .01 per cent. Medieval Jews were extremely successful and held occupations mainly as skilled labourers, doctors, advisors to the royal court, and money-lenders (a profession that was off limits to Catholics and Muslims at the time) providing their services to all levels of society, including the kings and queens to finance their wars and conquests.

Everything changed however, when in the 15th century, King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella's Inquisition called for the expulsion of all Jews from Spain. As a result, it's hard to find a lot of tangible evidence of a Jewish existence in the country today.

That being said, if you know where to go and how to explore there are various historic sites and small towns that shed light onto Barcelona's Jewish past.

For those traveling to Catalonia and seeking Jewish tourism, visit the 'Calls.' This is the name for the historic Jewish quarters in Barcelona, Girona, Besalu, and various other towns and villages throughout the region. Some of Catalonia's significant Jewish landmarks, which have been discovered in recent decades, include the ruins of Barcelona's ancient synagogue, (which claims to be the oldest in Europe), and Spain's only fully-preserved medieval mikvah, located in the charming village of Besalu (one and a half hours north of Barcelona by car).

The historic town of Girona is another quaint day trip from Barcelona and was once home to the great Talmudic scholar Nahmanides, or "Ramban," who in the year 1263 appeared before the king to publicly defend the tenets of Judaism. In Girona, you can stroll through what's left of its Call and visit the Museum of Jewish History, the only one of its kind in Spain, which also houses an important research centre and library.

Although Catalonia's Jewish heritage can be uncovered on one's own, the best way to really delve into this part of history is with an expert guide. For those looking to gain a full appreciation for the region's Jewish past, a knowledgeable guide can help discover hidden pearls, many of which are not obvious to the typical traveler and are concealed amongst narrow alleyways and tiny courtyards, not easily found on city maps.

For example, the Call in Barcelona has Hebrew inscriptions on some of the buildings, built with refashioned headstones from abandoned Jewish cemeteries. But they're extremely hard to find, especially if you don't even know where to look. It's also beneficial to hire a private car with your guide; if you're doing a day trip, as towns like Besalu aren't easily accessible by bus.

Some touring companies offer Jewish tours and day trips that include both Girona and Besalu, which is a very comprehensive and well rounded way to get a genuine feel for Jewish history and culture in the region.

Although there is still a very small Jewish presence in Barcelona today, it is slowly starting to revive. In the past few years the city went from having no kosher restaurants to now having three and there is a general feel that the city seems to be making subtle efforts to revitalize its long-forgotten Jewish past. There's also a growing number of modern-day 'Barcelonesos' converting to Judaism after investigating only to discover their own Sephardic roots. All of this is complemented by a gradual influx of Jews from abroad who can now choose to attend services in any of four active synagogues within the city.

Through both tourism and locals' efforts to revive the city's Jewish presence, Judaism today is being promoted in a way like it has never been before. It's looking like it will only continue to become more popular, so it's definitely worth a visit before the hidden gems of the past aren't so secretive anymore.

Sam Mednick and Jordan Susselman are North American Jews who run Hi. This is Barcelona, a private tour company specifically catered toward Jews. They particularly tailor the experiences for those looking to gain an in-depth experience into the region's history. www.hithisisbarcelona.com

FIFTH GENERATION OF TORONTO'S LESTER-ALEXANDER FAMILY JOINS CANADIAN FILM INDUSTRY

Toronto-based filmmaker David Lester got started in the film industry about five years ago with a position in the rights management department of Alliance Atlantis Films. The 30-year-old has also worked in the area of children's programming for Cookie Jar Entertainment before moving "to the production side" on projects for CBC, IMAX and others. As an independent filmmaker, he's currently in pre-production for a short film titled Frozen Marbles.

Remarkably, David is the fifth generation of his family involved in the film industry in Toronto. His father, Brian Lester, was a film distributor who supplied movies to drive-in theatres across Ontario – "I think the biggest picture he gave them was The Graduate" – and also booked indie films into theatres across the province. His grandfather, Lionel Lester, was a pioneering film distributor who worked at 20th Century Fox until 1948 and then ran a national booking company; he was the first to import Italian films for Toronto's growing Italian community.

His great-grandfather, Angell (George) Lester, along with his brothers Sam and Harry, opened the King Theatre, the Bonita, Doric and other theatres in Toronto beginning in the silent era. Their brother-in-laws Harry Alexander and Morris King were also among the first movie theatre entrepreneurs in Toronto. David's second-great-grandfather, David Alexander, worked the ticket booth and candy counters at some of these early theatres in the 1910s and 1920s.

"I grew up with a strong passion for film because my dad made it his sworn duty to get me hooked on Alfred Hitchcock films from the age of eight," he recalls. "It took me a while to realize that this is the world I wanted to be in, but this just had to happen."

Jazz singer to honour grandmother

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Jazz singer Sophia Perlman will honour her South African roots when she performs African and world jazz at a benefit concert for the Stephen Lewis Foundation at Hugh's Room in Toronto on Jan.16.

The Stephen Lewis Foundation launched the Grandmothers to Grandmothers campaign in 2006, in response to the emerging crises faced by African grandmothers.

"My South African grandmother, Ina Perlman, was a member of the Black Sash – working against apartheid," Perlman, 28, says. "She was also the founder of a group called Operation Hunger. She would get in her station wagon with supplies and drive for days to distribute food and help women in outlying areas create their own subsistence programs so that they could support themselves.

"She would say to me, 'It's great to sit around and talk about policy, but sometimes you just have to get in the car and you have to drive and actually do something.'"

Perlman is looking forward to playing with Bruce Cassidy, a Toronto jazz trumpet player and arranger, who has lately immersed himself in South African culture.

"I always wished and hoped that I would get the chance to sing with him one day. The music will be heavily influenced by South African music, which is a music that has been part of my growing up. One of my favourite singers when I was little was Miriam Makeba." Makeba, or Mama Africa, was a Grammy-Award winning singer and civil rights activist who died in 2008.

"This benefit will be a way to honour the things that my grandmother instilled in me," Perlman says.

Perlman grew up in Toronto's Kensington Market area. Her skill as an improviser has made her a featured singer with some of the top ensembles and musicians in the country, and she has become a fixture of the Ontario jazz and blues scene.

"I remember while growing up I listened to klezmer music and went to lots of festivals and parades. Being exposed to that type of music at a really young age set the stage for me," Perlman said.

"I started singing when I was a little kid, and I did lots of theatre and sang in choirs. Music is something that I've always done; it's been part of my life one way or the other and my parents really supported it. They are both musical people and are involved in the music community. They gave me lots of opportunities to explore and figure out my own voice, and what I wanted to do with it. My dad plays guitar and writes songs and my mom plays piano. As a singer, my musical tastes are pretty eclectic. I like songs that are meant for singing," said Perlman.

Early choral training and a knack for picking out harmony nurtured in Perlman a deep love for singing with others.

"I studied early childhood music at the Royal Conservatory of Music. I was a member of the Canadian Children's Opera Company from the time that I was seven years old right up until the end of my second year of college. That was my foundation for my vocal training. I completed the jazz program at Humber College in the spring of 2007 and have been working as a musician ever since."

In addition to performing and touring with her own quartet, Perlman is collaborating with numerous artists and ensembles, including husband, Adrean Farrugia, who plays piano. Her most recent recording is one she did with him, Alive at Musideum.

Sophia Perlman will be performing at Hugh's Room, 2261 Dundas St. W., Toronto on Jan.16. at 8 p.m. For tickets call 416-531-6604 or visit hughsroom.com.

Kids in a daycare Josh Broadman visited in the slums of Kathmandu

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Josh Broadman had an eye-opening experience when he volunteered at an orphanage in Pokhara, Nepal last summer.

The Montreal-native travelled there hoping to gain some perspective on life, and he wasn't left disappointed.

One night, he went for a walk, and saw four kids huddled on the side of the street. There they stood looking hungry with no shoes on and no parents in sight.

"It was heartbreaking to see these kids who weren't being taken care of," he said. "I brought them some food and it was a heartwarming moment for me."

But that wasn't enough. He knew there were many other kids who needed to fill their bellies, and he couldn't do it all himself.

So he approached a local Pokhara restaurant called Tea Time Bamboostan.

"I proposed the idea that they allow their customers to, once they get their bill, leave a little extra money to feed the homeless families in the area every morning," he said.

Although he was pleased with the results, he knew it wasn't enough. "It's not going to help them," he said. "It's just making them dependent [on the program]."

He wanted to help educate the kids, so they could help themselves.

He decided to partner with the Namaste Children's House orphanage where he volunteered, to help educate the impoverished children, particularly through the orphanage's scholarship programs. He works with the Namaste Community Foundation to turn his goals into reality.

Now, back at home in Ottawa, where he studies science at the University of Ottawa, Broadman is continuing his fundraising venture. Though he's no longer working with the Tea Time restaurant, he has kept the name of his fundraiser Tea Time for the Homeless.

"'Tea time' has a deeper meaning," he said. "It's a time where you can kind of relax and not deal with the daily stresses of life."

By focusing on fundraising for scholarships, he's hoping to reduce the children's stress regarding how they could fund their education.

At the orphanage, he had the chance to hear many people's life-stories. Even though they were children, so many of them had such heartbreaking experiences.

He recalled working on an application on behalf of an eight-year-old girl who the staff was hoping to bring in to the orphanage. Her father had travelled to India to find work, but he didn't make it back alive. Her mother abandoned her, and her caregivers, her grandmother and her uncle, were both dying.

He wrote a letter to the board asking for a spot for this girl, but in the end, there wasn't enough room for her and she was turned away.

"They really tried to get her in but there has to be space," he said, adding that he hasn't heard what has happened to the girl since.

That story fuelled his desire to raise as much money as possible for the foundation. He's hoping the money will go to expanding the orphanage, providing scholarships, as well as setting up a women's empowerment centre, and other institutions that would improve the quality of life for those in the community.

He began his fundraiser with a goal of $5,000 – a good amount that is still realistic, he said. Although he hasn't yet reached that goal, the donations have been coming in much quicker than he expected. He raised almost $1,800 in the first month through an online campaign, with very little promotion.

He's hoping once university finals are done for the year, he can ramp up his efforts. He's planning a campaign to get talk show host Ellen Degeneres' attention through having as many people as possible email her about the foundation at the same time.

"I know it sounds crazy, but go big or go home," he said.

Although the 20-year-old doesn't think he'll make a career fundraising, he knows it'll always be a part of his life.

"I'm always going to want to travel and make a difference," he said.

And even though he doesn't get anything in return for his efforts, it's really about the satisfaction of knowing he's helping out those less fortunate than himself.

"It makes me happy," he said. "It's pure selfish happiness."

Humanities and music help in health-care training

Senior Side of Life
Michael Gordon

Recently there has been much written about the many health and cognitive benefits to be derived from music and the study of the humanities. The Alzheimer Society of Toronto recently introduced a program to provide personalized music to individuals living with dementia, using small iPods programmed with music deemed to be of particular suitability to them. It promises to perhaps change the nature of one method of intervention for those living with dementia that may improve their quality of life, even if they have severe cognitive and behavioural challenges.

Given this background, I was pleased to get a review copy of a wonderful new book soon to be released: Creative Arts in Humane Medicine, edited by Cheryl McLean, a highly regarded advocate and writer in the field of enhancing ways to bring the humanities into health-care practices. The title of the book resonated with my own views of the importance of the humanities in health care, for the practitioners as well as for the patients, and having met the author some years ago, I was flattered at the opportunity to review the book.

I can attest to the importance of the humanities on my medical education and practice. I recall vividly how reading A.J. Cronin's The Citadel in 1960 transformed my educational direction from engineering, which had for years been my life's goal, to medicine. With a father who was an engineer and taught me "how things work," and my high school education at the well-known engineering preparatory Brooklyn Technical High School, it was a major change in educational direction – one that a novel did for me. I keep copies of the book in my office and give them to exemplary students and medical trainees.

I studied medicine at the University of St. Andrews medical school's Dundee campus. One of my first purchases was an inexpensive amplifier and basic 33-rpm turntable, which sat on an open cardboard box through my five years of medical school and six months of internship in Aberdeen, Scotland.

With ample access in Britain to inexpensive, eastern European recordings, especially from Czechoslovakia, but totally unknown to the Communist-fearful United States, I gradually accumulated a modest, high-quality music library. It was my practice to rest after supper while listening to classical music before waking up at about 8 or 9 p.m. and then studying for the next few hours – the musical interlude relaxing me after a challenging day of classes.

Sometimes I also listened to music while I studied, depending on the subject matter: anatomy was more conducive to musical accompaniment than physiology.

It was therefore with great eagerness that I read the McLean book, which covers diverse approaches to the arts, music and humanities in all its forms and the study and practice of medicine. The real challenge is this: if it is assumed, as I believe is the case, that the study of humanities and the use of music enhances the abilities and satisfaction of those in the health-care professions, what are the best way to achieve those humanity and musical experiences?

The focus in the last few years on trying to enhance health-care professionals' sensitivities to the humanities has been to provide exposure during their professional health-care education. Some espouse providing the exposure prior to entering medical school so that the foundational core will be planted as early as possible before the significant stresses of health-care practice occur and to prepare for the profound human experiences of these professions.

As someone who was exposed to a robust humanities and musical education prior to medical school, I would opt for the former. But I would continue that process during undergraduate and post-graduate health-care education, in the hope that the human aspect of humanities is emphasized, as it will be beneficial to health-care practitioners and their patients.

Make mine Mexican

Randy Fingrut
Special to The CJN

Mexican cuisine is a favourite of mine, but here in Canada, it's hard to locate good Mexican restaurants. Nevertheless, there's good news – with a little exploration, we find that our grocery stores are slowly starting to carry more and more Mexican ingredients: chilies, spices, grains, tortillas and canned goods. Now more than ever, we can prepare distinctive, colourful, rich, spicy and exciting Mexican dishes whenever we wish. With a little ingenuity we can also add some Mexican flair to many of our everyday dishes. So stock your pantry and make dinnertime a fiesta!

BEAN AND CHEESE BURRITOS

1 15.5-oz. can of black beans, rinsed and drained
2 cans refried beans (Eden organic or Amy's organic kosher refried beans available at Whole Foods and other stores)
1/2 tsp. cumin
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. ground black pepper
1/4 cup chopped fresh cilantro
1 tomato, seeded and diced
2 green onions, chopped
1 cup 1 per cent sour cream
1 cup shredded Tex Mex blend cheese (or shredded cheese of your choice)
10-12 small corn tortillas
1/2 cup shredded cheese for garnish

Preheat oven to 425. In a bowl, combine beans, refried beans, cumin, salt, pepper and cilantro. Set aside. Take 1-1/2 to 2 tbsp. of the black bean mixture and place it in the centre of the tortilla. Sprinkle on some diced tomato and green onions, one tbsp. of sour cream, then one tbsp. of cheese on top of the black bean mixture.

To roll the burrito: Hold the filled tortilla in your palm so that the weight of the filling pulls it tight. If your burrito busts through now, it will certainly burst later. If not, continue. Fold one side toward the centre. Fold the other side toward the centre. Roll the bottom (the end nearest you) up toward the top. Make sure not to let the food squeeze out. Keep rolling it up. Place on a parchment-lined baking dish, seam side down, about 1/2 inch apart. Sprinkle with additional cheese. Bake in oven for 15-20 minutes until tortillas start to turn golden brown. Let cool for 5 minutes and then serve with salsa and/or sour cream.

MEXICAN QUICHE

2 9-in. frozen baked deep-dish pie shells, baked at 350 for 10 minutes
1 large zucchini, diced
1 large green or red pepper, chopped
1 tbsp. diced green chilies (optional)
3 large green onions, sliced
2 cups four-cheese Tex Mex blend grated cheese (or shredded cheese of your choice)
6 eggs lightly beaten
1-1/4 cups mild salsa
1/4 cup 1 per cent sour cream
1 cup milk
additional cheese for garnish approximately 1/2 cup

Preheat oven to 375. Place pie shells on a cookie sheet.

Sauté red and green pepper, zucchini and onions until soft.

Sprinkle cheese, green and red pepper and onion mixture onto bottom of pie shell. Combine eggs, salsa, diced chilies (if using), sour cream and milk in small bowl until blended. Pour into pie shell. Sprinkle with additional cheese.

Bake for 50-55 minutes or until knife inserted halfway between centre and edge comes out clean. Cool on wire rack for 10 minutes before serving.

MEXICAN STYLE SALMON

6 4-oz. salmon fillets
1 650-ml jar chunky salsa, mild zest of 2 limes
juice of 2 limes
1/2 cup cilantro, chopped.

Preheat oven to 350. Line a baking dish with parchment paper. Place salmon fillets an inch apart. Mix salsa with zest, juice and cilantro, then pour the mixture over the salmon. Cover salmon with additional parchment paper and cover baking dish with a lid or oven-proof dish. Bake for about 30 minutes, or until fish begins to flake when tested with a fork. Open parchment carefully as hot steam will escape.

FAMOUS NYC RESTAURANT BROILED LEMON CHICKEN

• 2 chickens cut into 1/8's • 1 c fresh lemon juice
• 1/2 tbl. red wine vinegar • 1/4 tsp. dried oregano
• 4 cloves garlic, peeled, minced
• 1/2 c olive oil • Salt & freshly ground black pepper
• 1/4 c chopped fresh parsley

Spray a baking rack and place over a baking sheet in oven; preheat broiler at least 15 min. In large measuring cup, whisk together lemon juice, oil, vinegar, garlic, oregano. Add salt, pepper.

Place chicken skin side down carefully on hot oven rack; broil 15 min. Turn chicken skin side up; broil until crisp and golden, about 15 min more. Remove chicken from broiler. When cool enough to handle, cut into serving size pieces. Place chicken in baking pan; pour lemon mixture over chicken. Broil additional 5-7 min. on each side until chicken is browned and cooked through. Sprinkle with parsley.

YOU ARE YOUR BRAIN

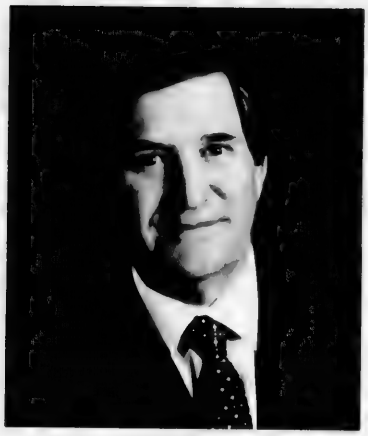
YOUR INVESTMENT IS OUR FUTURE

A message from Baycrest Leadership



Dear Friends,

Each year, we gather together to celebrate the many people who have generously donated to Baycrest through endowment funds and planned gifts. This event is a chance for us to reconnect with friends, show our love for Baycrest and thank our donors, who are making a difference in the lives of so many.

Contributing to an endowment fund or planned gift is a powerful act of giving. It shows support for Baycrest's work and a commitment to the health of future generations. It's an investment in our families, our friends and our community.

Anne Frank once wrote, "No one has ever become poor from giving." This statement rings true today. The generosity of our donors supports the research, education and care that affects us all - now and for years to come.

By celebrating the charitable individuals and families who share our vision, we honour the spirit and resonance of their philanthropy.

Please join me in thanking our generous donors, tonight and always.

Sincerely,

Garry Foster

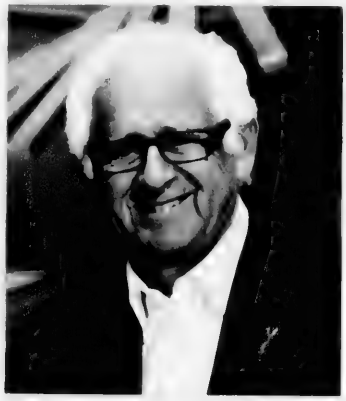
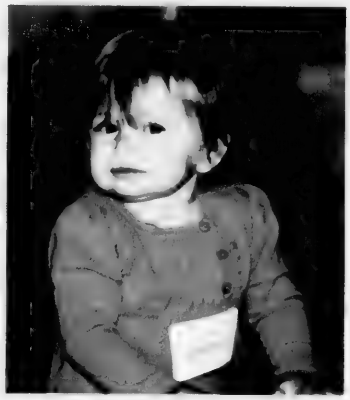
BAYCREST FOUNDATION ENDOWMENT FUNDS

We are pleased to welcome you into the Gottdenker Hall of Honour at Baycrest. The donors acknowledged in this booklet are recognized for their generous support of Baycrest through the creation of new funds or for upgrading existing funds. Each donor listed has created or enhanced a fund which provides a lasting tribute to family members or special individuals.

By creating an endowment fund at Baycrest, you are joining a very special group of supporters. Your fund creates a legacy that demonstrates care for others and support for innovations in aging and brain health. You are helping to provide stable funding for our crucial care, research and education initiatives, now and into the future.

Thank you for helping us revolutionize the way we age and transform the aging experience. We know we do so with the commitment and support of donors like you, whose shared vision and ongoing investment continue to be our success.





Joseph Gottdenker (second from the left) is grateful for the care his mother received at Baycrest and has generously given back to the organization as part of his legacy to benefit future generations, including his granddaughter, Lily Gottdenker (right).

GOTTDENKER HALL OF HONOUR

The Gottdenker Hall of Honour, made possible through the leadership and generosity of Joseph Gottdenker, exemplifies and reminds us of the incredible community members who help to make Baycrest a world leader in aging and brain health. Opened in June 2011, the Gottdenker Hall of Honour proudly recognizes benefactors who make significant lifetime contributions to Baycrest. This tranquil, innovative space not only acknowledges major supporters, but acts as a hub of local activity, enabling donors to commemorate loved ones through their commitment to Baycrest.

The Gottdenker Hall of Honour celebrates you, your family, your history and your ongoing support of Baycrest.

My belief in Baycrest and my desire to help secure its future led me to support the Gottdenker Hall of Honour – a new approach to recognition that is building momentum in giving. It is extremely meaningful for me to give back in this way and to help Baycrest achieve its ambition to be the global leader in aging and brain health.

Kunin-Lunenfeld Applied Research Endowment Fund

Continuing a family tradition

Continuing in the philanthropic tradition initiated by our grandparents Samuel and Elizabeth Lunenfeld, our parents, Reuben and Sybil Kunin, created the Kunin-Lunenfeld applied research endowment fund. Our grandfather suffered from Alzheimer's disease and took part in a variety of programs at Baycrest. Seeing the wonderful endeavours that were taking place at Baycrest, our parents decided it was important to establish an applied research endowment fund to support the continuation of that great work. Our family will continue to follow the wonderful work being conducted at Baycrest.

Continuing to support Baycrest

This fund is a tribute to loving parents Sylvia and Joe from their children Miriam and Harvey Freedman and Joan and Zane Cohen. Sylvia volunteered at Baycrest, faithfully delivering Meals-on-Wheels and later received attentive care in the home and hospital. Joe was loved and respected by all who knew him. Sylvia and Joe would have been proud to know that their family dedicated a fund to support innovative research at Baycrest in their names.

Hyman, Doris & Mervin Cooper Endowment Fund

Allan & Susan Fenwick Endowment Fund

Jennie & Bernat Goldberger Family Endowment Fund

Giving from their hearts

Although Jennie and Bernat support many causes and charities, Baycrest has always held a special place in both of their hearts. Jennie and Bernat recently celebrated their 60th wedding anniversary and requested all donations be made to Baycrest. Having visited Baycrest many times over the years to see Jennie's mother and sister, the Goldbergers feel it's an honour and a privilege to be able to give back to such a meaningful institution.

Henry & Helen Goldenberg Alzheimer's Research Endowment Fund

Saul & Mildred Kelman Medical Research Endowment Fund

Supporting Baycrest's future

Gilda and Marty are delighted to have established The Saul & Mildred Kelman Endowment Fund in memory of Marty's parents. Nitza Kojfman Endowment Fund

In loving memory

"That though the radiance which was once so bright be now forever taken from my sight. Though nothing can bring back the hour of splendor in the grass, glory in the flower. We will grieve not, rather find strength in what remains behind." - William Wordsworth

Gottlieb HALL OF HONOUR

Leib & Toby Krieger Hospital Equipment Endowment Fund

Honouring Baycrest's commitment to research

Leib and Toby Krieger survived the Holocaust and worked hard to achieve a fulfilling life in Canada. They helped many relatives from Europe start new lives by sharing what they had. As they prospered, they always continued to think of others. Baycrest hospital's dedication to caring for others and commitment to research were always close to their hearts.

Ben & Sylvia Smith Endowment Fund

In praise of Baycrest

The Ben and Sylvia Smith Endowment Fund was established to honour our parents. Baycrest provided excellent care to our father in his time of need as well as support for our mother who was a volunteer at Baycrest. We are forever grateful to Baycrest.

GUARDIAN

Sara & Morris Botnik Endowment Fund

In appreciation of excellent care

The Sara and Morris Botnik Endowment Fund was established by their children, Hanna Shlesinger and Ruth Ehrlich, in thanks for the care given to their parents during their years at Baycrest.

Jean Brown Endowment Fund

Supporting the exceptional programs at the Community Day Centre

The Jean Brown Endowment Fund was established in honour of Jean, who loved and participated in the Community Day Centre's social, creative and cultural activities. Our family is pleased that this fund will assist community clients in need, allowing them to participate in the exceptional Baycrest Day Centre programs.

Supporting Alzheimer's Research

The Sally Caplan Alzheimer's Research Endowment Fund was established by her family to honour the memory of a remarkable woman who was taken too soon by Alzheimer's. In establishing this fund, it is her family's hope that Sally's belief in helping others will continue to live on.

My Daughter Linda Ahava Feldman

I write as a parent, living with the loss of a child.
How can I leave the memory of my precious daughter to obscurity?
How can the tragic accident that took her life be her only marker?
She was a beautiful young woman, a dedicated and caring professional.
As a social worker in Jerusalem, she administered to the people she loved in the city she loved.

For our Linda to be truly remembered, we sought and found the embodiment of her life's work. We chose Baycrest to honour her memory with the establishment of the Linda Ahava Feldman Fund in support of Music Therapy at Baycrest.

Proud to support Baycrest's programs and dedicated staff

The family of Bess Godfrey will always be thankful to Baycrest for the compassionate care provided to Bess during the last 13 years of her life. The family established the Philip and Bess Godfrey Endowment Fund to honour a couple whose pride and joy were their children and grandchildren. Philip and Bess were the children of immigrants from the United Kingdom and Poland respectively. Philip was an employee of the L.C.B.O. and Bess spent her time as a political advisor. The Godfrey family is honoured to support the programs and research carried out at Baycrest.

Gottdenker HALL OF HONOUR

Happy to support such a special place

Having visited many friends and family living at Baycrest through the years, our parents Jack and Marilyn Goldman were strong supporters of the institution. Baycrest has played an important role in helping our family cope with and understand the passage of time. With grace, kindness and dignity, the people at Baycrest provide a bridge and a way closer to those we cherish when they're in need of a little extra patience and love.

Fund's growth enables more to be helped Annie and Joe Isenman spent a fulfilling life together which included working side-by-side in a ladieswear business and spending time with their son David. Their Jewish cultural home was the Borochov/Labour Zionist Alliance movement, where they raised money for Jewish philanthropic causes, including Baycrest. Annie and Joe both benefited from Baycrest services – Joe at the Apotex Centre and Annie at the Terraces. The Joseph Isenman Covenant Fund was established in 2001 to support research activities at Baycrest. Annie's name was added when she passed away in 2005. Through contributions by family and friends, the fund has now reached the Guardian Endowment level.

A meaningful contribution

At the end of my teenage years, the Shirley Kofman Leap Year Fund for Rotman Research was established in my honour. Baycrest is very meaningful to me because my mother spent her last days there and was made very comfortable by the staff. Prior to becoming a resident, my mother spent numerous hours at Baycrest bringing homemade goods to friends. Baycrest is still very much a part of my life, as I am there on a regular basis dealing with my own health issues.

Linked to Baycrest and the good it does

Adele and Saul Laskin helped repair the world by giving generously both financially and of their time. As leaders in their home community of Thunder Bay, they instilled in their children – as their parents did for them – a sense of social and moral responsibility. Living in Toronto in their later years, they saw firsthand through Saul's volunteering and Adele's recuperative stay, the importance of Baycrest to the community.

Honouring the memory of beloved parents

The Max and Myna Lazer Endowment Fund was established in memory of two very special people. They were loving, dedicated and devoted parents, grandparents, siblings and friends. Myna and Max worked hard their entire lives to provide for their family. They taught their children the importance of honesty, integrity and giving to others. Myna and Max will always be missed and would be proud of the continued support for Baycrest by the fund established in their honour.

Helping others to enjoy music

Willy was an avid photographer with a fondness for the arts. Sylvia was a member of the Baycrest Women's Auxiliary and was involved with many additional charities. They both enjoyed music and loved life. We hope that this endowment fund will help bring the joy of music to individuals' lives at Baycrest.

Supporting service and care at Baycrest

Our family has a long connection with Baycrest. Our father, Jack, spent his final years there as a resident. Dora's mother, Mary (Musha) Etkin was a resident, as was her mother-in-law, Jenny Etkin. We have friends and family members who use the various services Baycrest offers and feel it's important to support this fundamental community institution.

Holocaust survivors remembered

Holocaust survivors Leslie and Olga (Olly) Nyiri left Budapest with their only daughter, Marika, during the Hungarian Revolution. Leaving behind their families and possessions, Leslie and Olly set off to Toronto where they lived out a happy life. Shortly after arriving in Canada, Marika married Bill Glied and they had three daughters - Sherry, Tammy and Michelle. Olly lived to see and play with two great-grandchildren. Leslie and Olly are remembered by three growing families.

Giving back to Baycrest

Ruth Brooks, the late Rachel and Saul Frydberg and Harry Reingewirtz, were siblings of the late Shaindel and Naftuly Reingewirtz. They were raised to know the importance of giving back to community. They are loved and missed.

Supporting Music Program Enrichment

Frances Rosenfield was an active woman, highly involved with the world around her. As a registered nurse and instructor by profession, Frances' support of Baycrest was a natural fit. At Baycrest, Frances served on more than 13 committees over a 23-year period. She was chairperson of the family advisory council and sat on several ethics councils. Her family is pleased that her covenant fund has now grown to become the Frances Rosenfield Endowment Fund, which will continue to support Baycrest's music programs on an ongoing basis.

Grateful for warm and compassionate care

This endowment fund is in memory of our beloved parents and grandparents, Harry and Molly Title. They were proud of their family and community. Their values of generosity, commitment to the Jewish community and having a strong Jewish identity have been passed down. Harry and Molly's special attachment to Baycrest is attributed to the several years they spent visiting Harry's mother, Frimit Title. She spent her last years at Baycrest, where she was well cared for by warm and compassionate staff.

Recognizing compassionate care

Our mother Ethel had two children, five grandchildren, six great-grandchildren and a long and loving marriage to Murray. She resided at Baycrest where her years were joyful and purposeful, taking part in many of the activities, concerts and outings. We are grateful for the care she received there. We humbly feel that it gave her extra years of meaningful life.

The fund is now in honour of Marty, Natalie's late husband, and Ethel. We are proud to link their names and hope to continue to support Baycrest and help in whatever way we can.

In honour of the Baycrest family

Jack and Bernnie Winnick considered Baycrest family. Jack performed the mitzvah of bikur cholim and gemilut chesed. Jack visited the sick and the aged almost every day for more than 20 years; shmoozing, comforting, befriending and entertaining everyone he met including residents, patients, doctors and staff.

During the last 10 years of Jack's life, Baycrest became his home. Our mom Bernice spent every day visiting and caring for him along with the wonderful staff of Baycrest.

To our family, Baycrest is another word for home.

Supporting excellence in care

Ever since my mother lived at Baycrest in the late seventies and early eighties, my late husband Jack, z"l, and I have always felt closely affiliated. We are grateful to Baycrest for the excellent care it provided my mother. Tzedakah was, and continues to be, an important aspect of our lives, especially where Baycrest is concerned. We're proud to be one of the cogs in the wheel supporting this world-renowned and admirable institution.

PATRON

Supporting Baycrest with sincere thanks

When the hospital provided us with only 48 hours to find a palliative care hospice to move my father, ז"ל, Baycrest was there. Neither my parents nor my family were Baycrest "machers," but that was irrelevant. They accepted my father, ז"ל, with open arms and made the last three months of his life extremely enjoyable and comfortable. This brought great comfort to my mother, ז"ל, and our family. For these reasons, my husband and I established this fund in my parents' memory.

Furthering the vision of our parents

Knowing how deeply our parents Eleanor and Herb Baskin felt about Baycrest, it has brought us great comfort and solace setting up an endowment fund to honour their memory. In times of greatest need, Baycrest was home not only to our parents, but to generations of our family members, providing exemplary care, services and warmth in all respects. We see this as an expression of our heartfelt appreciation and gratitude and know that our parents' memory lives on through this recognition.

Devoted to family, community and tzedakah

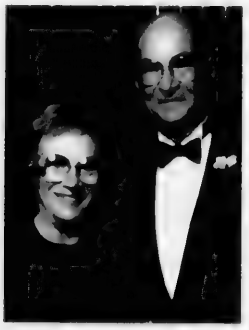
Abe Beker was a survivor of the Holocaust. Born in Lithuania, he lived through three years in the Kovno ghetto and one year in Dachau. Liberated during the Death March, he made his way to Italy before finally settling in Toronto. He was honoured by the Canadian government for leading a productive life. Charity was always foremost in his mind and he helped people immigrate to Canada. He is survived by his wife, three children, their spouses, six grandchildren, two great-grandchildren and two Holocaust-surviving sisters.

Supporting programs that enrich residents' lives

During his years at Baycrest, our father, Aubie Bossin, received the care he required with compassion, kindness and respect. Our mother Pearl spent her days engaged in meaningful social, cultural and creative pursuits. We are grateful to each individual who played a role in our parents' lives at the Apotex Centre. It is our hope that the important research at Baycrest will benefit individuals worldwide. Our donation supports a program that enhances residents' Sunday afternoons creatively and socially.

In loving memory

In memory of Alice Nusbaum: a woman with a huge heart, tremendous warmth and a great smile. She used these qualities to enhance the lives of those around her. She was connected to Baycrest as a frequent visitor of her mother, a volunteer and a palliative care patient. She loved life and was taken too soon from the lives of her husband, Mitch, daughters Jackie and Danielle, and sister Ruth. She will always be by our sides.



Supporting cognitive health research for an aging population

This endowment fund was established in honour of my mother, Rose Calmenson. Her generosity, love, laughter, singing and fun spirit touched everyone she met. My dad, Carl Calmenson, left us with many fond memories of having a positive outlook on life and living life to the fullest. He always reminded us to tell those you love that you love them from the moon to the stars and back again. Carl and Rose Calmenson were very special people who were married for 56 years. They were that grand couple who you would see walking down the street holding hands. Baycrest seemed the perfect place to have their names live on forever in the spirit of supporting ongoing research in cognitive health issues for an increasing, aging population.

In appreciation of great care

My beloved mother, Jean Lepofsky, was a resident at Baycrest Hospital for more than 10 years. The dedicated and professional staff was very supportive and caring to her needs. Baycrest is such an important institution for the community and deserves our admiration and support.

Honouring a mother's legacy

Our beloved mother, Bonnie Chizick, was a woman of great strength and tremendous value. She taught us the importance of family, honesty, love and to cherish and live each day to the fullest. Our mother would be proud of the legacy she has left behind and that her memory and lessons guide us every day. We are thankful to Baycrest and the palliative care team for the dignity and compassion they provided our mother and our family. This Endowment Fund is a tribute to the legacy of a wonderful lady who lives forever in our hearts.

In appreciation of Baycrest's wonderful staff and quality care

Our father, Albert, and our mother, Rose, both passed away in Baycrest's palliative unit. The compassion, care and dignity shown to our parents in the final stages of their lives, along with the kindness and sympathy given to our family, made Baycrest the perfect place to honour their memory. With this fund, we hope to support Baycrest in continuing to provide high-quality care to other patients and their families.

Proud to support excellence in research and patient care

We are truly thankful for the excellent care and outstanding support our family members have received at Baycrest. The research conducted in the field of aging and the programs and support offered at Baycrest are respected not only in our community but throughout the world. We are pleased to honour our parents' memories by creating this fund to support and improve the quality of life of the elderly for generations to come.

In appreciation of great care

Gitte Crangle spent her final days at Baycrest. We were grateful that those difficult days were made as comfortable as possible. The amount of quality time we were able to spend with our mother was in direct proportion to the level of professional care and compassion she received from the Baycrest staff. Our father, Leslie, informed us that Baycrest would be the only place for him, should the need ever arise. This fund is a testament to the high regard that the Crangle family holds for the people who make Baycrest the special place it is.

Gottlieb HALL OF HONOUR

Supporting Baycrest in loving memory

George and Belle Drutz both came from humble origins. They were strong-willed, determined, accomplished people who could appear to be tough on the outside, whilst on the inside they were incredibly caring and supportive. Their enduring marriage was based on love, respect and commitment. They were devoted parents and grandparents. Their home was open, gracious and warm, a place where everyone was made to feel welcome. They were role models and mentors, pioneers and adventurers, always involved with their community and Jewish causes. They are remembered lovingly by everyone whose lives they touched.

Thankful for excellent care

Our mother, Ida Farber, lived at Baycrest for many years. Here she received excellent care, enjoyed wonderful programs and was able to maintain a good quality of life. She was a kind, gentle, intelligent and optimistic person. Our father, Fishel Farber, the love of her life, was a person of great personal integrity who passed away at a young age. Our family has established this fund both to honour our parents and in grateful appreciation for Baycrest's excellent care.

Supporting Baycrest an easy decision

Dave and Gertie had a sweeping sense of confidence that they transmitted to their children. They were comfortable with everybody and were gracious and elegant wherever they found themselves. Although Dave and Gertie supported Baycrest with the hopes of never needing to use its facilities, they spent their final days there. Their profound dignity is now reflected in their grandchildren and great-grandchildren.

Honouring ongoing commitment to Baycrest

The Fishbein family's relationship with Baycrest extends over decades. Rina's grandmother was a patient at Baycrest, and Saul and Rina were volunteers with Meals-on-Wheels. Saul was a well-respected businessman and community volunteer known for his integrity, warmth and glowing smile. Rina, a caring and cherished family matriarch, benefited from Baycrest's Parkinson's Early Management Program. Dedicated to fostering strong family ties and supporting others, Saul and Rina have admired the ongoing support provided to individuals and their families through Baycrest's Community Day Centre.

Contributing to Baycrest's innovative research

We have chosen to support Baycrest because of the world-class research it conducts, which has helped enrich the lives of so many. Our hope is that this research will continue in the years ahead.

Recognizing volunteerism at Baycrest

This donation was made in honour of Barbara and Larry Gluckstein's 62nd wedding anniversary. They are two extremely loving and caring people, adored by their family and community. With Barbara having been a volunteer at Baycrest for many years, we couldn't think of a better way to honour her and her husband, Larry, on this joyous occasion.

In appreciation of Baycrest's wonderful staff and care

This fund was established to honour the loving memory of our parents, Harry and Sonia Greenberg. After our father suffered a stroke, Baycrest offered us support through rehabilitation, the daycare program and eventually, the home and hospital. We are grateful for the care and compassion that he received.

In memory and honour

Helen Medwedeff Greenberg was a special human being who was able to translate her kind and soft character into the language of music. On both a professional and personal level, Helen garnered the respect of everyone she met. She had a generous spirit, tremendous loyalty and not an ounce of pretension. She will be greatly missed.

Celebrating a rich life together

The children of Max and Ida Gula, Frank Gula and Dorothy Kurtz were lifelong friends. Dorothy was married to Bernie Kurtz for 56 years and they established a home rich in Jewish life. They were blessed with three children and eight grandchildren. An accomplished violinist, Frank was a devoted son, brother, uncle and great uncle, known affectionately as "Uncie." Both Dorothy and Frank cared deeply about their family and community and this fund was established to commemorate their bond and honour their memories.

Gottlieb HALL OF HONOUR

We could not imagine our lives without Baycrest.

Our 102-year-old aunt Rebecca used to live in The Terraces of Baycrest and now resides in the Apotex. She is highly involved with the daily activities, so much so that she has in no time to feel her age. Baycrest is close to our hearts because of its contribution to the community and for the care it provides to the elderly. Baycrest is truly unique and we cannot think of a more worthwhile cause to donate to.

Supporting ongoing research into the process of aging

This fund was established to honour the memory of our parents, Abe and Bunny Katz. Baycrest has been a part of our family for many years. Our grandmothers were residents in the original Jewish Home for the Aged and eventually our mother became a resident of the Apotex Centre and Baycrest Hospital. She loved the concerts, pottery and all the activities the Centre had to offer during her stay. This fund was created to ensure continuing care and research in aging for generations to come.

Supporting the Jewish spirit at Baycrest

Taube and Isaac Bornstein were the sole survivors of their immediate families during the Holocaust. After the war, they went on to start a new life in Canada with their two daughters. Despite the difficulties they faced throughout their lives, their commitment to all things Jewish and Israel was paramount. They would be proud to support Baycrest.

Helping the elderly

Alex and Freda Kirsh were loving, kind and gentle people. They lovingly raised their son and daughter to be proud members of the Jewish community. They embraced all things Jewish and would be proud to support an institution that so helps the elderly Jewish population in Toronto.

Remembered with love and fondness

In loving memory of my parents, Kojfman Israel and Nitza. Grandchildren: Jacob, Alexander and Tamir.

A lasting family commitment

With Jack's father involved in the Jewish Home for the Aged in Rochester, N.Y., and Dorothy's father, J. Irving Oelbaum's pioneering efforts in establishing Baycrest, it is with pride and humility that we maintain our heritage in establishing this fund.

Proud to be a part of Baycrest's past and future

Blanka Kronenberg, a Holocaust survivor, was always compassionate and caring. When an SS officer demanded that 100 people from the factory where she worked be selected for transport, she was among those chosen. She was saved from certain death by the pleas of a nine-year-old boy she cared for who insisted she was his mother. After the war she came to Canada and worked hard alongside her husband, Chaim, until she reached retirement. She focused on giving back to the community and spent more than 25 years volunteering in the Baycrest gift shop. Her kindness and generosity have been extended beyond her life with this endowment fund.

Memorial to Harry and Annie Lerner, beloved parents

Family, integrity and honour best describe Harry and Annie Lerner. Immigrants from Poland, Harry and Annie aimed to make a new life for themselves and their four children. They devoted their entire lives to creating a legacy, which lives on through their grandchildren and great-grandchildren who all cherish their wonderful memories. Model citizens to the nth degree, in our hearts they will live forever.

In appreciation of Baycrest's wonderful staff and innovative programs

Molly and Harry Lewkowicz were longtime clients of Baycrest. Whether it was the exercise classes, the swimming pool or the Holocaust survivor program Café Europa, they considered Baycrest their home away from home. Their Baycrest gerontologist, Dr. Fabio Varlese, guided them through the years. As their health failed, the wonderful staff and facilities allowed Molly and Harry to gracefully spend their last moments in a place where they felt the love and care that only Baycrest can provide.

Gottdenker HALL OF HONOUR

Promoting the well-being of Holocaust survivors

Mom and dad were Holocaust survivors who lost their immediate families in the war. They arrived in Canada in 1948 and overcame numerous obstacles to build and nurture a strong family, rooted in Jewish principles. Their proudest accomplishment was their family - three children, eight grandchildren and a great-granddaughter. We are very grateful to the GATU social workers and medical team for the care they provided to our mom this past summer. With this contribution we hope others will benefit.

Supporting musical programs at Baycrest

The Hannah and Solomon Nusbaum endowment fund for musical programs was established on my mother's 100th birthday, which was celebrated at Baycrest. It reflects her passionate love for music and song. This passion helped her find new expression and enjoyment in her years at Baycrest. Our parents were Holocaust survivors who created a secure, generous, loving and musical home for their daughters, Alice and Ruth, and their three grandchildren. Our parents' home reflected their strong Jewish values, kindness, and great love for Israel. These values continue to be at the core of our lives.

Honouring Holocaust Survivors

This fund was established to honour Holocaust survivor Jack Ordynans by his loving family, and to support Baycrest's important programs and services.

Dedicated to the Baycrest community

Our family continues to be inspired by this meaningful expression of my parents' devotion to tikkun olam. Baycrest was established in the Jewish tradition of providing for the elderly in the community. With the enduring support and vision of compassionate people like Yetta and Morris, Baycrest has become a world-renowned institution, unparalleled for life-altering innovations. Our parents' contribution makes us proud.

Supporting Baycrest's innovative research

We believe very strongly that the research being conducted at Baycrest will lead to a treatment, if not a cure, for Alzheimer's disease. While we hope to see it in our lifetime, research conducted by Baycrest will benefit our children and grandchildren. By establishing this endowment fund, we hope our financial support and that of our family and friends will hasten the day when Alzheimer's will no longer be the threat to the "golden years" that it is today.

Supporting enrichment programs through music

Murray and Rivy's marriage was a love affair that lasted 47 years. Their signature song was "It Had To be You." In the years following Rivy's death, music was a comfort and pleasure for Murray. While at Baycrest, he thoroughly enjoyed the weekly guitar performances. Staff routinely helped him choose tapes and CDs of his favourite songs and singers. The family established this endowment fund in order to honour Murray and Rivy's memories and to support Baycrest's music enrichment programs.

Continuing to show support for Baycrest

Sam and I have been longtime supporters of Baycrest, having spent countless hours there volunteering and giving back. I started my volunteer career with Baycrest in 1954, in the Physical Fitness department. Sam became a volunteer with Meals-on-Wheels after his retirement. I have lived in the Terraces for the past five years and still continue to volunteer when needed. Baycrest showed its appreciation to me when I was honoured as a 2006 Treasure of Baycrest.

Supporting cultural enrichment programs

Our family has always held Baycrest in the highest regard. Our mother, Lily, devoted several years to the Baycrest Meals-On-Wheels program when she herself was a senior citizen. She also became one of the earliest residents of Two Neptune, a home she thoroughly enjoyed. At the end of her long life she was a patient at Baycrest Hospital. We have chosen to honour our parents' memory and to support Baycrest with the establishment of this endowment.

Honouring commitment to Baycrest

Isaac dedicated his life to Jewish principles and family. His last days were spent with dignity at Baycrest. Malka, better known as Molly, enjoyed her time at Baycrest with her many acquaintances, daily activities and as the president of the residents group.

In memory and honour

Murray, Eleanor (Siegel), Howard and Ian are the children of Max and Dorothy Roher. Now in our 70s and 80s, our spouses and children enjoy the benefits of the total loving and giving bestowed upon us by Max and Dorothy. We had a traditional Jewish upbringing where our needs came first. Honesty, loyalty and caring took precedence over materialism and self-indulgence. Proud of our humble heritage, we thank and hail our parents for their exemplary contributions to our lives.

To our mother, Denise Sonia Rose, a gentle and inspiring soul

You left us with an afterglow of eternal love, devotion and rich values that we cherish.
In our souls, you never die. In our hearts, you live forever.
Heaven is blessed with your presence, darling Mom.
Thank you for your selflessness, your guidance, your beauty, your sense of humour and your love.
You created who we are today.
With our thoughts of you, we are never alone.

Love always,
Melanie, Derrick, Alison, Lewis and families

Recognizing graceful aging and innovative research

The Shain family knows firsthand the vital role Baycrest plays in innovations in aging and care in our community and across generations. Our grandmother, Celia Harris, as well as our parents, Sam and Trudy, received the compassionate care that Baycrest is so well known for. To honour their memory, the Sam and Trudy Shain Memorial Endowment Fund was established by their children and grandchildren to help ensure that Baycrest can continue to play a key role in graceful aging for generations to come. L'dor va dor.

Contributing to Baycrest's role in the fight against Alzheimer's disease

Our family established the Sone Family Alzheimer's Research Endowment Fund because of the exceptional support and care Baycrest has provided to our dad Marty Sone. Baycrest has also provided support services for our mom as well as regular educational presentations that our family has attended. The support, compassion, medical intervention and care of Baycrest professionals during our journey with Alzheimer's disease have been exceptional. We hope these funds assist Baycrest in finding a cure for Alzheimer's disease so that other families will be spared the sadness we have experienced.

Forever thankful for the opportunity to volunteer and for excellent care

Upon the passing of her daughter at Baycrest in palliative care, our mother Greta became a very active volunteer. Her optimism and passion for volunteering across all areas of Baycrest made us very proud. We know she would be honoured by the establishment of this fund, which continues to support the hospital.

Supporting Baycrest's dedicated researchers

Nathan and Clara Stein were devoted to each other for nearly 64 years. They worked, danced, traveled, and shared the joys of family. When faced with the challenges of declining health, they moved to Baycrest. They were always treated with dignity and their lives were enriched. We honour our loving memories of Nathan and Clara Stein by supporting Baycrest's many efforts to enhance research, education and the quality of care within our community and the world.

Contributing to the growth of Baycrest's research and care

Our family has always had a great appreciation for Baycrest and the integral role it plays for so many in our community. Both our parents' mothers spent many years living at Baycrest, as did our aunt. We have such fond memories of our visits there, which included birthday parties and other special occasions. Additionally, my sister and I both volunteered at the Terraces.

We are very proud and happy to honour our parents' memories by supporting Alzheimer's research at Baycrest. It is all the more meaningful, as our parents' nephew, Dr. Morris Moscovitch, is one of the senior scientists at Baycrest.

Supporting diabetic research

Pearl and Albert Stevens were happily married for almost 50 years. Family was the most precious thing to them. They were so very proud of their children and grandchildren and would have been thrilled to know their great-grandchildren. Albert spent the last month of his life at the Apotex Centre, dealing with the effects of diabetes. To honour their memory, the family established the Pearl and Albert Stevens Endowment Fund, directing it in support of diabetes research.

Music, family and faith: Keys to longevity and healthy lives

Holocaust survivors Chana, Leo z"l and Mania z"l have a long history of supporting Baycrest. Chana believed in Baycrest from its beginnings and in keeping with her generous heart, a fund was established in honour of her 100th birthday. Leo, an internationally acclaimed pianist and composer, wanted to share his passion for music with Baycrest. Leo and Mania - his cherished wife of 66 years - donated a grand piano in 2003. The endowment serves as both a celebration of their resilience in overcoming struggles and a triumph as individuals and as a family. All three understood what matters most: to live with unshakeable faith, undying devotion and resolve for building a better life for family. The Spellman-Shifman family is forever inspired.

Recognizing compassionate care

Gus stayed in palliative care in Baycrest and requested this fund be established due to the high quality and compassionate care he received there. Lucy was a past Board member who with her friends helped to support the establishment and growth of Baycrest.

Supporting innovative music programming

This endowment gives everlasting life to my maternal grandparents. In particular, it plays an important role in remembering my one grandmother who has no relatives who share a surname. Music has always played a vital role in my family. For this reason, I have chosen to support music therapy programs at Baycrest because they evoke emotions and remembrances, healing a heavy heart.

THE SAM RUTH LEGACY SOCIETY

Named after Sam Ruth, the founding president of the Baycrest Foundation, the society reflects Sam's vision of care, commitment and compassion. The members of the Sam Ruth Legacy Society ensure that Baycrest clients receive the best care available. Their thoughtful commitment funds research and educational initiatives that will help transform the journey of aging.

Baycrest extends deep appreciation to the individuals and families who have recently committed their support with a bequest in their will, a gift of life insurance, an annuity or charitable remainder of trust. For this, we welcome them as members of the Sam Ruth Legacy Society.

COLOURS

The world is filled with colours
That give us pause for thought
The birds, the flowers and rainbows
That nature to us brought

What drab existence would there be
If life were black or white
For some there'd just be sunshine
While others had the night

The colour grey's an exercise
In how we learn to cope
Through clouds that tend to rain despair
The sunshine's rays of hope

The colour green is everything
Whose life is born anew
The colour green is charity
From donors just like you

Once-in-a-century storm batters Israel

Times of Israel

JERUSALEM — Israeli children got news Sunday night that school would be closed for a fifth straight day Monday, as the capital hunkered down for another cold night, with warnings of lower temperatures and freezing roads after a brief thaw during the day.

The Egged bus company announced Sunday night it had halted public transit service inside the city as well as on buses into and out of Jerusalem for fear of slippery roads after one of Israel's worst-ever storms.

The move came hours after officials opened the main roads leading into the city, following several days in which it was effectively cut off from the ground.

Temperatures were expected to reach freezing again overnight Sunday and into Monday, refreezing arteries made slick as snow piled up from a record storm over the weekend begins to melt.

Israel weathered the brutal winter storm "better than developed countries" accustomed to more frequent blizzards, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Sunday, as roads slowly cleared and the capital thawed out of one of the heaviest snows in decades.

CJN selects new president, names editor

Board expects Yoni Goldstein, 33, will make paper a 'bit edgier'

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

The CJN is moving forward under new leadership, with Elizabeth Wolfe stepping into the role as the newspaper's president and Yoni Goldstein as the new editor who will be leading the staff as of Jan. 6.

Wolfe, who had been serving as The CJN's vice-president since last June until she was officially installed as president on Dec. 12, said she is hopeful she'll be able to successfully lead the paper into the future.

"I think we're looking at an evolution. We're hoping to modernize the paper, to make it interesting and appealing, not only to its current audience, but to younger generations as well," she said.

"We are beginning to take the first steps towards a re-design. We are hiring someone this week to help us change the look and the format of the paper... We really do need and want to transition to something that is just a little... bit edgier."

Wolfe said she expects The CJN's new editor, Goldstein, 33, who takes over from interim editor Joseph Serge, will bring that edge to the paper.

Shul Demolished

CALGARY — The former Shaarey Tzedec Synagogue in Calgary's inner city Mission area was torn down Dec. 11. The modernist-style heritage building, erected in 1959 to house Calgary's oldest congregation, was Calgary's largest shul when it opened, but hasn't been used as a synagogue since its modern Orthodox congregation moved out in 1986 and merged with Beth Israel Congregation to form Calgary Beth Tzedec, a Conservative congregation. Its 1,470-seat shul is closer to newer Jewish areas.

Karski Honoured

WARSAW — Poland's parliament named 2014 the Year of Jan Karski, honouring the man who alerted the allies about the Holocaust and sought their intervention. Last week's unanimous vote in the Sejm marked the centennial of Karski's birth. Karski, a non-Jew born in Lodz in 1914, was a courier for the Polish underground during World War II. He infiltrated the Warsaw Ghetto and the Izbica transit camp, and was among the first to relay first-hand news of the Holocaust to the West. Karski appealed for intervention to British foreign secretary Anthony Eden and later to U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt, without success. His 1944 book, The Story of a Secret State, became a best-seller. Karski remained in the United States after the war and became a Georgetown University professor. Yad Vashem named him a Righteous Among Nations in 1982, and Israel made him an honorary citizen in 1994. He died in 2000.

Hotel Shul Opens

MADRID — A Spanish hotel built on the remains of a 15th-century synagogue opened a new shul on its seventh floor. Last week's opening at the Parador de Lorca, a four-star hotel, was the result of a deal between management and the Sefarad Beitenu Jewish association, which will reportedly run the shul, located in Lorca, near the Mediterranean coast. Sefarad Beitenu's president signed a co-operation contract with the Paradores hotel network Dec. 4. The shul was unearthed during construction of the hotel, which opened last year. The seventh floor also houses a small Jewish cultural centre offering an overview of Spanish Jewish history and a description of the shul and other findings from the ruins. Several heritage groups opposed the hotel's construction because of the loss of archeological finds. Management pledged to incorporate the relics, including a 15th-century mikvah into its architecture. Shlomo Amar, a former Sephardi chief rabbi of Israel, visited the hotel and ruins earlier this year and asked that it be made into a place of pilgrimage for Jews.

Rabbi Gives Minister 'Quebec Kippah'

MONTREAL — Rabbi Yisroel Bernath, director of NDG Chabad, gave a "Quebec Kippah" to Jean-François Lisée, the Quebec cabinet minister responsible for Montreal and anglophones, during their Dec. 10 appearance on Montreal radio station CJAD.

Rabbi Yisroel Bernath models his creation.

Only 40 of the 400 kippot festooned with the province's Fleur-de-lis flag, which the rabbi created to protest the government's proposed secularism charter, remained unsold last week.

"I think it's a great idea, finding innovative ways to participate in the debate by having this kippah," Lisée said during his appearance.

During a commercial break, Rabbi Bernath gave Lisée another kippah to present to PQ Premier Pauline Marois, and Lisée assured the rabbi that he would personally deliver it to her.

Peter Shurman resigns as Thornhill MPP

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Did he jump or was he pushed?

Thornhill MPP Peter Shurman tendered a letter of resignation Dec. 10 to Progressive Conservative leader Tim Hudak, saying he'll leave his seat effective the end of this month. In an interview with The CJN, Shurman said he had been planning the move since last June and that he wanted to "leave when you're at the top of your game."

However, the move came around the same time Hudak criticized the two-term MPP for claiming mileage expenses to and from his home in Niagara-on-the-Lake to Queen's Park. And that critique followed a housing allowance controversy in September, in which it was reported that Shurman received $21,000 in government funds to maintain a second home in Toronto – an allowance that did not violate any technical rules.

Citing the high standard expected of elected officials – and no doubt conscious of the current Senate scandal – Hudak removed Shurman as Tory finance critic when Shurman refused to pay back the money.

Hudak released a letter dated Dec. 3 in which he stated: "In my mind and that of taxpayers, there is no distinction between the mileage claims and the housing issue you dealt with in September. Taxpayers expect parliamentarians to hold themselves to a higher standard when it comes to expenses. They expect us to respect their tax dollars."

Peter Shurman

But Shurman told The CJN he is being discredited for doing what any legislator is entitled to do. "My brand is inherent in my integrity, and there are hundreds of thousands who will attest to that," he said.

The mileage expenses, which ranged from $500 to $1,000 a month, were cleared with "legislative finance" officials to make sure they fell within accepted rules, Shurman said.

"They vet every expense, every dime that an MPP claims for anything," he said.

Shurman said Hudak has known since 2011 that he intended to live in Niagara-on-th-Lake, but the leader had asked him to run in Thornhill. "I was quite open with where I lived," he said.

Shurman said that when he met with Hudak to tender his resignation, "He reached out to hug me."

The next day, he was surprised to see the letter from Hudak, dated Dec. 3 and made public, which criticized Shurman for claiming mileage expenses.

"It's invented crap, and I take exception to it," he said. It is designed "to make them look better."

Adding to the intrigue, a statement released by Hudak following Shurman's resignation noted his accomplishments in office and called him "one of the finer communicators in the legislature."

Shurman said he leaves Queen's Park satisfied he has done some good, particularly in working "under the radar" to help constituents

As for his future plans, Shurman, 66, said he plans to fire up his Beechcraft airplane and pilot it down to Florida so he and his wife can spend time visiting family in the Boca Raton area.

He doesn't have anything specific lined up when he returns in February.

"There are a couple of things that look promising," said the former radio talk show host, including using his negotiating skills to help companies in business development. And, he suggested, "I might get involved in the radio side."

Don't judge this book by its coverage

Ari Shavit's My Promised Land: The Triumph and Tragedy of Israel, has been receiving a lot of media attention.

A well-known veteran columnist for Ha'aretz, Shavit has a reputation for providing a balanced overview of Israel – critical of occupation and settlements but mindful of the intense regional hostility to Zionism (of which Shavit is proud) and threats to its security.

According to Reports
by PAUL MICHAELS

While Shavit's book reflects this balance, some reviewers, paying only lip service to his honesty, forthrightness and soul-searching, betray that spirit by emphasizing his criticisms of Israel while ignoring the countervailing factors and broader context that Shavit raises in some detail.

For instance, in the Nov. 30 Globe and Mail books section, Beirut-based writer Rayyan Al-Shawaf wrote: "Shavit's honest appraisal of the injustice done to the Palestinians is one of this book's strongest suits, though it coexists awkwardly with his (conflicted) acquiescence in the initial phase of the phenomenon."

Al-Shawaf draws attention to Shavit's admission (in a chapter titled "Lydda, 1948,") that the Palestinian expulsion from the town in July 1948 was an inevitable, if regrettable, outcome of the establishment of the Jewish state. What Al-Shawaf doesn't mention, however, is the broader historical context that Shavit describes: the rejection by the Arab League and the Arabs of Palestine of the 1947 UN Partition Resolution (which the Jews accepted), and the Arab 1948 invasion of Israel when the state was declared. Shavit writes: "It is clear that Arab nationalism is about to eradicate Zionism and destroy the Jewish community in Palestine by the use of brutal force. It is clear that the Jews must defend themselves, as no one else will come to their rescue."

Do such facts justify an injustice committed by Israel during war? No. But they certainly help explain why it happened just as they invite the converse: had the Arabs accepted the Partition plan for the creation of Jewish and Arab states west of the Jordan River, would there even have been a Palestinian refugee problem?

Israeli historian Benny Morris, the leading expert on the issue of Palestinian refugees, has argued that their plight arose as a result of a war the Arabs inflicted on Israel, not of an over-arching Israeli policy. In isolated cases commanders did evict Palestinians, but, in a great many other cases, Palestinians fled – often at the behest of their own leaders. Lydda was not the norm, but it was bad, what Shavit calls Israel's "black box."

Israel's inveterate critics, however, cling to the story of Lydda as if it stands as an unqualified, broadly representative indictment of Zionism, as if there had been no violent Arab rejection of the UN plan for two states for two peoples.

What's also missing in reviews of Shavit's book are his numerous references to the land purchased, sometimes at great cost, by Jewish immigrants from Arab landowners. Contrary to cartoonish depictions (not committed by Al-Shawaf), Zionists did not come to Palestine with guns blazing to force Arabs off their land. There was indeed an initial hope of sharing the land peacefully.

While acknowledging Shavit's pride in Israel's economic development and high-tech innovation, Al-Shawaf also accuses Shavit of using Israel's "virtues" as a way of "mitigating" its "oppression of the Palestinians in the occupied territories, and its discrimination against Palestinian citizens of the Jewish state."

Al-Shawaf's one-sided critique reminds us why it's vital to read Shavit's book in its totality. While Shavit argues that an end to occupation is necessary to preserve Israel as a Jewish and democratic state, he's not naive about how this can be achieved. He faults many on the Israeli left (to which he belongs) for putting the onus for peace solely on Israel. But he recognizes that what's also required, but absent, is a reliable Palestinian partner prepared to accept the legitimacy of Jewish national rights and to relinquish the "right of return" to Israel. What Shavit calls the "Zionist predicament" must be appreciated in all the complexity that he brings to this subject.

Paul Michaels is director of research and senior media relations with the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs.

Wolfe hopes to see 'new energy' at the paper

The Toronto-born-and-raised Yeshivat Or Chaim graduate said he'd like The CJN to be "an honest broker for the Jewish community," which he hopes will attract a younger readership.

"To me, that means celebrating all of the great things that are happening in the community, but also highlighting the difficulties in the community, because there are many, and we're not going to fix any of those things if we sweep them under the carpet and don't talk about them," he said.

"I think honesty is attractive to younger readers… They start to question publications when they feel like they're not getting the whole story."

Goldstein, a former CJN columnist whose journalism experience includes working for the Jerusalem Report, Maclean's magazine and the National Post, as well as being a contributor to the Huffington Post, the Globe and Mail, the Wall Street Journal and Ha'aretz, said one of his ambitions is give The CJN a better online presence by making better use of social media outlets.

"We want to be providing information on a daily basis for our readers online… We're also going to be out in the community much more. We'll be far more visible."

He said he intends to "give voice to all sides. We want to change the perception of being soft. To my mind, there are no topics that are off limits. In fact, we want to talk about issues that have been off limits, like addiction, sexuality, abuse in the community," as well as the burden of day school tuition and the increasing gulf between religious denominations.

Elizabeth Wolfe

His vision includes "a modernized magazine-style newspaper that focuses on issues and ideas with a larger online component with much more daily content available."

Wolfe said she hopes Goldstein will give The CJN "some new direction, some new energy, which I think is really important, and perspective from someone who has knowledge of the community, with a background in journalism and wants to go forward and appeal to a younger generation."

Donald Carr, who stepped down as president after 23 years and was named chairman emeritus by the board of directors, said he's confident Wolfe will succeed in revitalizing the paper.

"Elizabeth will be carrying on a wonderful tradition started by her father, and she has a very deep commitment to the paper, as she has to the community," Carr said.

In 1971, the late Ray Wolfe, Elizabeth's father, was part of a group that bought the newspaper from founder Meyer Nurenberger and converted it into the non-profit, independent paper it is today.

"I can't distinguish in my own mind how much of my commitment to the paper is driven because of the family connection and how much of it is driven because I believe deeply that it is a really valuable asset to the community and something that the community needs," she said.

Wolfe said she is "certainly hopeful" The CJN will be able to overcome the financial challenges that led it to cease production last June.

It resumed publishing Aug. 1 after a grassroots campaign to save the paper.

"There are a couple of challenges. One is a challenge that all newspapers face in terms of declining advertising revenue, and people transitioning to Internet-based material… [and] not being interested in paying for it," she said.

"We've been told that we are a niche market and that we should be able to surmount those challenges, because we have a very specific audience and a very specific message that really isn't met anywhere else."

As for what the distant future holds for The CJN, Wolfe predicted that it will likely only be available electronically.

"Whether 10 years from now we'll still have a print edition will be interesting to find out. I would hope that we would continue in an electronic version… until the next thing comes along," she said.

Goldstein said he's looking forward to putting his stamp on one of the newspapers that gave him his start in the industry.

"When [former CJN editor] Mordechai [Ben-Dat] was leading the paper, he gave me a chance to develop my voice and to develop as a journalist as well, so I feel a deep connection to the newspaper going back many years. I really hope to continue the legacy of those who came before me and turn the paper into something special for the new generation as well."

It's the season for new plantings at The CJN

Donald Carr
Chairman Emeritus

Kohelet was right. For everything there is a season.

My season at The Canadian Jewish News has spanned more than 40 years, the last 20 of them as president.

During that time, the dream that was the late Ray Wolfe's has been substantially realized.

From gathering a few Toronto and Montreal leaders around him and acquiring this paper from private hands, The CJN has become an essential part of the Canadian Jewish landscape, a reliable, independent source of news and opinion, a reflection of the community and, concurrently a shaper of ideas and opinion – in print and on the web.

Over the years, which have seen several metamorphoses in the paper, the board of directors, regardless of who sat in the boardroom as part of that volunteer group, has consistently regarded itself as the veritable trustee for the community, in its broadest sense.

I am proud of all of these accomplishments.

Recent events have confirmed that The CJN is woven into the Jewish fabric in Canada. We have heard that from the amcha across the country.

This is the season for new planting, new ideas, new outlooks.

As I retire from the presidency and make way for successors, this is the season for enthusiastic, imaginative new members of the board. They will combine with several existing members, who are already serving so well. Together, they will chart the way forward.

Led by Elizabeth Wolfe, whose tireless and successful work during these past months has been an inspiration, I foresee the confirmation of what we all desire – an ever-flourishing and vibrant community newspaper.

I am flattered that I have been given the title of chairman emeritus. I shall attend board meetings. I may speak. But the decisions are to be made by others.

I wish my successor and the new board every success.

Your continued support is essential. The future is boundless. Make it so!

Netanyahu's lame excuse

The greatest statesmen and women of our day gathered Dec. 10 in Johannesburg, South Africa, to honour the late Nelson Mandela. It was a touching ceremony, as everyone knew it would be, but particularly so because of its celebratory nature. The tens of thousands of rain-drenched South Africans in attendance were more often than not exuberant – though they were quite the opposite when their current president, Jacob Zuma, stepped to the microphone. U.S. President Barack Obama's speech brimmed with optimism (and he took a selfie!), while our former prime minister, Kim Campbell, danced up a storm and went viral in the process. Somehow, it all seemed to work, given the spirit of the man everyone had come to pay their respects to.

Guest Editorial

Conspicuously absent from the proceedings was Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. The official explanation as to why he declined the invitation was that his flight and security requirements would have cost too much – 7 million shekels (about $2 million) to be exact – but, pardon the pun, that's rich. The prime minister hasn't been shy about spending Israeli taxpayers' money frivolously, as evidenced by recent revelations he shelled out tens of thousands of dollars on luxuries such as scented candles, a vacation home and an ice cream fetish. Netanyahu, it was reported in May, even spent $127,000 on a special sleeping cabin for a plane ride to London – to attend Margaret Thatcher's funeral. Now he's suddenly pinching pennies?

I suspect Netanyahu was fully aware of how lame his excuse sounded, and that, even so, it was preferable to voicing the real reason he avoided the memorial, which was politics, plain and simple. Mandela was a champion of the Palestinian statehood movement and a friend of Yasser Arafat – there's no doubt about it. That's why Netanyahu stayed away: to show the world he's in no mood to discuss a Palestinian state. (Apparently no one told him that Mandela was a friend to Israel, too, even though Jerusalem was decidedly unfriendly to him and his cause at times – Mandela was able to see more than black and white, good and bad, Israeli and Palestinian. That was his special gift.)

In his stubbornness, Netanyahu displayed a crucial character flaw: an inability to read the geopolitical winds and act accordingly. The central theme of the memorial in Johannesburg was reconciliation, as it was for the vast majority of Mandela's political career and all of his post-presidential years. Last Tuesday was a manifestation – a very rare one – of global goodwill, or at least as close as we ever get to it, and Netanyahu failed to take advantage by joining in. That has quite likely cost him points on the world stage.

No one was asking the Israeli prime minister to deliver a eulogy. All he had to do was show up and smile – that would have been appropriate enough. And who knows? Maybe Netanyahu would have learned a thing or two while he was in Johannesburg – such as that great leaders have the power to make us all believe in each other's inherent goodness, even if the effect only lasts for the briefest of moments.

Tuition still an obstacle

Rabbi Lee Buckman ("The value of Jewish high school," The CJN, Dec. 5) makes a clear and cogent argument for the benefits of a Jewish day school education, in specific reference to high school. Unfortunately, he prefaced and concluded his argument by "shifting the conversation from price to value." If only it was so easy.

The implication of this rather dated perspective is that Jewish families are able to afford a Jewish education, but are choosing not to because they do not see its value. The sad truth is that many Jewish families would cherish the opportunity to provide a day school education for their children but simply cannot afford it. What is often overlooked in this discussion is that choices are not just made by families. Many choices are made by schools and communities in determining the cost of day school education. While a quality Jewish education is important, quality does not have to mean expensive. While designing Jewish day schools as exclusive prep schools and pricing them accordingly may appeal to the affluent part of the Jewish community and its major donors, it fails to meet the needs of the community as a whole in not making Jewish education accessible to all. A more tempered approach to "value" would still provide a very solid Jewish and secular education, with the added benefits of inclusiveness, while planning for the continuity of our Jewish community.

It was hard to say which was more disturbing about the front-page CJN article on limiting tuition ("Plan limits day school tuition to 15% of income," The CJN, Nov. 28): the fact that $200,000 to $300,000 is considered "middle income," or that a family in such a situation should need to rely on community philanthropy, or that current programs "provide relief for families making under $200,000 per year." Any normal Canadian reading this article could only think it is satire! Unfortunately it is the sad truth. It is not unusual to hear from friends with older kids that their tuition bill is $100,000 per year of after-tax income.

Philanthropy or creative accounting is not a solution to this problem – it perpetuates it and is an insult to families. The government of Ontario must pay for a significant portion of the secular curriculum, as is done in almost all other provinces, where families pay a fraction of what we pay in Toronto. The political process has failed and left the issue a hot potato. The only solution to achieve education equity and justice for non-Catholic Ontarians is to pursue the issue through the courts again and again and again, until we are successful.

Netanyahu embarrasses

We were informed that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu would not be attending former South African president Nelson Mandela's memorial service ("Netanyahu to skip memorial," The CJN, Dec. 12) because of the travelling costs. I have never been so embarrassed by the actions of the Israeli government in my life. Israel's leaders could have come up with a less embarrassing excuse. They have given the world a legitimate reason to condemn Israel, to go along with all the illegitimate ones. For shame.

Refugee policy needed overhaul

In response to the letter,"Harper honours not deserved" (The CJN, Nov. 28), indeed, the Harper government significantly altered more than half a century of "progressive policy regarding Canada's treatment of refugees." Thankfully, we have a leader who has the guts to quash a policy that has fostered the parasitic abuse of Canada's immigration system for financial gain.

Under the new act, refugee applicants (e.g. the Lev Tahor sect) would not be able to enter our country and recklessly consume our ever-dwindling financial resources. Too many of our tax dollars are spent on bogus refugee claims. In particular, refugee claimants from generally non-refugee-producing countries such as Israel, Japan or the European Union would be processed in 45 days on average, compared to the more than 1,000 days it takes under the current system. It is time to send a clear message to those who wish to abuse our generous asylum system: if you are not a true refugee, you are not welcome here.

Israel must act to avoid civil war

Arie Raif

The interim nuclear deal with Iran is "far from perfect" but it's a fait accompli, said Israeli Justice Minister and chief peace negotiator Tzipi Livni. Nevertheless, Israel has to resolve the Arab-Israeli conflict and must maintain good relations with the United States, because it has given Israel $233 billion in aid since 1948!

These two issues are critical for Israel's future and aren't isolated from each other. The deal with Iran should encourage Israel to achieve a final status agreement with the Palestinians. It's an opportunity for Israel to act in its own best interests and present a new front with Arab countries against the threat of an Iranian nuclear weapon.

If "we solve the conflict with the Palestinians and reach an agreement, we can create a strong and significant new front with Arab countries against Iran," Livni said. Furthermore, she argued, without a peace deal, Israel is in danger of becoming an "isolated state" whose "Jewish and democratic character" is under threat.

But what are the implications of reaching an agreement with the Palestinians? Is a civil war inevitable? The answer, probably, is yes. This point was made in 2008, when Yuval Diskin, then chief of the Shin Bet (Israel's internal security service) cautioned that a civil war with the settlers was imminent.

"Our investigation found a very high willingness among this public to use violence – not just stones, but live weapons – in order to prevent or halt a diplomatic process."

Last month, five years after Diskin's warning, some "hilltop youth" at a Jerusalem yeshiva were arrested in a string of violent attacks against a Palestinian who was seriously injured when a boulder weighing 17 kilograms was thrown over the wall near his workplace and fell on his back. Four days earlier, his Israeli employer was wounded when he was attacked with an iron pipe and knives.

Since Diskin's blunt warning, the government's tendency has been to regard so-called "price tag" gangs as a nuisance rather than an actual threat. In recent years, settlers have been acting with increasing violence toward government, army and security authorities, as well as any Palestinians and Israelis whose political views differ from those of these "hilltop youth." Their "price tag" attacks have damaged mosques, Palestinian property and army vehicles. A sharp escalation in violence, primarily aimed at churches and non-Jewish religious orders, has included vandalism, desecration of cemeteries, burning cars and rock-throwing. Christian clergymen have been spat at and cursed.

A Palestinian holding a child walks past a house that was torched overnight by suspected Jewish extremists in an apparent revenge attack Nov. 14 in Sinjil, a West Bank village northeast of Ramallah. Five Palestinian children suffered from smoke inhalation. The attackers spray-painted the words "Regards from Eden, Revenge!" in Hebrew on a wall outside the house. A Palestinian man stabbed an Israeli soldier, Eden Atias, to death in Afula the previous day. (Flash90 photo)

The Shin Bet believes that extreme right-wing Jewish activists in the West Bank have gone from spontaneous acts against Arabs to organized planning in the form of terror cells. More settlers and haredim declare that their duty is to obey their rabbis over their duty to obey the laws of the state. They believe that the laws of the state are secondary to the commands of Halachah.

Defining their activity as "terrorism," the Shin Bet has been busy identifying and mapping these networks. But the Shin Bet must embark on a pre-emptive operation before both Israelis and Palestinians pay a high price for this vacillation. The heads of the security branches, restrained and officious as they are, don't name names, but it isn't hard to figure out who bears supreme responsibility for the difficult situation behind the dire warnings. They also punctiliously observe the principle of separation of powers and give the political leadership its due. But the image created by remarks of former holders of the most sensitive positions – army chief of staff and leaders of the Mossad, Military Intelligence and the Shin Bet – was a terrifying one, namely, a lack of confidence in the prime minister.

In stark contrast to all his predecessors, Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has never enjoyed the trust of the security establishment. On more than one occasion during his first term, the IDF chief of staff (Amnon Lipkin-Shahak), the Shin Bet chief (Ami Ayalon) and the police commissioner (Assaf Hefetz) spoke out against Netanyahu. Subsequently, former chief of staff Gabi Ashkenazi, former Mossad head Meir Dagan, former Shin Bet chief Yuval Diskin and even former head of Military Intelligence Amos Yadlin did as well.

Civil wars in Jewish history are well documented and frequent, and they cost us our independence. We just celebrated Chanukah, so let's remember the clash of armed Hasmonean priests and their comrades from the town of Modi'in, attacking urban Jews, priests and laity alike who supported Greek reforms. The Hasmoneans imposed, at sword's edge, traditional observance. After years of protracted warfare, the priests established a Hasmonean state that never ceased fighting Jews who disagreed with its rule.

Seven centuries earlier, the Kingdom of Judah resulted from the break-up of the Kingdom of Israel (1020 to about 930 BCE) after the northern tribes refused to accept the son of Solomon as their king. The two kingdoms, Judah in the south and Israel in the north, fought each other after the split, until the destruction of the northern kingdom by the Assyrians in 722/721 BCE.

In 1948, three years after the Holocaust, the Altalena affair was a violent confrontation that took place between the newly created IDF and the Irgun, one of the pre-state Jewish paramilitary groups. The confrontation involved a cargo ship that the Irgun had loaded with weapons and fighters. Sixteen Irgun fighters were killed in the confrontation and six were killed in the Kfar Vitkin area, while three IDF soldiers died.

Israel must take pre-emptive action against Jewish terrorists whose doctrine of arrogance, messianism, militarism and nationalism will lead to civil war.

Avoiding civil war is as historically significant as finding peace with our enemies. Failure would destroy what we most often seek – hope for survival.

It's time for that holiday once again

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Well, it is almost time for that holiday – you know, fat man in a red suit (not the mayor of Toronto), shop till you drop, deck the halls and hit the malls, etc.

The lead-up to Christmas is fraught for North American Jews. We live in a world overwhelmingly Christian. Despite public schools' best efforts to provide a holiday celebration, it always begins to look a lot like Christmas. Most people will celebrate it, one way or another.

My Christmas was always celebrated as a religious and family holiday. We shunned the secular and emphasized the religious basis – there were all those ministers in the family, not to mention choir directors and organists. We shared it with cousins and uncles and aunts and had a grand time.

Presents were modest, since no one was rich. There was no alcohol in the eggnog or brandy in the mince pie.

We celebrated it without a thought for those for whom it would be a problem. Who knew? Well, now we know.

To step back a bit, let's look at a current public issue.

Like their Tea Party fellows to the south, the Parti Québécois government clings to the notion that a homogeneous society is the only way to go. Ironically, by taking charge of their own immigration policy, Quebec has created the multicoloured and multi-religious society it now seeks to control.

In 1950, we might have been excused for not seeing the growing multicultural nature of our society. But no more. C'mon people, it's no longer 1950, even though many Canadians wish it were.

When my husband and I left the United States to settle in Canada, we left behind a segregated society. There were still chain gangs, and less conspicuous but still segregated facilities everywhere. My high school had a colour bar you could chin yourself on. I grew up in a monochrome world and now live in a polychrome one.

We have been very happy in Canada as the flavours of the world have come to our doorstep. We have become accustomed to Christmas as it plays out in the larger society. Why not? Its celebration, crass as it may be at times, gives joy to most Canadians. (And take heart: few Jews are converting to Christmas.)

The larger question of sharing a cultural divide, however, as reflected in the current crisis in Quebec illustrates the need for a lot more work on everyone's part.

Vali Nasr has written in another context (The Shia Revival): "Religion is not just about God and salvation; it decides the boundaries of communities." In the old days, people lived pretty comfortably within those boundaries. As Tevye had it, "everyone knew who he/she was and what God expected them to do."

In North America, that is no longer true. Again, Nasr: "Our world is expanding and contracting at the same time." So our neighbours, Christian or not, may now know that we celebrate a different December holiday. They may still wish us a happy Christmas and wonder why we all go to the movies on Christmas Eve instead of opening presents. But they celebrate theirs, and we ours, with little or no friction.

We can see, just by opening the morning paper, that this is not true for many countries. Christians and Muslims are killing each other in the Middle East, across Africa, in Pakistan and in India. Certainly, while factors of power and control of resources are certainly a part of the equation, religion has to take some of the blame for the bloodshed. The "boundaries of communities" are not, as they are by and large here, ones that we take in stride. They are matters of life and death – often a gruesome death.

So I have to say that I do not need to have the word Christmas erased from public discourse. Some may find it impossible, but the fact that we can acknowledge and live with each other's holidays – let's not forget Diwali and Ramadan – expresses to me exactly what the Canadian spirit of multiculturalism is all about. I hope that others will agree.

My granddaughter will partner with her friend Ayesha in their Grinch-themed school play. Yet when I picked her up before Chanukah, as she hopped out of the car, she asked: "Know what my favourite holiday is, Savta? Chanukah!"

On education

Norma Raumel Joseph in Montreal

I am a teacher. I have been a teacher for 50 years. During that time, I have seen many phases in education come and go, as well as different regimes and diverse practices. In all that time, I have never been as worried as I am now.

The current crisis seems to arise from the high costs, or rather government concerns about cost overruns and lack of interest in adequate funding at realistic levels.

For example, our universities are terribly underfunded. And the funding we do have is often misspent. There are constraints on budgets, I know. But administrations put forward proposals for programs whose goals are merely numbers, without any consideration of their educational value. It begins to feel as though all that matters is that we have bodies in seats. Count the numbers. It matters not if the students want to study Buddhism – just bundle them all into a class on Hinduism. What difference does it make? Numbers dictate, not pedagogic principles. No one is asking what works educationally. We are only told to go by the numbers. How can that be healthy?

The results are drastic. Students are less interested and less motivated. In general, I am appalled at the reading and writing levels of most students. It used to be that some students could not participate at university levels. Now I see that many students may have the ability but do not have the drive or enthusiasm to do the work. Why bother? This is not just a problem in my classes. I have discussed these issues with colleagues in many institutions at all levels of schooling. This is not what we mean when we look for education.

What is it I do when I teach? In Judaism, we have the concept that education is a parent's job. In the Torah, we hear a variety of phrases that focus on this exchange: v'shinantem (study with them repeatedly), v'limadetem (learn with them) and v'higaditah (you will relate). All these commandments for teaching involve a dialogic pattern, a discussion between teacher and student in which the participation of both is necessary. Interaction is essential to this type of pedagogy. And today we understand the command to involve both sons and daughters.

So, whether the teacher is parent or hired professional, our tradition expects that both participants are active in the process. We don't want a passive student. But in order to have an active student, we must make the system interactive, open to the student's abilities and needs as well as to the system's demands. These requirements take time and attentiveness, not just some management's list of numbers and bottom-line accounting. Teaching is a creative and demanding ongoing task.

When I teach, I consider that there are three necessary components. First, there is the subject matter. Whatever topic I am teaching, I want my students to learn something about it, something substantive. Many people think that's all there is. Learn about women in Judaism and you are finished. But they are wrong. To begin with, I cannot teach all there is to know on that subject in one semester.

So what are my goals?

Aside from introducing the topic and teaching about many of its laws and ritual aspects, which are the substantive issues, I have two other goals in every topic I approach.

My students must learn where to go to learn more about any topic that we study together. In other words, my task is to teach them how to study about the issue we are discussing. Where are the resources? Where will they be able to go to find future good sources and new authors writing on these issues? How will they be able to further their knowledge after they leave my classes? That is a key principle of education: give the student the tools for future learning.

But by far the most important lesson, as far as I am concerned, is to teach the ability to think about any topic critically. Most students have not developed the ability to evaluate the material they read. They do not ask the serious questions about reliability and applicability.

Our task as educators is to show students how to read and think analytically, searching the material for sources and reasoning that fits the evidence and the world as they know it.

This is how I teach.

Group mobilizes against United Church boycott

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

A group of United Church leaders is speaking out against the call from the church's General Council to boycott products made in Israel settlements.

"We believe that this decision of the General Council has damaged relationships that are vital to growing a just peace," the 47 members of United Against Boycott wrote in an open letter on the group's website. "We will work against the boycott campaign and the other policies including divestment and sanctions against Israel."

The General Council originally announced its intentions to boycott in August 2012, in a campaign called "Unsettling Goods," but the church reiterated the call last month, sending out packages to its congregations encouraging them to speak to their members about the issue.

Rev. John Joseph Mastandrea, who is both a minister and chair of the Christian-Jewish Dialogue of Toronto (CJDT), wrote a letter to the head of the church, Moderator Rev. Gary Paterson, rejecting the General Council's boycott call.

Rev. Mastandrea is the minister of Metropolitan United Church, the Toronto church where the United Network for Justice and Peace in Palestine and Israel (UNJPPI), a group consisting mostly of United Church members, hosted a Dec. 3 press conference launching a holiday boycott drive. The group then headed to a Canadian Tire store where members handed out leaflets urging shoppers to boycott home carbonation products made by SodaStream, which has a factory in the West Bank.

In his letter, co-written with CJDT executive director Barbara Boraks to Rev. Paterson, Rev. Mastandrea wrote that the boycott has "significantly damaged Christian-Jewish relations here in Canada, an inevitable consequence of the United Church lending its name to a movement that can only be characterized as anti-Israel."

He said his past conversations with Rev. Paterson about the boycott made him think the moderator was opposed to it, but he said Rev. Paterson's letter in the package sent to congregations last month showed otherwise.

"With [the Unsettling Goods campaign] efforts, we join with many other striving to bring peace with justice to the Holy Land," Rev. Paterson wrote. "This outstretched branch and these courageous actions for peace are signs of our belief that God calls us to embody and pass the peace of Christ so that all might live with fullness of life."

A spokesperson for Rev. Paterson said he wasn't available to comment for this story, but Patti Talbot, a United Church team leader, said that the "the boycott is not about Israel" but to show that "the settlement project is diminishing the possibility of peace."

She added: "The attempt is to focus not on Israel but the action of deepening the occupation through the building of settlements, and so this action has been to try to focus on the settlements as an obstacle to peace."

Rev. Mastandrea told The CJN that he and many United Church members resent the boycott initiative so much that they threatened to leave if their own individual churches endorse it.

"I contemplated rescinding my ordination, that we had crossed the line in the sand," Rev. Mastandrea said.

One member of the United Church's pension plan advisory committee did resign because of the boycott, according to the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies.

"I find the [United Church's] position on these matters to be offensive both personally and professionally," the anonymous member reportedly wrote. "Sometimes in life, things reach a point where one has to take a stand. That point has been overreached for me in this case."

Rev. Andrew Love, an Ottawa-area United Church minister, wrote a letter Dec. 7 in the National Post in which he criticized the boycott movement.

"[T]he heart and soul of the [church] is not embracing this boycott," he wrote. "Still further, a lot of congregations are strengthening ties with the Jewish community in their own neighbourhoods and distancing themselves from the boycott."

Rev. Mastandrea said one of UNJPPI's members attends his church and asked to book it for the group's press conference. The person who confirmed it didn't realize what it was for, he said.

He considered cancelling the group's reservation, but decided against it.

"We thought, if we cancel this, then it might draw more attention to it," he said. "As it was, nine people attended and there was no press, no media. It was a non-event, which is what we were hoping would happen."

He said average church members aren't concerned with boycotting Israel.

"People are more worried about their church staying alive. People are worried about day to day, caring for the sick and helping to feed the hungry," he said.

Len Rudner, director of community relations and outreach for the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs, which is affiliated with CJDT, said Rev. Mastandrea's letter is helping to further Christian-Jewish relations. Rev. Mastandrea is hoping Rev. Paterson will read his letter and help bring together both supporters and opponents of the boycott, but because of church protocol, it may not be possible to change course until the next General Council meeting in 2015.

Liberal Judaism in Israel gaining strength, Reform leader says

Ron Csillag
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Gilad Kariv

Is it lonely being a Reform Jew in Israel?

Rabbi Gilad Kariv has the short answer: "Not anymore."

Many progressive Israelis "want something more profound," said Rabbi Kariv, who heads the Reform movement in Israel. "Today, we are part of a growing movement. Today, we are definitely not alone anymore."

Indeed, a recent poll by the Israel Democracy Institute's Guttman Center for Surveys showed that nearly four per cent of Israelis self-identify as Reform (with another 3.2 per cent saying they are Conservative; 26 per cent saying they belong in the broad "Orthodox" camp; and 56 per cent saying they do not feel a sense of belonging to any denomination).

While some might dismiss the Reform numbers as paltry, to Rabbi Kariv, they reflect a movement toward liberal Judaism that is getting stronger.

Some observers put a certain spin on the survey, pointing out that the combined Reform and Conservative numbers outnumber the seven per cent of Israeli Jews who are haredi and garner a lot of attention.

Rabbi Kariv, executive director of the Israel Movement for Progressive Judaism, doesn't dwell on that. "You can understand that the Israeli Jewish mosaic is much more colourful than some institutions and figures are trying to present," he said.

"Reform Judaism is not a marginal force in Israel anymore," he argued. "Take for example that the same surveys that showed the four percent [Reform] figure also indicated that more than 30 per cent of all Israeli Jews have already encountered a Reform rabbi in action more than once: at a bar mitzvah, wedding, at a High Holiday service."

Rabbi Kariv was in Toronto recently for a series of meetings sponsored by ARZA Canada, the Canadian Reform movement's Zionist arm. He met with Reform congregations and communal agencies to spread the word about Reform in Israel.

He painted a picture of a movement that is no longer swimming against an Orthodox current.

There are 63 Reform preschools in Israel, up from 25 a decade ago, and 41 congregations, double the number from five years ago. There's a Reform youth movement, pre- and post-army programs and student groups.

"I'm the first to admit that what we are doing is only the beginning," Rabbi Kariv, 40, told The CJN in an interview between meetings. "When you look into what's happened in the last five to seven years, I think that we can honestly claim that Reform Judaism, from a generational perspective, is about to become one of the central players in the Jewish character of the State of Israel."

But is Reform still seen in Israel as an American and European import?

"I always remind people that [David] Ben-Gurion had a very heavy Polish accent," Rabbi Kariv replies. "Everything in Israel was built with the knowledge, help and the devotion of Jews who came from overseas. I'm proud of the fact that a few decades ago, it was newcomers from central Europe and North America who brought the notion of egalitarian Judaism to Israel."

The "vast majority" of Reform rabbis in Israel today were born there, he said, adding that when he was studying at the Reform seminary, there were four students in the program. Today, there are 40.

"I'm glad to say that today, the Israeli Reform movement brings into the global progressive Reform family a very clear Israeli taste." He points out that the latest siddur of the North American Reform movement contains a selection of Israeli songs – "a reflection of the input of the Israeli movement."

Non-Orthodox numbers in Israel have been buffeted by two Supreme Court rulings: In 1989, the court recognized as Jews immigrants who had undergone non-Orthodox conversions abroad.

In 2002, the high court ruled that Reform and Conservative conversions in Israel were valid and binding in the government but not on the rabbinate for "personal status" issues such as marriage, divorce or burial.

Rabbi Kariv said that since the latter ruling, the Reform and Conservative movements have been converting about 400 Israelis a year.

Because marriages in Israel are still controlled by the Orthodox establishment, "thousands of Israeli couples every year choose a Reform wedding and then go overseas to have a civil marriage," Rabbi Kariv pointed out. "They prefer this long journey to lying to themselves and to their families and going to an establishment they do not believe in."

Reform is a "very critical agent of change" in Israel today, the rabbi said, reflecting a "growing demand by a vast majority of Israelis to change what is happening not only in marriage but in basic democratic values of gender equality and freedom of religion."

Former CBC official describes life in 'Fort News'

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

From his position as executive vice-president of CBC, Richard Stursberg got a first-hand education about "Fort News," the affectionate nickname by which the corporation's news department was known.

"Like many, I thought the news department had a kind of left-wing cant to it," he said. When he joined the CBC in 2004, he saw it as anti-American, anti-Israel and anti-business.

To defend itself, Fort News had set up a moat, crenelated barriers and archers firing down on outsiders, he quipped.

Critics were considered outsiders who didn't know anything about the news business and didn't have a right to express an opinion.

"You're received in a hostile fashion," he said.

Stursberg outlined his experiences at the "Mother Corp" in the final instalment of Honest Reporting Canada's 2013 Insider Briefing Series. He spoke to about 60 people at the home of businessman Howard Sokolowski and Sen. Linda Frum. His subject: "Understanding the CBC bias against Israel."

His address, however, went beyond the narrow scope assigned to him, as he outlined the corporate culture he found at the CBC, its resistance to change, its siege mentality, and a news organization that "bites aggressively" if "you try to get involved with them."

When he joined the CBC as vice-president in charge of English programming, only about 15 per cent of viewers watched the news. The rest opted for coverage from private networks. Suggestions on journalistic matters were received with accusation of compromising the integrity of the news department, he said.

One topic on which Stursberg clashed with the department was on use of the term, "terrorist." "Why are you characterizing terrorists as militants?" he asked.

He was told the department did not wish to take sides, that one group's terrorist is another's militant and that it was unclear how to define terrorism, even though there were internationally recognized definitions available.

"To my mind, that compromised the journalism and put everyone into the stance of moral equivalency, when there is no moral equivalency," he said.

Stursberg, who left CBC in 2010 and set down his experiences at the Corporation in a book titled, The Tower of Babel: Sins, Secrets and Successes Inside the CBC, said he found bias also in the coverage of the 2006 federal election. "The coverage was OK, except when it came to questions of social issues, such as abortion, religion and gay marriage." On those topics, he found coverage was "dismissive."

Afterwards, he set in motion an internal study to determine whether CBC reporting was fair, with a focus on three important stories: the SARS crisis, climate change and the 2009 Copenhagen Climate Change Conference, and the Haiti earthquake.

The study looked at CBC's choice of spokespeople; the tone it set for items, whether positive or negative, and how issues were framed.

The findings were posted online with the expectation they would stimulate discussion. However, "It simply fell stillborn from the press." Nobody wanted to talk about it, Stursberg said.

When asked in a question period about the CBC being biased against Israel, Stursberg said a similar extensive study would be required to determine whether the CBC's coverage is biased, and that would prompt a discussion on the corporation's coverage of the region.

He acknowledged that former Jerusalem correspondent Neil Macdonald was a lightning rod for criticism over his reporting. (Honest Reporting has called Macdonald's reporting on Israel biased, unfair, and advancing a personal political perspective.)

Complaints about Macdonald dissipated somewhat after he was re-assigned to Washington, D.C., Stursberg said.

One questioner asked whether dissenting views were tolerated on the use of the term terrorism when Tony Burman ran the news department.

Stursberg said too much criticism could be "career limiting" and it was only after Burman left – he went on to head Al Jazeera's English language network – that the internal survey into fairness and balance was conducted.

In recent years, CBC's coverage has become "less tilted and is more balanced," though its reticence to use the word "terrorist" hasn't changed, he said.

Friends group to aid Holocaust survivors in Israel

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Avi Dichter wasn't retired for long as Israel's minister of Home Front Defence before he took on a new assignment last April as head of the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Victims in Israel.

Like others of the "second generation" – children of survivors – he was intimately aware of the perils his parents' generation had experienced. He had heard their stories, or at least bits and pieces, since many, including his parents and uncle, kept much of it to themselves.

But this much he knew: His parents hailed from Rozisht, a shtetl in the Volyn region of prewar Poland. His father had been recruited into the Polish army and was the only member of his family to survive. He lost his parents, grandparents, brother and many members of his extended family.

His mother was one of eight brothers and sisters, but only she and a single brother survived. She witnessed her 10-year-old brother shot dead by the Gestapo for simply playing with Gentile friends outside the village ghetto.

Dichter, who also served as director of Shin Bet, Israel's internal security agency, tells his family's story by way of explaining why he is now dedicating himself to a volunteer position as head of the foundation.

He was in Toronto recently to meet supporters and help lay the groundwork for creation of a Friends group to support the foundation's work in Israel. An informal group is currently headed by businessman and philanthropist Joseph Lebovic, who provided $120,000 in seed money, which was matched by five anonymous donors.

Avi Dichter

Given the passage of time, survivors are elderly – a child survivor would be in their late 70s – and many are in poor financial shape. The agency's mandate is to ease the situations of survivors so they can live out their lives with dignity, he said.

The foundation operates on a budget of 500 million shekels ($152 million), provided by grants from the government of Israel and the Claims Conference. The majority of the funds – 410 million shekels ($124 million) – is earmarked for home care. The foundation is raising additional funds so it can boost home care visits from 16 hours per week to 25.

Marcus Benayon, a Toronto activist, said "a lot [of survivors] want to stay at home... Holocaust survivors are more prone to separation anxiety and not trusting others."

There are an estimated 192,000 Holocaust survivors living in Israel, of which 50,000 live below the poverty line. Thirty-five pass away every day.

One of the foundation's proposed projects is to help in the upkeep of survivors' homes, whether it be repairing pipes, replacing baths with showers to enhance their safety, or other maintenance items, said Dichter.

In addition, the foundation's goal is to help survivors pay for certain medical expenses, such as eyeglasses or dental implants. Dichter tells of a survivor who, thanks to the foundation's support, was able to enjoy a simple pleasure denied him for years. The elderly survivor had lost all his teeth and couldn't be fitted with dentures. Foundation funds helped get him implants. He called back to say that he was finally able to enjoy an apple after many years.

"When you hear that message, it gives people in the foundation [a boost] for a whole year," he said.

Dichter derives plenty of personal satisfaction from his work as well. After he left the military following the Yom Kippur War, he decided to join the Shin Bet and went to his mother to explain his career choice.

"She was a typical Jewish mother. When I finished my term in the army 40 years ago, my mother said, 'Where are you going to study medicine?' I said, 'Mom, I'm not going to study medicine.' She said, 'A lawyer is not bad.' I said, 'Mom, I'm not going to the school of law.' 'So what are you going to study?' 'I'm going to learn a new language.'

"'English is important today,' she said.

"'It's not going to be English.'

"'What language are you going to study?'

"I said, 'Arabic.'

"She turned to my father and said in Yiddish, 'The kid should see a doctor.'"

"She couldn't understand it to the last day of her life," said Dichter.

"My mother in heaven now probably has a little bit of naches [satisfaction] from her son," he said.

Dichter on Iran

You can include Avi Dichter as among those skeptical about the recently concluded agreement between Iran and the P5+1 nations.

Contradicting official pronouncements that followed the deal, Dichter said there is nothing in it that speaks about dismantling Iran's nuclear enrichment program. It merely calls for a temporary halt for six months.

Rich culture of Sephardi Jewry is preserved and revived

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

In an effort to preserve and promote Sephardi Jewish culture, Yehuda Azoulay, founder of the Sephardic Legacy Series Institute, is leading the charge in providing English-speaking Sephardim with the resources to explore their rich culture and history.

Azoulay, who founded the Toronto-based organization in 2007, believes that if Sephardi Jewry is not promoted and information for English-speaking and second-generation Sephardi Jews is not made available, the Sephardi traditions and culture are at risk of being lost.

Azoulay said his inspiration to launch the organization came about when he was just a teenager studying at Yeshivat Mikdash Melech in Jerusalem, when he would attend lectures delivered by the former Sephardi Chief Rabbi of Israel, Ovadia Yosef, who died in October.

"I was attending his speeches and lectures. That is one of the things that inspired me. My relationship with Rabbi Ovadia Yosef was really big. I also had that passion growing up with my family," he said.

When Azoulay would visit Judaica stores in North American and Israeli cities looking for books written in English about his Sephardi heritage, he thought to himself, "Why can't I find any information about Sephardi Jewry?

"I thought, 'This is crazy, and it frustrated me.' There is nothing out there on our awesome heritage and it's time to make a difference… I was waiting for someone else to do it, but I was getting older and by 20 years old, I came out with my first book."

His first book, The Legacy of Leaders, is a biographical history of Sephardi rabbis, published by the New Jersey-based Israel Book Shop Publications.

Yehuda Azoulay

"There was material out there, but not enough. Before my book on Sephardic rabbis, there were maybe two or three, but nothing well-researched, nothing well-done, nothing professional and that bothered me," he said.

Azoulay, who holds a rabbinical degree and is enrolled in a master's program at Yeshiva University, has since published a total of five books, written numerous articles and organized programming for Sephardi communities across North America.

Perhaps most impressive was his recent undertaking, which brought together Sephardi community leaders, rabbis, U.S. senators and philanthropists in Washington D.C. for the first time in history to celebrate more than 360 years of Sephardi Jewry in America late last month.

"The Inaugural Tribute Luncheon Honoring the Contributions of Sephardic Jewry in America" attracted politicians including Texas senator Ted Cruz, Minnesota congresswoman Michele Bachmann, and New York senator Charles Schumer.

Florida congresswoman Ileana Ros-Lehtinen spoke about the legacy of Emma Lazarus, an American-born Sephardi Jewish poet, whose famous quote, "Give me your tired, your poor, your huddled masses yearning to breathe free," has been immortalized in bronze on the pedestal of the Statue of Liberty.

Jacob Abecassis, founder of Sephardic Community of Toronto (SCOT), a Toronto-based non-profit organization, was an honouree at the U.S. event.

Abecassis said he thought the Sephardic Legacy Series is an important initiative that will better document Sephardi heritage, culture and figures, which are not as well documented as Ashkenazi traditions.

"[Sephardim have] already done it in France, where they are very organized, and in Latin America – the Spanish-speaking Sephardim are very well organized as well," he said.

"I think for the English-speaking Sephardim, it's getting lost. We haven't documented as much and we don't practice it as much."

But Azoulay, Abecassis and many others are working to change that.

"This is a revolution. People are joining, people are funding, getting involved. There are events non-stop. In Ottawa, we're going to honour Sephardic Jewry at Parliament Hill next year," Azoulay said. "We're going to bring [Liberal MP] Irwin Cotler, [Canadian Foreign Minister] John Baird, and we want to try to bring [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper in as the keynote speaker."

Until then, Azoulay promises to keep producing material that promotes his culture.

"I want to finish about a dozen books on rabbis, and then after that, totally shift myself into cultural documentary films, which I'm starting to look into," he said, adding that he's working on a documentary about the roughly 10,000 Sephardi Jews in Toronto. "I don't want to stop. I'm addicted."

Hadassah College's career focus attracts haredi

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Israel's haredi community, perhaps best known for its devotion to Torah learning, appears to be developing an interest in biotechnology and optometry as well.

At least that's the conclusion one might derive based on enrolment patterns of young haredim signing up for a course of studies at Jerusalem's Hadassah Academic College.

The college, which was founded in 1970, last year announced a special course of study aimed at the city's haredi community.

"When we opened the program for the ultra-Orthodox one year ago, we received 1,000 applications in six days," said Shimon Arbel, the school's director of institutional advancement. "We had budgeted for 50 students."

In the end, thanks to supplementary government funding, the school was able to accept 260 haredi students, 60 per cent of them women. In the program's second year, some 560 students were accepted and the college expects the number to grow to 700 in future years, Arbel added.

Arbel was in Toronto last week to raise the profile of the little-known college and pitch its merits to potential supporters.

"Toronto is known throughout the Jewish world as perhaps the strongest Zionist Diaspora community," said Arbel, himself a native of Hamilton who made aliyah 40 year ago.

The college's outreach program with local haredim is one aspect of its work and is part of a broader cultural change re-shaping the haredi community. "There is tremendous change in that community," Arbel said. "Large parts of it want to enter the workforce, because they do not want to be poor."

Shimon Arbel

Special accommodations have been put in place for them – from ensuring teachers of the same gender to adding a preparatory year of study in Meah Shearim on top of the college's four-year programs. Those who have devoted their lives to religious studies are offered a one-year remedial course in math, science, literature and languages. They make up in one year all the courses they missed in 12, Arbel stated.

So far, the program appears to be paying off. "They've proven to be excellent students," and seem to be gravitating to biotechnology and optometry, Arbel said.

The college has implemented similar preparatory programs for Israeli Arab students, who make up 18 per cent of the student body. They hail mostly from the country's north. The extra year is geared to improving their language skills.

An additional program, paid for by the city government, is aimed at young Palestinians from East Jerusalem.

Both the Israeli Arab students and the East Jerusalem Palestinians seem to favour the school's in para-medical courses, Arbel said.

The college offers bachelor's and master's degrees in career-focused professions. Courses include those in health and life sciences, computer science, design and communications, government and social services.

Hadassah College was established by the Hadassah-WIZO movement but severed ties with the organization in 2008, when the woman's group decided to focus its efforts on the Jerusalem hospital that bears its name.

The move proved advantageous for the college, which has become the fastest growing educational institution in Israel, expanding at a rate of 10 per cent per year, compared to 1.2 per cent growth for other Israeli universities, Arbel stated.

About 2,600 students attend courses at the college's downtown Jerusalem campus. It prides itself on its low drop-out rate – five per cent – and the fact that 90 per cent of graduates find jobs within six months of leaving the school.

"Half the students are the first in their families to go to a college, so they come to us highly motivated to succeed," he said.

There are lots of other pluses associated with the college, Arbel continued: it plays a strategic role in revitalizing the downtown core and is the only institution of higher learning in central Jerusalem; half the student body originates outside the city, and is representative of the diversity of the entire country; Jews, Arabs, men and women study together; the school is student-centred and is invested in each one's success.

The government of Israel is the school's main financial benefactor, providing 40 per cent of its budget. Ten per cent derives from tuition. The remainder comes from supporters both inside Israel and in the Diaspora. Hence Arbel's visit to Toronto. The college is playing an important role in the development of Jerusalem and should be an institution looked on favourably by philanthropists within the Jewish world, he suggested.

Pushing the door on tuition wide open

Money Matters

Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

Between the time of my writing my last article on making Jewish high school free and its appearance in the paper, I was thrilled to see the announcement that Robbins Hebrew Academy (RHA), UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Avi Chai Foundation have joined together to cap tuition at 15 per cent of gross income for parents with three or more children in the school who are earning between $200,000 and $300,000.

This is a great start, but it does not begin to scratch the surface. As the sponsors themselves acknowledge, this will affect somewhere between six and 12 families and does nothing to help pay for any additional children who may be in high school. The importance of this initiative lies not in its initial impact – minimal at best – but in creating a model to expand and implement in all schools for all grades. The door is ajar and we must now work to push it wide open.

Doing so is much less costly than one might think. To cap every parent in this city's tuition at 15 per cent of gross income would cost $10 million to $15 million a year – or approximately 10 per cent of the current cost of Jewish education. A token investment with a great return!

I have often written about the billions of dollars sitting in Jewish foundations, distributing three to five per cent a year, ensuring that funds will be available in perpetuity. While they worry about what will be in 100 or 200 years, thousands of Jews are assimilating simply because they lack a solid Jewish education. It is startling that only 25 per cent of children in the day school system are on tuition subsidy. It is not that 75 per cent of Jews can afford the $65,000 a year it takes to send three kids to day school. Rather, the vast majority doesn't even consider it, the costs being beyond anything they can possibly afford. If foundations would distribute just 10 per cent of their funds yearly, hundreds of millions would be available to help produce Jews who will be contributors to our community for generations to come.

This is where the Avi Chai Foundation can serve as a model for us. This innovative foundation, set up in 1984, distributes millions every year to help ensure a dynamic Jewish future. They can do so because the foundation is set up to cease to exist come Dec. 31, 2019. The trustees have the wisdom and foresight to understand that it is not their responsibility to fund the Jewish people in perpetuity from the grave. They will do their part for a generation or more, but then Jewish leaders of the future must take over. They understand very well that there is no such thing as funding in perpetuity. It would be beyond shocking if more than one per cent of foundations today, regardless of their spending habits, will still exist 150 years from now.

The best way to guarantee eternity is not by preserving assets, but by spending down those assets so that there will be a greater Jewish future. I plead with those of you who are blessed to be sitting on millions of dollars to distribute it in your lifetime or soon thereafter. That will be the greatest gift to the community and your eternal legacy.

Debunking those Internet rumours

Jewish & Digital

Mark Mietklewicz

Did you get that email about the company that's boycotting Israel? Or the message about what that anti-Semitic actor said? Or the politician who trivialized the Holocaust? Actually, those events may never have happened. You could be on the receiving end of an Internet hoax.

I regularly get emails warning me not to patronize a company because it's adopted an anti-Israel policy. After a bit of investigating, I find the rumour often turns out to be just that. Israel and world Jewry have enough real enemies without maligning innocent organizations or individuals. When you blindly forward something that's not true, you provoke fights against injustices that simply aren't there.

Here's how you can spot whether that accusation really is true – or merely unsubstantiated lashon hara:

• Be wary about statements like "This is NOT a hoax." It probably is.

• Look for the telltale phrase, "Forward this to everyone you know!" The more urgent the plea, the more suspect the message.

• Watch for overly emphatic language, as well as frequent use of UPPERCASE LETTERS and multiple exclamation points!!!! [http://bit.ly/jrumor1]

(Oh, and one more thing. If you happen to get a letter from a wealthy benefactor in Nigeria, don't give up your day job just yet. [http://bit.ly/jrumor2])

Once you've discarded those emails, you are left with some that seem plausible… but you're just not sure. Here are some that made the circuit recently:

• CNN has fired Israeli Jews at its Jerusalem bureau while keeping its Arab employees. FALSE. According to CNN, it reorganized its bureau in 2012, employing four Jewish employees out of seven.

• Celebrity chef Paula Deen has blamed "the Jews" for her firing from the Food Network. FALSE. The rumour originated at the humour website, The Daily Currant.

• Norway will soon be "Judenrein" (clean of Jews), as its last 819 Jews are emigrating due to the rise of anti-Semitism. FALSE. The Jewish population of Norway is approximately 1,700 and there has not been any significant emigration recently.

These are all examples of falsehoods gathered – and debunked – at the "Internet Rumors" page of the Anti-Defamation League website. [http://bit.ly/jrumor3]

When deciding whether to spring into action, I recommend the ADL and two other sites that do a very good job of disproving – or validating – online rumours: snopes.com and truthorfiction.com. These sites deal with ALL types of rumours, but there seems to be an inordinate number of questionable stories about Israel and Jews out there.

Slightly different but also worth visiting is factcheck.org, which focuses on setting the record straight on American politicians and politics.

Sometimes mistakes occur and the party involved takes responsibility, apologizes and corrects the record. Or at least tries to. The steamroll of angry emails fails to take note of the apology or offer forgiveness. A few years ago, an Israeli-based travel agency did receive a letter from the Marriott hotel chain designating Jerusalem as an "occupied Palestinian srea." Emails went out calling for a boycott. Marriott corrected the error and acknowledged that it was remiss in not sending a letter of apology to the offended Israeli travel agent earlier. But who knows how many accusatory emails are still travelling through cyberspace? [http://bit.ly/jrumor4]

Keep that in mind BEFORE YOU FORWARD that piece of email!!!!!!

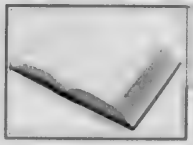
Israel's north needs our support

Rabbi N. Daniel Korobkin



Rabbinic Reflections

I write this on a bus travelling through the Galil, the northern part of Israel. Our shul, Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto (The BAYT), goes on an annual mission - partially to tour, but mostly to lend support and solidarity. We often travel to Judea and Samaria, as a show of support to areas that are under constant criticism over issues of sovereignty. But this year, we decided to go north.

No one contests Israel's sovereignty over cities like Haifa and Safed. But there's a different kind of battle that is taking place on a daily basis in Israel's northern cities.

The city of Nazareth Illit has approximately 60,000 people, 82 per cent of them Jewish. It is a very important industrial city, housing the great Elite-Strauss food conglomerate and many other manufacturers. One of the highlights of our trip was touring the Elite factory, seeing how all the chocolates and confections are made, and then sampling all-you-can-eat chocolate at the end of the tour!

Adjacent to Nazareth Illit is the much larger city of Nazareth, the largest Arab city in Israel. In all, there are approximately 250,000 Arabs in the area. Sadly, while the Arab numbers are growing, the Jewish numbers in the area are not. Even in the predominantly Jewish Nazareth Illit, Arabs are coming forward with cash offers on homes in Jewish neighbourhoods, offering above market value.

Without a bullet being fired, without a protest in the UN, Arabs are slowly taking over the northern cities of Israel. Since so much attention is being (rightfully) placed on the "territories," many of us are losing sight of the important demographic struggle that is taking place in the Galil.

That is why the "Garin Torani," the religious Jewish community of Nazareth Illit, was so grateful for our visit. They are lonely in their struggle to hold on to the north, and they were greatly encouraged that a group from Toronto would wish to support them in their efforts.

The north is no less Israel than Tel Aviv or Jerusalem. Please remember this the next time you visit Israel. Take a trip to Nazareth Illit, to Carmiel, to the Galil and Golan. See the ancient city of Tzippori, which was the home of Rabbi Judah the Prince, and where the Mishnah was written. See Gamla, where a stronghold of Jews resisted the Romans shortly before the 1st century CE siege on Jerusalem, in an episode of our history as important as Masada.

During your travels, don't forget the mystical city of Safed, home to the great Tannaitic sage and author of the Zohar, Rabbi Shimon bar Yohai, and host to the great 16th-century kabbalistic movement of Rabbi Isaac Luria and his disciples. You will see vestiges of a magical Judaism that is filled with art, music, and spirituality.

As Canadians, we should appreciate the great north. By visiting the Galil and Golan, you'll not only see a breathtaking part of Israel; you'll also strengthen our brethren in the process.

Smaller shuls offer room for growth

From the Bimah
Rabbi Catharine Clark

To build a full Jewish life for you and your family, it is time to become part of a small Jewish community. This Shabbat at Congregation Or Shalom in London, Ont., three members of the synagogue will lead services, one member will chant Torah, another will chant Haftorah and two more will prepare kiddush for their fellow members. On Monday evening, another community member will teach at the JCC in an adult Jewish education program organized almost entirely by volunteers. Later in the week, our youth director, a lifelong member of the congregation, will lead the elementary school children in fun, experiential learning activities. A similar story could be told about the Jewish community in Halifax and Saskatoon or about one of the few small congregations in Toronto or Montreal.

But in one of the mega-shuls in Canada's largest Jewish communities, the senior rabbi, cantor, assistant rabbi, chazzan sheini, education director, membership liaison, events coordinator and caterer will perform these duties for you. It will be convenient and easy that these professionals will fulfil all the essentials of Jewish communal life for you. Unfortunately, convenience and ease do not create an empowered spiritual life for anyone, especially not for a Jew.

Judaism sets high standards for each of its adherents. In contrast, in Catholicism, only a priest is required to follow certain behaviours that are considered holy, such as celibacy, and only a priest can perform many of the rituals, called sacraments, in that religion. Our theology of religious leadership is different. Each adult Jew is obligated in the 613 commandments. Any of us could witness a marriage and, with some Hebrew and extra study, perform a funeral. With more Hebrew and the ability to carry a tune and keep the beat, any Jew could serve as shaliach tzibbur, the prayer leader who carries the prayers of the congregation to God.

For lay leaders to perform these sacred tasks, however, there must be room for them on the bimah, in the classroom, in the synagogue kitchen and on the programming calendar. In communities with many Jewish communal professionals, it is difficult to create this space. The cantor, assistant rabbi, synagogue program director, Jewish educator and caterer, understandably, want to keep their jobs. Small Jewish communities, though, have long relied on lay leaders to fill at least some of these vital roles.

You could be one of these lay leaders. You just need to be in a community where there is room for you. For some of you, finding the space to develop your Jewish skills will mean switching membership from a huge congregation to a smaller shul in the same city. For others, you might decide to move to a smaller Jewish community.

If the latter option is right for you, I hope the smaller Jewish community you choose is London. You will find an absence of gridlock and more affordable housing. You will find a community that soon knows you, welcomes your interests and helps you develop your talents. I look forward to meeting you – and to seeing you on the bimah.

New dementia home aims for 'quality of life'

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Anne Snowdon has a personal interest in One Kenton Alzheimer's Centre of Excellence, B'nai Brith Canada's new Alzheimer's home, built in partnership with the Ivey International Centre for Health Innovation.

Snowdon, who chairs the centre and is a nurse by training, said that her mother, 87, has Alzheimer's, and she understands first hand the impact the disease has on families. "The project is especially relevant to me because it [caters to] a population that is near and dear to my heart."

Alzheimer's and dementia are increasing around the globe, she said, and research is relatively limited. "That means there is no cure on the horizon. Wonderful strides are being made, but there is no magic pill to curb it."

The impetus for One Kenton, she said, is to create a meaningful environment for Alzheimer's and dementia patients, and their families.

"Up until now, the focus has always been on managing patients, but we want to create the best quality of life for them."

As a nurse, she said, she realizes that there have been no gains in caring for Alzheimer's patients in decades.

"I trained 30 years ago, and things are still the same. I don't mean patients are getting bad care. They are safe and cared for, but the institutions are not promoting meaningful and purposeful lives," Snowdon said..

"This is the impetus that drives this project. [We] got involved because it is an important one. Our goal is to promote quality of life."

When Ivey was approached by B'nai Brith, she said, "I thought, 'Wow, this is a match made in heaven.'"

Isaac Weinroth, 37, executive director of One Kenton, speaking on Dec. 9, the day the first residents were due to move in, said B'nai Brith first got involved in building One Kenton in response to unmet needs in the community.

"B'nai Brith realized that Alzheimer's was increasing in the general community, and the only option available to care for patients and their families was long-term institutions."

Weinroth, who has a master's in health administration and a degree in gerontology, said that at age 13 he volunteered at a geriatric health centre and went on to work with seniors. "I'm passionate about it."

He said that One Kenton, which can accommodate 45 people in 44 suites – one is for a dementia patient and a spouse – is a retirement home for people with Alzheimer's and dementia.

"The whole residence is designated for dementia care. It's built in a retirement home model, but with care for the residents."

The One Kenton brochure stresses that it's "not a home. It's home.

"Everything from the architectural layout to the colour selections, lighting, furnishings, patterns, and common areas has been designed to promote a calming, comfortable environment."

Weinroth said residents can bring in their own furniture and personal items if they choose. "They can also eat on their own schedule. They do what they do at home, and eat when they're hungry. There is no such thing as missing a meal. If someone is not ready to eat at lunch time, they can eat at 2 p.m. There is always food available, and all food is certified kosher under COR."

He said it's the only retirement home in Canada that caters exclusively to residents with dementia.

"The setting is adaptable, and every individual has their needs met."

He added that each resident has a core team made up of a nurse, personal support staff, dietary staff, program staff, housekeeper and a laundry person. "All staff, though, is hands-on. If someone asks me to take them to the dining room, I'm happy to do so, and so will any other staff. We're all personally involved in residents' care."

He said residents can have visitors at any time, and can have them stay for meals or holiday celebrations."

"One Kenton is a place to live, not a place to be. It will be full of life with musical performances, holiday celebrations, and High Holiday services."

Volunteer Services at Reena

By: Arlene Margolese
Manager, Volunteer Services / Faith & Cultural Services

Everyone has something great to offer so why not consider making that important difference in someone's life by sharing your skills, talents or energy volunteering at Reena?

Reena is blessed with many caring and talented volunteers who share their high energy and skills throughout the agency. We are deeply appreciative of the exceptional efforts they so enthusiastically contribute to almost every department and program within Reena. From direct service and administration, gift shop sales, reception coverage, greenhouse gardening care, young to seasoned volunteers work with young to seasoned individuals supported by Reena. Many of our volunteers have received rewards for their great work and we applaud their achievements and appreciate all that they bring to the people they so wholeheartedly support.

Our latest initiative centres around the New Senior or Boomer Volunteers, utilizing their many years of experience, expertise and maturity to enhance our agency. Boomer Volunteers facilitate the health and fitness of the people Reena supports by acting as fitness coaches to help Reena participants improve their health and wellbeing. In the long term, we anticipate that Boomer Volunteers will be in an ideal position to set an example for the rest of the community by becoming ambassadors and spokespersons for the inclusion of individuals with a developmental disability into fitness programs and healthier lifestyles. This will promote their broader inclusion in the community at large.

There is still a need for more Boomer Volunteers to fill positions in the program.

We ask you to join our team and call Arlene Margolese, Manager, Faith & Cultural Services - Volunteer Services, at 905-2690 ext. 2111 or email: amargolese@reena.org for further details.

Your participation as a volunteer will improve the lives of people with a developmental disability supported by Reena on so many levels.

Four people killed as a result of the storm

"Thanks to the preparedness of security and rescue forces, and thanks to the co-operation of civilians, many lives were saved," he said at the weekly cabinet meeting, which was postponed from morning to mid-afternoon because of difficulty in accessing Jerusalem.

Netanyahu said Israel had grappled well with the storm, but that there are still challenges ahead. He dismissed criticism of the way national and local governments prepared for the storm, echoing a statement made a day earlier by an Israel Electric Corporation official that "we functioned better than developed countries that such storms afflict more often."

Netanyahu said the priority was and remained "saving lives," and warned drivers to take particular care on the still-icy roads that were expected to refreeze overnight Sunday.

Public Security Minister Yitzhak Aharonovitch said there were certainly "lessons to be learned" from the crisis, but rejected criticism of the authorities' handling of the storm. He denied there had been a major failure, and said there was no place for a commission of inquiry.

According to the electric company, as of Sunday evening, 14,000 homes remained without power, 6,000 of them in Jerusalem. It said great efforts were being made to return electricity to hard-hit areas around the capital and in northern Israel. Many of the homes were in settlements in the West Bank isolated by the storm.

Snow snarled traffic in Jerusalem. (Israel Sun photo)

Four people were reportedly killed as a result of the storm, which brought snow as far south as Dimona and heavy rains elsewhere, although there were no fatalities in Jerusalem.

The Hebrew University of Jerusalem said it would hold classes only after 12 p.m. Monday.

Earlier in the day, police finally reopened all the main roads to and from Jerusalem, after more than 2-1/2 days of closures because of the heavy snow.

Buses started to run again inside the city in the early afternoon, but mainly in central areas. The light rail system was still out of service and was unlikely to restart before Monday. The municipality was bringing in 100 tons of salt from the Dead Sea to help de-ice city roads. Drivers were told to stay off the roads inside the city if possible.

Still, several neighbourhoods in the capital, as well as in the northern city of Safed and in the Golan Heights, remained under several centimetres of snow.

Some 80 villages and communities around Jerusalem were without power at the height of the storm, and 30 were still disconnected on Sunday. At least three villages in the Golan Heights, which is better equipped to handle storms and snowfall, had been without electricity over the weekend, but were reconnected Saturday night. Power to affected Upper Galilee areas was set to be restored by Sunday night.

Israel went through another freezing night Saturday, with roads icing over nationwide, but the storm was winding down and no further snowfall was forecast. Much of Jerusalem and northern Israel were still deep in snow, and much of the rest of the country was still grappling with stormy conditions.

In the West Bank, IDF helicopters were used to evacuate those who needed emergency medical attention, including, on Sunday morning, a mother and her three children in the settlement of Haresha who were suffering from hypothermia.

Jerusalem Mayor Nir Barkat said Saturday night that the capital was still in "a state of emergency," grappling with a "storm of extraordinary proportions." Netanyahu called it a "once-in-a-century" storm, and said efficient co-ordination had averted the kind of loss of life that other countries have suffered in similar circumstances.

There were 40 to 60 centimetres of snow in Jerusalem and between 60 centimetres and one metre in the Golan.

The storm, which hit hard in Syria, Jordan, the West Bank, Gaza and Egypt as well, was largely over in Israel by Saturday night.

On Saturday afternoon, the bodies of two men from the Bedouin town of Rahat were found by rescue services after three days of searching. The men had set out on Wednesday in an SUV and went missing near the Dead Sea. Overnight Friday into Saturday, a one-year-old toddler in Lod died of injuries that he sustained when a heater placed in his room to combat the severe cold caught fire. The toddler's father sustained light injuries trying to save him.

Netanyahu stresses need for peace deal with Palestinians

Kotel belongs to all, PM tells Reform group

Times of Israel and JTA

The Western Wall belongs to all Jews, including Reform Jews, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said emphatically in a Dec. 15 address to the Union for Reform Judaism Biennial 2013 via satellite.

"I'm committed to making sure all Jews feel at home at our holiest site," he said. "Israel is and must continue to be the homeland of the entire Jewish People. That is the place where all Jews, including Reform Jews, experience nothing less than audacious hospitality."

He said the Wall, though in Israel, belonged to the entire Jewish People, and that he was determined to ensure that all Jews felt at home there. "The Western Wall is in Israel, but it belongs to all of you – it belongs to you and to me, to all of us," he said, promising to ensure that the Wall "is a source of unity, not division, a place where all Jews feel at home."

Netanyahu thanked Rabbi Rick Jacobs, president of the Reform movement, for his efforts in support of an interdenominational compromise at the Western Wall. He also thanked the Reform movement for its efforts to strengthen Jewish identity and American Jews' connection to Israel.

Rabbi Jacobs, in turn, praised Netanyahu for his role in securing an agreement with the Women of the Wall movement over an alternative section of the wall to be used for non-Orthodox prayer.

"To us, it is a symbol of the day when those from the non-Orthodox streams will stand equal with the Orthodox rabbinate and community in the eyes of the state," Rabbi Jacobs said.

"It is a symbol of your efforts and ours to resist the attempts of those who would turn back the equality advances of women in Israel. Before all those assembled here, I want to acknowledge your personal role in achieving at the Kotel something that, when fulfilled, will be a historic transformation."

Benjamin Netanyahu [Flash90 photo]

Netanyahu also warned the audience about Iranian duplicity and discussed the ongoing Israeli-Palestinian peace talks.

Netanyahu began by repeating his frequent message that the best way to stop Iran from obtaining nuclear weapons is through maintaining economic sanctions alongside the threat of military attack.

"Iran is bent on a nuclear weapons program," he said. "We would seek a peaceful solution. We cannot allow this regime to have a nuclear weapons capacity."

Netanyahu said that Iran's repression of civil rights at home, as well as its support for terror abroad, belie the friendly diplomatic posture its leaders have struck recently. "It talks the talk, but it walks the walk of death every day," he said.

Netanyahu repeated his call for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas to recognize Israel as a Jewish state. He also emphasized the need for a peace deal that will ensure Israel's security.

"To reach this historic peace, I'm ready to make difficult decisions," he said. "I made these decisions because I wanted to give negotiations a chance. Peace is not a one-way street. It's a two-way street."

Netanyahu's speech Sunday via video feed to the conference's closing plenary in San Diego repeated many of the principal points of his address to the Jewish Federations of North America General Assembly last month in Jerusalem.

CERN accepts Israel as full member

The Times of Israel

Israel was admitted Thursday as a full member of CERN, the European Organization for Nuclear Research, after the governing council of the prestigious facility voted in favour of accepting an application submitted by the Israeli government.

Israel will be the atomic research centre's 21st official member and its first non-European associate.

The resolution to accept Israel was unanimously adopted by the CERN Council last week.

CERN, located in Switzerland, operates the $10 billion Large Hadron Collider, which creates high-energy collisions of subatomic particles.

Israel joined the organization as an observer in 1991, and dozens of Israeli scientists had taken part in various research projects associated with the organization, including the discovery of the Higgs boson, known popularly as the "God particle," last year.

Israel's admission to the research facility will allow the country to participate in tenders related to the particle accelerator, to be represented in the management of the organization and to submit applications for scholarships for Israeli students.

"The Israeli scientific community has brought a great deal to CERN over the years," CERN director general Rolf Heuer said. "I am looking forward to welcoming Israel as our 21st member state and to intensifying our collaboration."

Israel will have to allocate close to $14.3 million a year to the institute, Ha'aretz reported.

"As a member of the fact-finding mission that assessed Israel's readiness for CERN membership, I was extremely impressed with the quality of Israeli research and researchers," said CERN research director Sergio Bertolucci.

The formal signing ceremony will take place next month.

"This is a day of pride and satisfaction for Israeli science and we congratulate all the scientists involved in this achievement and whose abilities bring honor to the State of Israel," Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman said following CERN's announcement.

"The decision is also an impressive achievement for Israeli diplomacy and a sign of respect to the activities of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs which has led this effort for many years," he said.

"This is a very special moment for Israeli science and Israel," said Eliezer Rabinovici, chair of the Israeli Academy of Science's National Committee for High Energy Physics and professor at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

"It reflects decades in which many Israeli scientists, technicians and Israeli industry have contributed significantly to the European scientific effort at CERN. It also has a sense of return. We are becoming full members of the crew at a most exciting period in which CERN is about to scan new horizons."

Peace remains U.S. goal: Kerry

JTA

JERUSALEM — A final status peace agreement between Israel and the Palestinians remains the U.S. goal, Secretary of State John Kerry said.

"Our goal remains as it always has been – for the Israelis and Palestinians to reach a final status agreement – not an interim agreement, a final status agreement," Kerry said Dec.13 in Jerusalem after meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority Mahmoud Abbas.

"And both parties remain committed to fulfilling their obligations to stay at the table and negotiate hard during the nine-month period that we set for that."

The meeting Dec. 12 between Kerry and Abbas was cut short due to a major snowstorm. Officials were concerned Kerry's motorcade wouldn't be able to leave the area. Kerry met Dec. 13 with Netanyahu in Jerusalem in a meeting postponed a day because of the storm.

Kerry told reporters that the sides continue to discuss the "critical issues," which he identified as borders, security, refugees, Jerusalem, mutual recognition, and an end to conflict and to all claims.

He also reiterated the United States' commitment to Israel's security.

"We are working on an approach that both guarantees Israel's security and fully respects Palestinian sovereignty," he said.

Kerry also said the third release of Palestinian prisoners, pledged by Israel to bring the Palestinians back to the negotiating table more than three months ago, would take place Dec. 29 as scheduled, despite his calls for a delay.

He wants to prevent another Israeli announcement of new settlement construction approvals that could disrupt or potentially halt the current peace process.

Plundered Syrian Torah scrolls said to be held by Al Qaeda linked rebels

Elhanan Miller
The Times of Israel

Torah scrolls and other Judaica plundered from an ancient Damascus synagogue are being held by an Islamist group inside Syria, which is demanding the release of prisoners captured by the Assad regime in return for the items, The Times of Israel has learned.

Reports on the destruction and looting of the millennia-old Jobar synagogue in Damascus emerged as early as March, but those responsible for the theft have never been clearly identified, as government and opposition forces traded accusations.

The Jobar synagogue – said to be 2,000-years-old – was built on the site where the prophet Elijah is said to have concealed himself from persecution and anointed his successor, Elisha, as a prophet. It was badly damaged in March by mortars reportedly fired by Syrian government forces. Some reports say the building was destroyed.

A source involved in negotiating for the release of the Judaica items and their extraction from Syria, speaking to The Times of Israel on condition of anonymity due to the sensitivity of the matter, said the objects were being held inside Syria by a group affiliated with the Al-Nusra Front, an Islamist group associated with Al Qaeda and labelled a terrorist organization by the United States. He said the stolen items include at least three or four Torah scrolls as well as ancient Jewish scrolls and silverware.

IDF soldier killed while on border patrol

JTA

JERUSALEM — An Israeli soldier patrolling Israel's border with Lebanon was killed by what is believed to be a rogue Lebanese soldier.

Master Sgt. Sholmi Cohen, 31, of Afula, was killed Sunday night when the Lebanese soldier fired up to seven shots from a pistol at an Israel Defence Forces patrol near an IDF outpost at Rosh Hanikra.

Israeli reports say several Lebanese soldiers attempted to stop their fellow soldier from perpetrating the attack, jumping on him as he began shooting.

The Lebanese soldier, who went missing after the incident occurred, turned himself in to his base Monday morning, according to Lebanese media reports.

Several hours after the incident, Israeli troops shot and injured two Lebanese soldiers after seeing "suspicious movement" along the border, according to an IDF spokesperson.

Both the IDF and the Lebanese army announced that they are investigating the incident that led to the death of the Israeli soldier. Israel also protested the incident to UNIFIL, the United Nations peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon, which secures the border with Israel.

Representatives of the Israeli and Lebanese militaries and UNIFIL officials were scheduled to meet to discuss the incident, Israeli Defence Minister Moshe Ya'alon said, according to Ha'aretz. Ya'alon said in a statement that Israel holds the Lebanese government and its army responsible for the incident.

"We will not tolerate aggression against the state of Israel, and maintain the right to exercise self-defense against perpetrators of attacks against Israel and its civilians," an IDF spokesperson said.

Knesset bill would penalize pro-boycott NGOs

JTA

JERUSALEM — A Knesset committee approved a bill that would heavily tax foreign donations to organizations that call for a boycott of Israel.

The bill, which has spurred controversy, passed the ministerial committee on legislation on Sunday by an 8-4 vote.

The measure taxes at 45 per cent foreign donations to non-profit foundations and organizations whose directors or managers have publicly expressed support for a boycott, divestment or sanctions against Israel or denies Israel's existence as a Jewish and democratic state.

Attorney General Yehuda Weinstein has called the bill unconstitutional and Justice Minister Tzipi Livni has vowed to fight it.

The bill was proposed by Ayelet Shaked of the Jewish Home party and Robert Ilatov of Yisrael Beiteinu.

Antagonism to Lev Tahor generates in Israel, says Yakov Rabkin

Prof who studied radical sect offers perspective

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Université de Montréal professor who has been in contact with the Lev Tahor community since it settled in Quebec says he never observed abuse of children in his visits to its former Ste. Agathe des Monts base.

Yakov Rabkin would not comment on whether the children are in danger, but he suggests that the "antagonism" toward the extremely anti-Zionist Jewish sect has originated with the Lev Tahor members' secular relatives in Israel.

"I don't know whether or not there has been abuse, but the times I went to visit the community – sometimes without notice – I didn't see any violence. The boys appeared similar to other chassidic boys.

"However, in recent years, the girls and women started to wear veils and came to look different from women in other chassidic communities," he told The CJN.

The women's head-to-toe clothing has led some to dub the group the "Jewish Taliban."

Rabkin, an observant Jew, is a professor of contemporary history and author of the 2006 book A Threat from Within: A Century of Jewish Opposition to Zionism. He visited the community on average once or twice a year.

Rabkin said Lev Tahor members almost all grew up in non-religious families in Israel, including its leader and founder, self-styled rabbi Shlomo Helbrans.

"While most Lev Tahor children were born in Quebec, the majority of adult members, about 50 people came from Israel, where they had been raised with the ideology of Zionism. Some are former officers of the Israeli army."

Rabkin has been studying Lev Tahor since Helbrans settled his followers in Ste. Agathe in 2001 from Israel, where Helbrans had been deported from the United States after serving a jail term for the second-degree kidnapping of a child.

Yakov Rabkin

A few years ago, for a film project, Rabkin interviewed several members – men and women – about their background and motivations for joining the group.

During a visit last summer, Rabkin learned that Lev Tahor had been planning for several months to move to Ontario because they would not comply with Quebec's education laws.

The vast majority of the approximately 250 members left Ste. Agathe Nov. 19, ahead of a youth court hearing into allegations of child abuse and neglect. They're now living in Chatham, Ont.

On Nov. 27, a Quebec youth court judge ordered 14 children to be immediately placed in foster care for at least 30 days because they were at risk of harm.

Local children's aid workers are seeking a court order to take custody of the 14 children, who remain in Ontario. Their two sets of parents appealed that request Dec. 11. The case will be heard Dec. 23.

Rabkin believes it's the formerly secular Lev Tahor members' rejection of Zionism, as much as their extreme religious practices, that has aroused such rancour against them in Israel.

"I understand the antagonism Lev Tahor generates in Israel," Rabkin said. "The relatives of those who joined Lev Tahor are almost all secular Zionists. They are horrified by the new lifestyle of their children and by the education given to their grandchildren…

"They protested outside the Canadian embassy in Tel Aviv and mobilized Israeli authorities, which put pressure on child protection agencies in Canada."

A Knesset committee has been hearing testimonies of ill treatment of children, including physical abuse and forced marriages of girls, from these relatives and ex-Lev Tahor members, including one of Helbrans' sons.

Rabkin believes that's why Quebec youth protection officials began investigating the group earlier this year.

"For several months children were checked for signs of beatings and homes, including refrigerators, were inspected almost daily," he said.

Although living conditions in Ste. Agathe were humble, even squalid, the group has not been without means. In a Dec. 7 investigative report, the Toronto Star uncovered that Lev Tahor has benefited from sizeable donations from unknown donors since it set up in Canada, and had amassed about $5.6 million in land and property assets at its peak.

The money was received under two registered tax-exempt charities: Congregation Riminov, which lost its charitable status in 2007, and the Society for Spiritual Development, established in 2004 which last year transferred its assets of $3.3 million to another charity, the Canadian Friends of Holy Land Institutions.

Helbrans (also known as Elbarnes) entered the U.S. illegally in 1990 from Israel. In 1994 a Brooklyn, N.Y. court convicted him of kidnapping a 13-year-old boy whom he held for two years at his yeshiva against his mother's wishes.

After spending two years in jail, Helbrans and his wife, Malka, who was convicted on lesser charges, unsuccessfully appealed the kidnapping conviction.

They were deported to Israel in 2000. The following year, Helbrans came to Canada on a temporary visa with about 30 families and settled in Ste. Agathe, a Laurentian resort town, and they began building homes and a synagogue.

He applied for refugee status, claiming he'd be in danger if returned to Israel because of his opposition to the state. An Immigration and Refugee Board panel in Montreal granted him asylum in 2003.

The federal government appealed the decision, but the Federal Court of Canada threw out the case. Prominent civil rights lawyer Julius Grey represented Helbrans.

In 2003, the Vaad Hoaskonim, the rabbinical council of Orthodox communities in New York, warned that Helbrans' group "constitutes a great threat, spiritual and physical, to the Torah observant community in general and to every individual in particular."

In early 2012, a reporter for the Israeli daily Ha'aretz spent several days among the normally reclusive Lev Tahor in Ste. Agathe and published an in-depth series, weighing the horrific allegations against the group with what he saw, ultimately drawing no firm conclusions.

PR firm stays current with rebrand, new name

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

David Eisenstadt has been in the PR business for 40 years, so he knows which buttons to push to get media attention.

And the one that's most effective in catching the attention of news hounds is to offer up something that's, well, news. "We spend a lot of time...to determine what is newsworthy and what isn't," he explained. "We're story tellers and truth is at the basis of it anyways."

So here's Eisenstadt's story, truth be told. The Communications Group, the company he runs with his wife and partner, Rhoda, recently marked its 40th anniversary. They didn't rent a hall or hire a band to celebrate, but as part of the anniversary, the firm rebranded itself as "tcgpr, PR Consultants to News Makers" and launched a new web site. The firm retained its broader message of "Outside the box thinking."

"Our clients were referring to us as tcgpr," Rhoda explained. "We needed an update. This is more reflective of what we've been doing for many years, using social media.

"We are developing programs that leverage new mobile and web strategies, offering the range of digital and social marketing and modern market research and social analytics capabilities for many of our clients," she added.

"The reality is that the client today is clearly more sophisticated than they've ever been because we live in an information age," said David. "The client who understands where PR fits in the marketplace is ideal for us."

The company collaborates with marketing agencies to advance clients' strategic objectives. Canadian-owned but with international representation, tcgpr is the Toronto partner of IPREX Global Public Relations, an international network of independent PR firms.

tcgpr is a medium-sized shop in the public relations realm, with 15 consultants and employees, give or take, and a roster of clients that span a variety of sectors: technology; real estate; professional services; and not-for-profits.

"Public relations and advertising work together to support the marketing objectives, whether of a for-profit or a not-for-profit," Rhoda explained.

So how exactly do these areas overlap? "We do everything in a strategic way. We develop a strategic public relations plan that fits within the overall marketing objective of what the organization is trying to achieve," David said.

"When we represent a client, we help identify what is newsworthy and what is not newsworthy. The PR gives everybody the news story first and draws attention to the other aspects of the marketing campaign.

"Our value-added is that we see and make the news element and make it attractive." The company will reach out to print media, and employ social media like Facebook and Twitter, he said.

David points to a successful strategic campaign that boosted the prospects of one of tcgpr's clients, Two Men and a Truck. In 2010 when they acquired the account, news reports surfaced of Toronto police busting a ring of interrelated moving companies – none of them their client – for fraud.

At the time, Two Men could boast five franchisees, but the police arrests cast a pall on the industry and hardly helped their prospects of expanding.

The Eisenstadts learned from their clients that the company marketed itself based on its clean trucks, accurate estimates, on-time arrivals, good service and the like. All well and good, said David, but not news.

"We noodled it and came back to them with a strategic creation – a consumer's bill of rights for the moving industry in Canada."

The "consumer's bill of rights" was formally announced at a news conference in July 2010 and the news media "jumped all over this."

Three years later, the number of Two Men's franchisees had jumped to 21. "That PR event got them on the map," David said.

"Today, coverage in social and traditional media is what it is all about. Our job is to help our clients manage their news and generate coverage," he added.

Other services provided by the firm include crisis management, speech writing, employee communications and media training for executives.

"Not how to bob and weave," said David, "but how to communicate effectively in plain English."

He points to a successful campaign on behalf of an actuarial firm that came to them by word of mouth. "They wanted to reposition themselves for faster growth."

After some research, tcgpr came up with a new brand name and the slogan: "Actuaries who care."

"We literally helped give them a new identity and helped redesign their web site," said David. "That's strategic planning, so their look changed.

"We did the very same thing for ourselves."

Biography's Challenges: Janet Malcolm's Answer

Forty-One False Starts: Essays on Artists and Writers
By Janet Malcolm
Farrar, Straus and Giroux

Janet Malcolm is well known to aficionados of biography. She has done excellent work on Gertrude Stein, Alice B. Toklas and on Chekhov, as well as in the realm of non-fiction crime reporting, where she has returned often to what she views as the troubling relationship between the journalist and her subject. In her new collection, Forty-One False Starts: Essays on Artists and Writers, she returns, in essays written over a period of nearly thirty years, to what she calls the "congenital handicaps" of biography.

It's unusual for a practitioner to highlight the weaknesses of her chosen craft, but Malcolm does this with incisive, even savage insistence. She does this in a revealing piece on Bloomsbury and Virginia Woolf called "A House of One's Own," by comparing autobiography, letters, the writing of insiders and the outcome of more traditional biographical writing.

Biography, she tells us, "functions as a kind of processing plant where experience is converted into information the way fresh produce is converted into canned vegetables. But, like canned vegetables, biographical narratives are so far removed from their source – so altered from the plant with soil clinging to its roots that is a letter or a diary entry – that they carry little conviction."

A related problem, which Malcolm highlights in relation to Woolf, is biography's status as a "workshop where biographical narratives are manufactured." With Woolf, and the Bloomsbury group more broadly, mythology replaces real contact with the subject at hand, leading to guesswork and nonsense. In Woolf's case, this includes, according to Malcolm, unrealistic and fabricated notions regarding the Jewishness of Virginia Woolf's husband and creative collaborator Leonard Woolf.

By examining the faults in biographical writing, Malcolm triumphs in the genre. With regard to her chosen subjects she aims not to please, nor to tie up loose ends, nor to seem to master her subject. Rather, she studiously highlights the rough edges and irresolvable aspects of the lives she studies.

The best example of this can be found in her title essay, a tour de force published in The New Yorker in 1994 on the Manhattan-based artist David Salle. Salle's figurative paintings, built from a pastiche of images that include startling female nudes, brought him to the forefront of New York's art world in the 1980s. But by the time Malcolm began to spend time with him in his studio and at gallery openings, Salle's "declining reputation in the art world" became a guiding theme in their discussions.

The effect of such writing is a certain edginess and surprise, and even a touch of mischievousness. But Malcolm's interest and commitment to her subjects is so sustained and deep – in part thanks to her editors at The New Yorker, who support her kind of journalistic work – that her attitude toward her subject inevitably deepens our understanding.

Another idiosyncratic aspect of Malcolm's essays is their tendency, especially in the set gathered for Forty-One False Starts, to choose subjects whose story might be told from the point of view of Jewish identity, which is only mentioned in the most digressive, even offhand way. The impact of Virginia Woolf's misrecognition based on her marriage to Leonard is one example of this. Again and again, a paragraph or two, in essays of thirty pages or more, is all one gets. Malcolm has apparently decided that Jewishness is in some way a secret code or key to the lives of her subjects, and she leaves it almost hidden, like a recessive gene.

This is true in the Salle piece, where we learn little about the artist's upbringing in the American Midwest, including the stray detail that he is the son of "second-generation Russian Jewish parents."

This approach recurs in almost every piece in Forty-One False Starts, and the careful reader may begin to feel that it is one of Malcolm's unsettling but fully intended writerly strategies. In the recent essay, "Depth of Field," about the major German photographic artist Thomas Struth, we learn, as an aside, that his "mother was in the Hitlerjugend and his father served in the Wehrmacht from 1937 to 1945 ... Like many, if not most Germans of his generation, Struth has been haunted by the Nazi past, and speaks of the Holocaust as a major influence on his life and work."

In a novelistic piece, some 75 pages long, on the young, preternaturally energetic and influential New York art magazine editor Ingrid Sischy, aspects of Malcolm's subject remain out of focus. These include Sischy's sexual identity, though subtle details are suggestive, and her Jewishness. The most substantial comment on the latter is Malcolm's characterization of Sischy as a "kind of reverse Jewish princess: she goes through life gratefully accepting the pleasures and amenities that come her way, and if they are not the particular pleasures and amenities she ordered – well, so much the better. Her relationship to the world of consumer objects is almost bizarrely attenuated ... She has no credit cards, no charge accounts, no savings account ...."

In a wonderful essay entitled "Salinger's Cigarettes" Malcolm makes the act of burying one's Jewish identity an overt part of her appreciation of the writer's work. As critics lost patience with Salinger's stories in the late 1950s, a routine complaint arose that he was intentionally downplaying his own Jewish ancestry by presenting characters whose ethnicity was elaborately coded or unclear.

Malcolm challenges these critical assaults with the following remarkable anecdote: "As it happens, Salinger is himself honestly half Jewish: his mother, née Marie Jillich, was an Irish-Catholic who, however, changed her name to Miriam and passed herself off as a Jew after she married Salinger's father, Sol, with the result that Salinger and his older sister, Doris, grew up believing they were wholly Jewish; only when Doris was nineteen, and after Salinger had been bar mitzvahed, were they told the surprising truth."

Hiddenness, mistaken and misapprehended identity were themselves part of Salinger's life. The reappearance of such troubling and rough-edged themes in his stories makes perfect sense if one takes into account the stories' biographical context.

Malcolm is so much livelier and surprising than the bulk of her colleagues in the "workshop" of "biographical narratives" that one might be tempted to declare the genre moribund but for work like Forty-One False Starts.

Norman Ravvin tries his hand at biography in the forthcoming Wordless Leonard Cohen Songbook, as well as in talks on Leonard Cohen to be delivered in Poland in the spring.

'British Schindler' saved 700 children

Joseph Serge
Interim Editor

Around 10,000 children, mostly Jews, were rescued from Nazi Germany and central Europe and put into British foster homes in what became known as the kindertransport.

Among them were almost 700 Czech and Slovak children rescued by the efforts of one "British Schindler," Sir Nicholas Winton, whose feat is explored in the documentary Nicky's Family, by Matej Minac and Patrick Pass.

The film, narrated by CBC correspondent Joe Schlesinger, one of the children rescued by Winton, opens Dec. 20 at the Kingsway Theatre, 3030 Bloor St. W. in Toronto.

What is amazing about Winton's story is that he kept quiet about these events for more than half a century and they would probably remain unknown had his wife not discovered a suitcase with a scrapbook and other documents from that time.

The story is told through dramatization plus interviews with several survivors, now scattered all over the world, which includes teachers, engineers, hoteliers, dentists, one member of the House of Lords and a pastor. It also has several scenes with Winton himself, who is 104.

In 1938, Winton was an otherwise normal London stockbroker who loved the good life including skiing and travelling. Instead of going on a ski vacation that year, however, he decided to visit Prague and saw first-hand the plight of Jewish refugees. He became concerned for them when he saw that they lived in terrible conditions.

Realizing they had nobody to help them, he thought the least he could do is try to save the children. "If something isn't blatantly impossible, there must be a way to do it," he says.

He started a letter-writing campaign, even addressing one to U.S. president Franklin Roosevelt, but his efforts didn't bear much fruit. He compiled a list of 2,000 children who he hoped to rescue.

As word of his campaign to save the children spread, he drew the attention of Nazi intelligence agents who, in a twist that could be from an Alan Furst spy novel, used the lure of a beautiful woman to seduce him for information, pretending to be the Prague representative of the Swedish Red Cross.

Sir Nicholas Winton, seated right, with some of his "children" in the film Nicky's Family.

With war approaching, Winton tried even harder to save the children, and eventually, the British Home Office told him that if he could find a family for each child, they would give them visas.

Back in England, he opened an office and looked for foster homes. Eventually trainloads of children left Czechoslovakia and got to Britain through Germany, the Netherlands and the English Channel.

The documentary shows the recent reunion of survivors as they took that same journey once again.

After the war, Winton moved on, and wasn't in touch with any of them, although he remains philanthropic to this day. When his wife found the scrapbook in an attic 50 years later, he finally told her about his pre-wartime deeds. His wife gave the scrapbook to a historian and his story was finally made public.

In the most emotional part of the movie, we see Winton on a BBC show, That's Life, in 1988. He was unaware that he was sitting in a studio full of his rescued children. "They got me there… under false pretences," he says. As they each stand up and applaud him, he is moved to tears, the results of his efforts finally obvious. The families of Winton's children have now grown to almost 6,000 people.

What's even more remarkable, as the film shows, is that his legacy continues. Today, thousands of young people all over the world, inspired by him, have taken part in a program to create various charity projects mostly for children worldwide. Around 3,000 students have taken part in the Nicholas Winton program.

It is Winton's legacy and its hopeful message that make this documentary stand out in a crowd of similar films.

Names in the News: Vancouver-based artist Lilian Broca, whose large stone mosaic panels depicting the biblical story of Esther and Purim have received wide critical attention, has been pleased in recent years when some of her mosaics were licensed in the fashion industry for use on designer gowns. Broca was of course delighted when pop-culture icons Katy Perry and Vanessa Hudgens were photographed wearing the gowns.

The subject of at least one book and one documentary film, Broca has been angered and frustrated recently to learn that unscrupulous designers have ripped off her Byzantine-style art for use in their own inferior fashions. "This is not the trickle down of a fashion concept, this is theft," observed the website Mosaic Art Now.

"In the past I have seen my mosaics reproduced badly and cheaply by unscrupulous companies in Third World countries," Broca has said. "This time the designs were stolen and printed on clothes. It pains me to great lengths to see my art reduced to decorative patterns on mass produced fabrics intended for wear." Check out Broca's majestic mosaics at www.lilianbroca.com.

Glee club brings joy to Baycrest residents

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

At a recent Chanukah concert put on by Buddies Glee Club at Baycrest, Sydney Press, 85, sang at the top of his lungs.

A Baycrest resident who has Alzheimer's disease, Press joined the club – it has members ranging in age from 75 to 103 – with his wife, Vivian Rosenberg, 76, who attended each rehearsal with him.

Rosenberg said that her husband, who sang and played trumpet from a young age, has always been musical. "When he came to Baycrest, I looked for a program for him, and when this came up, I jumped at [the chance to join.]

"There is absolutely no question. When he starts to sing, his whole mood changes. He perks up, and enjoys every minute."

The glee club is part of a research study, which began in 2011 as a 16-week program for adults who attend Baycrest day programs. Phase 2 of the study was for residents of the nursing home, and Phase 3 combined nursing home residents and their caregivers, who were required to attend each rehearsal.

The recent concert was made up of participants in the phase two and three components of the study.

Amy Clements-Cortes, senior music therapist at Baycrest and an assistant professor at the University of Toronto, said that participants were tested before and after the program, and some rated themselves, about whether singing made them happy and less anxious, if they felt uplifted, and if they had a good time.

Vivian Rosenberg sings with her husband, Sydney Press.

"We have learned from our research that the choir is beneficial and enhances their quality of life. All participants reported that their happiness increased, energy increased, and pain decreased, after each weekly session."

Overall, she said, research shows that music reduces pain, enhances perception, elevates moods and facilitates sleep and relaxation. It can also help participants to pay attention and focus. "There are so many benefits to music.

"The glee club is so successful, that we're continuing it now without a research component."

Chrissy Pearson, a Baycrest music therapist who leads the glee club, said participants look forward to their weekly practices.

"We warm up with breathing exercises and scales so they get oriented. For those who are cognitively impaired, this is a cue for them to participate.

"We then start singing, and we do only three or four songs so they become familiar with them. To change things up a little, we change the tempo, sing the songs louder or softer, or sing an alternate arrangement."

Being a music therapist, she said, she is able to tailor the choir to everyone's needs. "For example, I know where each participant should sit, who they should or should not sit with, and in what order the songs should be practised. Some people need to start off with energetic songs, and others need to work up to that."

After each practice, she said, she asks participants about their mood, and "I can honestly say that no one ever reported being in a bad mood. Those who were agitated or confused when they began the practice, seemed more relaxed and alert. That is the goal of the program, and it seems we have reached that goal."

She added that she has witnessed a wonderful connection between the residents and caregivers, whether they be children, spouses or hired caregivers. "They interacted by smiling at each other, sharing memories or hugging and holding hands. This was one of the great benefits of the study."

Monty Mazin, 86, who is a part of the glee club with his wife, Blema, who has Alzheimer's disease, said it is "joyful" for him to see her sing. "She played piano when she lived in Montreal, and in her better moments, she can remember some songs."

He said that he is an ambassador for the program. "It's so important to bring people together in an atmosphere that makes them happy."

For the recent 45-minute concert, which was a huge success, Pearson said, they sang about 18 songs, including show tunes, jazzy songs and Chanukah tunes.

Maple Leafs' Smith making the most of his opportunity

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

For those of you deep into advanced statistics, or hockey analytics as it is also known, the score at the last game between the Toronto Maple Leafs and the San Jose Sharks was, House of David, three.

As in, there were three Jewish guys on the ice in the same game, perhaps even at the same time – I'll have to review the tape on that – which must have been some sort of record. After all, there have been times in the history of the NHL when you'd have been hard pressed to find three guys in the entire league who were Jewish.

On Dec. 3, 2013, when the Sharks recently schooled the Leafs on playing "the right way," two of the guys playing the right way were Sharks forward Mike Brown and defenceman Jason Demers. Brown, who hails from the Chicago area, played for the Leafs a couple of seasons ago before being traded to Edmonton and then swapped again to San Jose. Not a bad career trajectory.

Demers, whose bio indicates he hails from Dorval, a suburb of Montreal, has been rumoured to be Jewish and has declined CJN requests for an interview. Perhaps another time…

Maple Leaf centre Trevor Smith rounded out the Jewish contingent in the game. A native of Ottawa whose parents hailed originally from Montreal, the family spent a few years in Toronto before moving to Vancouver, where Smith grew up. Smith, 28, has been a standout player in the American Hockey League (AHL). He's had the proverbial cup of coffee with a number of NHL franchises, including Tampa Bay (16 games), Pittsburgh (one game) and the Islanders (seven games). A free agent last summer, he signed a one-year, one-way contract with the Leafs for a reported $550,000.

Signing in Toronto marks something of a homecoming for him. Like lots of Canadian kids, he relishes the idea of playing for a franchise with the kind of storied history and tradition possessed by the Leafs. It was "a no-brainer," Smith said in an interview shortly after a Leafs practice.

Early in the season, Smith bounced back between Toronto and its AHL affiliate team, the Marlies, where he was named captain. "In the American League, I'm a veteran guy. I won a championship (2011-12, Norfolk Admirals). I know what it took to win a championship."

To date, he's played way more games with the Leafs than the Marlies, and filled in admirably when given the opportunity.

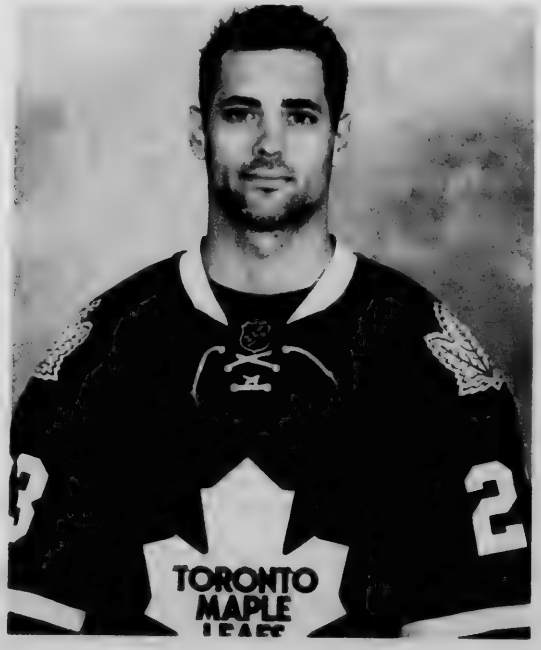
With injuries to Tyler Bozak, suspensions, and other incidents that depleted the centre ice position, he's played on an energetic third line consisting of Mason Raymond on one wing and David Clarkson on the other.

Smith has acquitted himself well. In 17 games, he's scored three goals and added four assists, was at -1 and had a more than respectable shooting percentage of 18.8. He shared the team lead in points for November, with seven.

Playing in a hockey-mad market like Toronto does put pressure on the players, he acknowledged, but "it's how you take it and run with it and how you put on yourself" that will determine how well you do.

Given the circumstances, "it's more of an opportunity to make a name for myself and show management and teammates that I can play in the NHL. It's a great opportunity for me," he said.

The jump to the NHL was admittedly a challenge. The guys are bigger and faster than in the minors, and they're very good positionally, he said. The Leafs' coaches constantly preach that the team has to play the right way all game long, without the wild changes of momentum that has the Leafs excelling one minute, and hemmed into their own zone the next.



As he's gotten more games under his belt, Smith's on-ice performance has improved. He was a little "hesitant" in his first game; when he got the puck, he tried to move it as quickly as possible. "Now, I hold on to it and [set up] a play," the six-foot-one, 195-pound centre said.

"It's a learning curve," he continued. "Every game I feel more comfortable and confident."

During the summer, Smith was recruited to play for the Canadian team at the Maccabiah Games in Israel. His father, Harvey, served as an assistant coach on the team, which won the gold medal. Smith was recovering from an injury and had just signed with the Leafs, so he had to turn down the offer, but with regret.

"I would have been upset if Canada had lost because I had not gone," he said.

The trip would have been Smith's second to the Holy Land. About eight years ago, he and his brother, Derek, visited the country on a Birthright trip. "It was unbelievable," he said. "It was a lot of fun. I met a lot of cool people. I still keep in touch with them.

"What a beautiful country. I'd love to go back."

In the meantime, he's got more pressing items on his agenda, like helping the Leafs play the right way and get out of their doldrums. Oh, and making sure the advanced Jewish stats don't take one step back.

Interfaith challenges

Ask Ella
By Ella Burakowski

Dear Ella,

My daughter married a man who isn't Jewish, and this is the first year that I'm invited to their house for a holiday/Christmas dinner.

When Rose first brought Richard home, we really liked him. He's a gentleman, educated, has a good career, and he treats our Rose with respect and love. His parents are soft-spoken, fine people and we all get along very well. However, religion has always been the elephant in the room.

Rose warned me in advance that they have a Christmas tree in their home, and that she doesn't want to hear a word about it. I raised both my children in a Jewish home and they both went to Hebrew school. We celebrated every holiday with family, from Passover seders to attending High Holiday services – even the lighting of the Chanukah candles was always done as a family.

I never for one second thought there would be a possibility that our grandchildren would not be raised Jewish, but it looks as if organized religion is not important to either my daughter or her husband.

When I try to bring up the subject to Rose she puts her hand out and stops me immediately. She doesn't want to hear my opinion, and she tells me very firmly that she and Richard will bring up their children the way they see fit, and it's a private and personal choice that will be decided between them alone.

I know this is premature, as Rose has only been married since June and there are no children yet. But I think this is a very important decision they should have made before they got married. I don't want to lose my daughter. I love her dearly, and if it means that I have to sit back and let it happen, then I'll have no choice.

But I am heartbroken and my husband has taken this very personally. I hope it doesn't break up our family. What would you do?

Religious Woes

Dear Religious Woes,

You and your husband have done your best for your two children. You have raised them in a loving home, put a roof over their heads, made sure they had a Jewish education, celebrated all the holidays as a family and attended synagogue on High Holidays. You've done the best job as a parent that you could. Rose is right in saying this is a private and personal choice. Trust that the values you've instilled in Rose are pure and wise.

Rose has made her choice with Richard, and by your own admission, he is a decent, fine young man who comes from a good family.

According to Jewish law, if a child is born to a Jewish mother, that child is Jewish. However, if the child is not raised with Jewish values, that point may be moot.

It's not your place to dictate to Rose how to raise her children – in fact, if you do, it may backfire. Instead, you need to support Rose and Richard. That doesn't mean you can't make your wishes clear: you are entitled to your opinion, but why not wait and see? Don't make a problem where there isn't one yet.

If and when the time comes that Rose and Richard have children, you can continue to invite them over to your home for Passover seders, lighting of the menorah and latkes, have them eat in a sukkah, teach them the traditions in which their mother was raised. Invite Richard's parents too, let them learn about Judaism along with their grandchildren. Make sure those times are about family, love and learning. Tell them why you are eating matzah, or why there are eight candles on a menorah. Don't preach, make it a relaxed and positive experience.

This way you can contribute to making sure your grandchildren have a taste of what their Jewish heritage is about. Richard's family may do the same with their faith, but in the end, it will be Rose and Richard who will decide what kind of a home they will raise their children in. Raising a child in an interfaith marriage can be confusing, especially if the child is raised to follow both religions. Rose and Richard will do what they feel is best for their family.

Take control where you can. Do your part as grandparents, teach and show the beauty and history of the Jewish faith, while, at the same time, teaching tolerance and acceptance of other faiths as well. Armed with knowledge, cloaked in love of family, these children will eventually end up making their own choices.

Chicken dishes are easy and creative

Elleen Goltz
Special to The CJN

Most everyone likes chicken. It's economical, readily available and is the go-to food when you don't know what else to make. You can roast it whole, broil it, boil it and even bake it with the skin on or off.

However, taking the skin off and getting rid of the bones does tend to make it more versatile. The skin and the fat attached to it are where most of the calories seem to be hiding so I tend to suggest going right to the boneless, skinless breasts or thighs.

"Chicken creative" is easy when you have the main ingredient already prepped and since the boneless and skinless breasts and thighs seem to go on sale every few weeks I say stock up when they're cheap and freeze them in packs of four breasts or eight thighs until you need them.

The following recipes run the gamut from super easy to "what the heck is Herb de Provence". Whichever one you decide to try, I can promise they won't resemble any chicken dish you've ever had before.

SPICED APPLE CHICKEN

2 apples, McIntosh, Granny Smith or Braeburn, peeled and thinly sliced
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1/4 tsp. cinnamon
3 tsp. olive oil, divided
3 tsp. margarine, divided
1-1/8 tsp. herbs de Provence, divided
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1-1/2 lb. boneless, skinless chicken breasts, trimmed and pounded to ½-in. thick
1 cup chicken broth
1 tsp. lemon zest

In a bowl, combine the apple slices with the lemon juice and cinnamon. Toss to coat and set aside. In a skillet, heat 1 tsp. oil and 1 tsp. margarine. Add the apple mixture and cook, stirring occasionally, until tender, about 5 minutes. Remove the apple mixture from the pan (don't clean the pan, you'll need it shortly) and set the apple mixture aside.

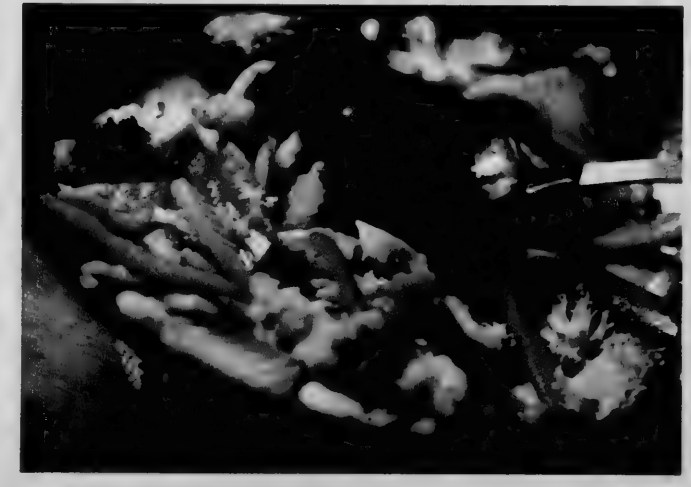
In a bowl, combine 1 tsp. herbs de Provence, salt, and pepper. Sprinkle the mixture on both sides of the chicken. Heat 1 tsp. oil and 1 tsp. margarine in the skillet. Add half the chicken and cook until no longer pink in the centre, 2 to 3 minutes per side. Remove to a platter and keep warm. Add the remaining 1 tsp. oil and 1 tsp. margarine to the pan; heat over high heat. Cook the remaining chicken in the same manner. When done place it on the platter with the other cooked chicken. Don't clean the pan. Add the broth, lemon zest and the remaining 1/8 tsp. herbs to the pan. Cook, stirring until slightly reduced, about 3 minutes. Spoon the sauce over the chicken and serve with the sautéed apples.

Modified from foodandwine.com

Herbs de Provence is usually available at most grocery stores but to make your own, mix together 1 tbsp. each (or equal proportions) dried thyme, rosemary, oregano, marjoram. You can store it in a glass jar or container with a lid.

SPICED PECAN CHICKEN

4 boneless, skinless chicken breasts, flattened
1 cup pecan halves
1/2 cup toasted breadcrumbs
1-1/2 tsp. grated orange zest
1/2 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. ground chipotle pepper
1 egg, beaten
1 tbsp. orange juice
4 tbsp. oil



In the bowl of a food processor, combine pecans, breadcrumbs, orange zest, salt and ground chipotle and process until the mixture is completely combined. Place the mixture on a plate. In a bowl, combine the egg and orange juice and whisk to combine. Dip each chicken breast into the egg mixture then dredge both sides in the pecan mixture.

Heat 2 tbsp. of the oil in a skillet and cook 2 of the coated chicken breasts for about 3 to 4 minutes on each side. When done place them on a serving plate, cover and repeat the process with the remaining oil and chicken. Serve immediately. Serves 4. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

SESAME & BROCCOLI CHICKEN

1 pound skinless, boneless chicken thighs cut into 1-inch pieces salt and freshly ground pepper
flour, for dusting
1/4 cup sesame seeds
1/4 cup oil
2 tbsp. minced fresh ginger
1 large garlic clove, minced
1/4 tsp. crushed red pepper
1-1/2 cups chicken broth
1 lb. broccoli (stems peeled and cut into 1/4-in.-thick rounds, tops cut into florets)
3 tbsp.soy sauce
1/2 tsp. sesame oil
steamed rice, for serving

Preheat the oven to 350. In a large bowl, season the chicken with salt and pepper, and toss with flour to coat thoroughly. Let the chicken stand for a few minutes, until the coating gets soggy. Pour 3 tbsp. of the oil over the chicken and toss to coat, then coat the chicken with the sesame seeds.

In a large nonstick skillet, heat the remaining 1 tbsp. of oil. Add the chicken in an even layer and cook, (don't move it), until browned on the bottom, about 3 minutes. Turn the chicken and cook until browned on the second side, about 2 minutes. With tongs, transfer the chicken to a rimmed baking sheet and put it in the oven while you finish the dish.

In the oil remaining in the skillet, cook the ginger, garlic and crushed red pepper over moderately high heat until fragrant, about 2 minutes. Add the chicken broth and boil over high heat until reduced by half, about 4 minutes. Add the broccoli, cover and cook until bright green and crisp-tender, about 2 minutes. Stir in the soy sauce, season with salt and remove from the heat. Gently stir in the chicken and sesame oil and serve with steamed rice.

CROCK POT CHICKEN STEW

2 tbsp. oil
4 chicken thighs
4 chicken drumsticks
3/4 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. black pepper
1 tbsp. flour
1 cup apple cider
1-1/2 cups chicken broth
1 onion, cut into thin slices
1 lb. parsnips cut into 1-inch pieces
2 carrots cut into 1-inch pieces
3 potatoes cut into 1-inch pieces
1/2 tsp. dried thyme

Place the oil in a skillet and heat to high. Season the chicken thighs and drumsticks with 1/4 tsp. of the salt and the pepper. Sear the outside of the chicken until browned, turning, about 8 minutes in all.

Place the chicken in the crock pot. Pour off all but 1 tbsp. of the fat from skillet. Reduce the heat to moderate and stir in the flour. Whisk in the cider and the broth and bring to a simmer, scraping the bottom of the pan to dislodge any brown bits.

Pour the mixture over the chicken in the crock pot. Add the onion, potato, parsnips, carrots, thyme, and the remaining 1/2 tsp. of salt to the crock pot. Cover and cook on high for about 2 hours, until the chicken is done. (Can also do this in the oven in a covered roasting pan and cook for about 45 minutes to an hour).

Anti-Israel activity on campus

To protest or not to protest?

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Should students tackle anti-Israel activities on campus head-on – setting up counter-events or even urging universities to ban groups and events from taking place – or is it best to downplay them in the hope of minimizing their impact?

That's the central question for young pro-Israel advocates facing groups and individuals at their schools who are hostile to the Jewish state.

As it stands, some advocacy groups, most notably the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA) and its local affiliates, urge students to counter misinformation at anti-Israel events, but not through direct confrontation.

Judy Zelikovitz, CIJA's vice-president of university and local partner services, argues that the right way to connect with "mainstream" students – who she says are usually not interested in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – is to demonstrate that Israel is a "normal, flourishing liberal democracy that shares Canada's values."

"When confronted with anti- and pro-Israel messages, rather than looking to take sides in a divisive foreign conflict, mainstream students are really determining which side is more moderate, relatable and relevant to their own interests," she told The CJN.

But some student leaders say that such an approach falls short.

Sarah Bernamoff, a 2013 University of Calgary graduate and founder of Calgary United with Israel, which has both student and community members, said she started her advocacy group as a direct response to what she felt was a lack of support from mainstream Jewish organizations like CIJA and its affiliate, the Calgary Jewish Federation, in tackling anti-Israel campus activity.

Israel seeks to tap Canada's expertise in natural gas, new ambassador says

David Lazarus
Staff Reporter

OTTAWA — Barely a couple of weeks into the job, Rafael Barak, Israel's new ambassador to Canada, already has a to-do list that will take full advantage of a bilateral relationship that's never been more friendly.

The 63-year-old diplomat said in a Dec. 12 interview at the Israeli Embassy that he was greatly looking forward to Prime Minister Stephen Harper's historic visit to Israel next month – which Barak will be a part of.

The trip, he indicated, will almost certainly result in bilateral agreements, one of which will tap into Canada's expertise on natural gas.

Eighteen years ago, Israel discovered it had natural gas deposits off the Mediterranean, but the amount is much greater than first thought, and Israel wants to take full advantage of it, with Canada's help.

"Israel may be the land of milk and honey, but outside, we discovered gas, and we have to learn what to do with that gas," Barak told The CJN. "Canada is a good example for our scientists, our engineers, our regulators – for all who are part of the project.

Bris Ruling Appealed

JERUSALEM — An Israeli mother has appealed to her country's Supreme Court a rabbinical court ruling requiring her to circumcise her son. In her Dec. 18 appeal, the unidentified woman said the rabbis cannot order her to circumcise her son, who is now a year old. Jerusalem's rabbinical court last month upheld a ruling of the Netanya rabbinical court ordering her to have her son circumcised as per her ex-husband's wishes or pay a $142 fine each day until she does. The Netanya court presided over their divorce. The boy wasn't circumcised on the eighth day, as per Jewish custom, due to medical problems. The Jerusalem court said it believes the mother is using the circumcision as leverage in her divorce, but she said it's for ethical reasons.

Disarm Iran: Wiesel

WASHINGTON — Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel urged the U.S. Congress to enhance sanctions on Iran and the Obama administration to demand the "total dismantling" of Iran's nuclear infrastructure. He made the appeal in a full-page New York Times ad Dec. 18. Philanthropist Michael Steinhardt paid for the ad through This World, a group led by Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, an ex-Republican congressional candidate who's been critical of U.S. President Barack Obama's Mideast policies.

Mirvis Seeks Partnership Minyan Ban

Rabbi Ephraim Mirvis

LONDON — British Chief Rabbi Ephraim Mirvis urged Orthodox synagogues to ban partnership minyans, where women can lead services and read Torah.

In a message sent to rabbinic leaders Dec. 18, Rabbi Mirvis said the minyans are "not something that can take place within our synagogues," the Jewish Chronicle reported.

"I know that you are working with our communities to find ways, within the boundaries of Halachah, to make prayer, learning, leadership and involvement more meaningful for men and women alike, and I encourage this wholeheartedly," he wrote. "Some of you, together with members of our communities, have approached me for direction with respect to holding services which take an approach different from our traditional understanding of roles in communal prayer, particularly where women would lead a service including a minyan of men, read from the Torah or receive aliyot."

Britain's umbrella body of Orthodox communities, the United Synagogue, has expressed its concern previously over the phenomenon of partnership minyans.

Last month, the United Synagogue condemned London's Golders Green United Synagogue for allowing women to handle the Torah on Shabbat and holidays. Rabbi Mirvis recently supported women becoming trustees of the United Synagogue and shul lay leaders.

This Toronto hatter is anything but mad

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Stephen Temkin isn't hoping to change the fashion world with his business. He's hoping there's just enough work to keep him busy, but not too much that it becomes overwhelming.

Temkin is the owner of Leon Drexler, a one-man company that makes hats. Leon was his father's first name and Drexler was his mother's maiden name.

These hats aren't your run-of-the-mill head-warmers. They're bespoke beaver-felt hats, made to your exact measurements and customized to your taste.

His profession is a rare one – apart from custom cowboy hatters in the Prairies, he's pretty sure he's the last men's dress hatter in Canada.

"If you're interested in millinery [women's hat-making], there's all kinds of places to learn to do that, but making classic men's dress hats, there's nowhere," he said.

It's only thanks to the generosity of the few men's hat-makers left standing that he was able to learn the techniques.

Temkin began wearing hats 20 years ago, when he bought one purely for functional purposes. It was a panama hat, made of straw and designed to keep the sun off his head.

A little while after that, he moved into felt hats, but he soon discovered the style wasn't particularly popular in stores.

"The ability to buy really nice hats in retail stores has almost disappeared," he said.

That's when he started to make his own hats, which can't be matched in retail stores in terms of the quality of the materials, as well as the precision in the construction, he said.

Temkin uses beaver felt, a material that he called incredibly durable and high quality. It's a big step up from the most popular kind of felt used in men's dress hats these days: wool. Although it's much cheaper than beaver felt, he said it's a far inferior material.

He gets his beaver felt from Tennessee, where he found the only supplier offering the felt in so many colours – 15 options in total, with everything from black, brown and blue to mustard yellow.

All of his ribbon comes from an old stash that he acquired, thanks to a bit of good luck and timing. He heard about a German company that was selling vintage ribbon bit by bit.

Israel's critics often ignore its unique predicament

Because of space restrictions in last week's column about Ari Shavit's book, My Promised Land: The Triumph and Tragedy of Israel, some important information about the balance and complexity that Shavit brings to this work was omitted.

The column concluded on the mention, without adequate description, of Shavit's reference to Israel's "predicament."

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

In fact, this predicament – Israel's requiring peace with the Palestinians, the Arab and wider Islamic world while encountering rejectionism and security threats, especially from a looming nuclear Iran – is spelled out in two late chapters ("Existential Challenges, 2013:" and "By the Sea").

Today, perhaps more than ever, Israel's critics (including some who are friendly but naive and increasingly impatient for progress on the peace front) place the entire onus on Israel while ignoring the responsibilities of other parties for ending the conflict. This attitude ignores the fundamental principle of UN Security Council Resolution 242, which, since 1967, has laid out the bedrock of all Arab-Israeli peace agreements: any Israeli withdrawal from territory taken in the 1967 Six Day War is to occur through negotiations with Arab parties (including, since 1993, the Palestinians) in exchange for peace, recognition, security and an end to conflict.

On certain occasions, when Israel had no reliable partner to negotiate with who could fulfil these required conditions, it took unilateral action, though with varying degrees of negative consequences. In "By the Sea," Shavit reminds us that "Israel's unilateral withdrawals from southern Lebanon [in 2000] and the Gaza Strip [in 2005] cleared the ground for terrorist organizations whose rockets and missiles rattle Israel periodically."

This acknowledgement then leads Shavit to capture Israel's current predicament. "Here's the catch: if Israel does not retreat from the West Bank, it will be politically and morally doomed, but if it does retreat, it might face an Iranian-backed and Islamic-inspired West Bank regime whose missiles could endanger Israel's security. The need to end occupation are greater than ever, but so are the risks."

No matter how morally righteous those judging Israel may feel, without recognition of its predicament, such naysayers do not understand key realities of the Middle East. To be sure, as many fair-minded, informed analysts – both Israeli and foreign – have pointed out, Israel should be, and be seen to be, making sincere efforts to fulfil its commitments under UNSC 242. And, indeed, Israel has done precisely that on numerous occasions through the years including its peace agreements with Egypt, Jordan, and even with the PLO in the early stages of the Oslo process – until Yasser Arafat in 2000 and his successor Mahmoud Abbas in 2008 rejected Israel's offers of Palestinian statehood.

One must wonder at the hypocrisy of those who, whether out of sheer ignorance or bias, turn a blind eye to these basic historical facts. Instead, they obsessively single out Israel among all nations for opprobrium (with boycotts, divestment and sanctions, and other anti-Israel campaigns) while ignoring the legion of states committing egregious human rights violations, next to which Israel's alleged failures or sins pale by comparison. At the very time the Iranian- and Russian-backed Assad regime's brutal three-year assault on much of Syria's population has created the world's greatest humanitarian crisis (more than two million are now refugees, millions more are internally displaced and exposed to severe winter conditions, and nine million of Syria's population of 22 million are in need of aid), the American Studies Association (ASA) decided to single out Israel for a boycott of its academic institutions.

According to a Dec. 16 Times of Israel report, the group's national council president, Curtis Marez, "admitted that the ASA has never before called for a boycott of any other nation's universities and did not dispute that many other countries, including some of those in Israel's region, are considered to have a comparable [sic!] – if not worse – human-rights record than Israel."

Defending the ASA's decision to single out Israel, Marez declared, "One has to start somewhere."

In short, Marez unwittingly admits that it's convenient to be a bully where Israel is concerned.

Let's wait to pass judgment

What do we know for sure about Lev Tahor, the reclusive ultra-Orthodox sect currently at the centre of child abuse allegations spanning two provinces?

Well, we know that founder and leader Shlomo Helbrans's devotees adhere to a particularly strict interpretation of Jewish law, including mandatory full-body and head covering for women. We know the Israeli-born Helbrans once served a two-year prison sentence for kidnapping in the United States and that after his release and deportation back to Israel, he eventually settled with his followers in Ste. Agathe-du-Mont, Que. We also know that last month, the group abruptly picked up and moved to Chatham-Kent, Ont. Finally, we know that on Nov. 27, 14 Lev Tahor children ranging in age from two months to 16 years were slated to be taken into foster care in Quebec.

Guest Editorial

Of course, we have heard much more about what allegedly goes on in the Lev Tahor community, but it doesn't exactly add up – indeed, some of the evidence directly contradicts other evidence. Throw in an overzealous sovereigntist govèrnment hell-bent on ridding Quebec of outward signs of religion and languages other than French, and the result is a confusing mess.

If you're inclined to indict Lev Tahor, you will cite Helbrans' criminal past, the Quebec court order to remove the children from the community and reports that the group lives in squalid conditions. More significantly, there are the allegations of physical and psychological child abuse – including the one-year-old girl found with a bruised face by an Ontario children's services employee that prompted the young girl and her brother, 4, to be taken into foster care on Dec. 12. Former Lev Tahor members and relatives of current members also claim underage girls are forced into marriage.

But there's another side to the story. Lev Tahor's spokesmen and legal advisers insist there is no culture of abuse in the community, that the children are well fed and tended to, and further, that the Quebec order was motivated by the Parti Québécois's language politics (Lev Yahor members speak Yiddish), not any tangible danger posed to the children.

You don't even have to take Lev Tahor's word for it: as The CJN's Janice Arnold has reported, Université de Montréal professor Yakov Rabkin insists he never saw any indications of child abuse during his time studying the community. As for the wounded girl, an Ontario judge noted the bruise could very well have been the result of toddlers romping around (as they tend to do) when he decided to return her and her brother to their family after just five days in foster care.

If all this has left your head spinning, you're not alone. Still, reasonable people can agree on at least one point: child abuse is an odious crime. If Lev Tahor members are perpetrating the horrifying acts they are accused of, they must be stopped. Ontario officials should undertake a thorough investigation, and the greater Jewish community has a responsibility to lend its support in any way it can. But if nothing turns up, Lev Tahor deserves to have what it wants: for everyone to just leave the group alone.

Harper no defender of birds

Although Prime Minister Stephen Harper deserves many of the accolades bestowed upon him at the recent Jewish National Fund Negev dinner for his support of Israel ("Harper announces first trip to Israel," The CJN, Dec. 5), there is one area in which he is not so deserving. The JNF will name the Hula Valley Bird Sanctuary in northern Israel after Harper. Meanwhile, here in Canada, the Harper government is offering not sanctuary, but open season on hunting the mourning dove, the small, gentle bird that symbolizes peace.

This hunt had been banned in Ontario from 1955 until it was re-opened by our federal Conservative government in September 2013.

What ironic hypocrisy!

Federation assists with tuition

Michael Kinrys is quite correct that all families make choices and undertake sacrifices to send their children to Jewish day schools ("Tuition help falls short," The CJN, Dec. 12).

Kinrys may not be aware, however, that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jewish day schools have a unique progressive tuition assistance program for families with low and modest incomes. Federation, through its annual campaign, has been allocating $10 million each year to local Jewish day schools to reduce tuition rates for more than 2,200 children from low- and modest-income families. The innovative iCAP tuition pilot program at Robbins Hebrew Academy, supported by UJA Federation and the Avi Chai Foundation, is a new concept that sets a multi-child discount for families who are otherwise paying full tuition fees.

Federation and the Jewish day schools work very hard to make schools accessible and welcoming. Families interested in ensuring an excellent, vibrant and rewarding Jewish and general studies education for their children are encouraged to contact their local Jewish day school for more information.

More advocates for Israel welcome

I will gladly be the first to welcome new players into Canada's Israel advocacy scene, both on and off campus ("New group's advocacy methods ruffle feathers," The CJN, Nov. 14). But it would be a grave mistake to overlook the significant and continuing contributions of Hillel groups across the country with the assistance of the Centre for Israel and Jewish Affairs (CIJA).

As a non-Jewish advocate for Israel and a former Hillel advocacy staffer in Ottawa, I saw first hand the game-changing impact of CIJA's innovative, agile advocacy strategies in the hands of Hillel students. Campaigns like Size Doesn't Matter and Truth in Context have shifted the campus conversation in Israel's favour over the past few years. In fact, at schools such as Carleton University, where standing up for the Jewish state was once a dangerous endeavour, standing up for Israel has become a popular mainstream position.

CIJA and Hillels "get" campuses because they listen to campuses and develop meaningful relationships with student leaders based on shared values. Their impact continues to grow, marginalizing those who hate and strengthening the righteous.

Sect not targeted for anti-Zionism

Prof. Yakov Rabkin's suggestion that the extremist Lev Tahor cult is being victimized on the grounds of its anti-Zionist ideology is appalling ("Prof who studied radical sect offers perspective," The CJN, Dec. 19).

While youth protection agencies in Quebec and Ontario have ample evidence of the mistreatment of children in the sect, there is absolutely no evidence to suggest that Lev Tahor came under the scrutiny of Canadian authorities because of its anti-Zionist stance. Even the Jerusalem-based anti-Zionist Edah HaChareidis organization has denounced the cult.

With the welfare of innocent children at stake, it is irresponsible for Rabkin to inject his entirely irrelevant anti-Zionist views into this unfolding drama.

Does the community have a future now that he's gone?

South African Jews, apartheid and Mandela

Dov Harris

Imagine yourself, born and bred in South Africa, opening a newspaper one day in 1968 and reading that the police and interior minister, S.L. Muller, had singled out Jewish parents in a warning to keep their offspring from participating in student protests against government policies.

Despite Muller saying his remarks had been misunderstood, the fact is he said it, and being Jewish, it would have sent a shiver down your spine. You would have been wholly oblivious that on Robben Island, South Africa's Alcatraz, a man was in prison who, 24 years later, would be the salvation not only of your community, but of all South Africa.

But even if you knew, would you have waited that long?

For the umpteenth time, you would have been jolted to consider leaving. Having built a decent business or professional practice over a number of years, the thought of selling it to start again in an unfamiliar country, and at your age, would have filled you with untold qualms. Or would you have done as many did until things became intolerable – rationalize the incident away, one of many, as apartheid bit ever deeper into the fabric of society, and ever deeper into your moral conscience?

This scenario was the truth for tens of thousands of South African Jews during the apartheid years, ordinary people wanting no more than to go about their business in the extraordinary loathsome circumstances that apartheid spawned.

Their forbears had left Lithuania, from where most had emigrated decades before, and found in South Africa the one thing that was denied them in der heim, their mother country: opportunity. They seized the chance with gusto and rapidly made a name for themselves in commerce, the professions and culture. "Der goldene medina" the land of gold wasn't a mirage, it was a fact. But it came at a price.

Nelson Mandela

They were buffeted by their consciences and buoyed by their undoubted success in so many fields, but what strikes one vividly is the overriding ambivalence of the established Jewish community's behaviour toward apartheid. What sapped their confidence as well was their steady attrition in numbers through emigration, which crested in the late 1970s and 1980s, and then at a much slower rate continued to this day, reducing the community from about 120,000 to 70,000 people – an approximately 40 per cent drop.

Not all South African Jews were merely reactive to circumstances. Some aspired to change things – radically. Of the 156 accused in the treason trial of 1956, 23 were whites, and more than half of those were Jews. Of the 17 African National Congress activists who appeared at the Rivonia treason trial in 1963, the five whites among them were all Jews. Nor should we forget that the leading defence counsels were Jews, who also happened to be leading members of the Jewish establishment, nor that the chief prosecutor was an Orthodox Jew!

Some leaders of the South African Jewish community have now appropriated those extraordinary whites, Nelson Mandela's comrades, who were willing to lay their lives on the line in their hatred for apartheid as being representative of the Jewish community. But nothing could be further from the truth. Chief Rabbi Warren Goldstein declared after Mandela's passing, "South African Jews have had a long, close and meaningful relationship with former president Nelson Mandela... that involved every stage of his life." In reality, the Jews close to Mandela were individuals who happened to be Jewish. Almost to the person, they had rejected Judaism, and if anything, these friends of Mandela caused much of the community acute discomfort and embarrassment.

On the one hand, then, we had a community that voted overwhelmingly against the National Party – the ruling pro-apartheid party – and strongly supported Helen Suzman, the Jewish MP who won the world's admiration for her fight against apartheid. Yet, on the other hand, Jews were enablers in maintaining the status quo. Practising "apartheid-lite" in their day-to-day encounters with blacks and other non-whites, Jews earned a reputation for being kinder than most other whites (being too friendly socially would have led to awkward questions from the authorities), and the community held together.

Nevertheless, with thriving synagogues, a high standard of living and unabashed support for Israel – even as many were ambivalent about Israel's close military co-operation with apartheid South Africa – the 60 per cent who remained in South Africa awaited a questionable future.

Such was the situation when Mandela took the reins of government. Sweeping aside any rancour he may have felt for their overall behaviour, he reassured South Africa's Jews as a loving father would: "Here in South Africa you can be at your ease. You are fellow Africans. Here we need you." With those words and other meaningful symbolic gestures, ambivalence was laid to rest. At last they could exercise their moral conscience without trepidation.

The ball was now in the community's court. Would it measure up to the challenge of playing a constructive role commensurate with its heritage in a South Africa still recovering from the torments of apartheid?

"Cometh the hour, cometh the man" for the South African Jewish community, and indeed for all South Africans. The advent of Nelson Mandela, of blessed memory, was a miraculous intervention that saved the country from a bloodbath. This man of unfathomable humanity liberated South Africans of their fears and prejudices. All grew taller in his presence.

The community is now enjoying a period of relative calm. Economically, for many, it couldn't be better. How prescient then was the late Lubavitcher Rebbe Menachem Mendel Schneerson when he famously urged South African Jews not to leave. Was he right after all? Did he see beyond a South Africa without a Mandela?

We can only hope so.

Dov Harris is a former South African who worked for the South African Zionist Federation for five years. From 1983 to 2010, he worked for United Israel Appeal of Canada as director of financial resource development. He is now retired.

Boldness and ethics

Sara R. Horowitz
in Toronto

Last month, I wrote about a much-publicized case of get refusal – that is, a man who refuses to grant his wife a get, although the couple have been divorced in civil law for several years. The man was using the exclusively male privilege to issue a get as leverage to attain a financial and custodial settlement that he had been denied in civil court.

What happens to that particular couple is important firstly because their lives matter, as the lives of all people matter. But their story is also important because it may be seen as representative of the many, many other couples in the same situation – or, more accurately, the many, many women in a predicament similar to that of the (ex-)wife of that defunct marriage.

The case was a high-profile one because the woman had taken the extraordinary step of taking on a professional publicist to make her plight known well beyond her personal social and familial circles. She took that unusual step, exposing not only her (ex-) husband, but also herself and her life to public scrutiny in the hope that under the pressure and stress of exposure through the news media, websites, Facebook and blogs, her (ex-)husband would see the wisdom and expedience – if not the rightness – of bringing ritual and halachic closure to the relationship by issuing a get, freeing up his (ex-)wife's life.

This couple's case is unusual, too, in that each of the (former) spouses have yichus, or prestigious lineage, closely related to important and influential rabbis of the 20th century. No doubt, the combination of these close ties to rabbinic authorities combined with the burgeoning public profile of the case prompted a public statement from the Rabbinic Council of America (RCA) late last month condemning the use of get refusal as a weapon in divorce negotiations.

The RCA represents Orthodox rabbis and is linked to the Orthodox Union. The RCA's statement was a welcome comment, enfolding not only halachic but also moral considerations in a realm where those two things have been, sadly, pulled apart. The statement is worth noting for what it says and how it says it, and for what it omits.

Oddly, the RCA takes care to cast its statement in even-handed terms. The statement "strongly condemns the refusal of spouses to participate in the delivery and receipt of a get." This is odd, because there's nothing even-handed in the situation of divorcing men and women. The laws concerning divorce stipulate that a halachic divorce occurs when a man gives and a woman receives a get, so that it is theoretically possible for a man's life, too, to be held hostage.

But an "anchored" husband has ample halachic remedies, while an anchored wife, an agunah, does not. In addition, in terms of Jewish law, the consequences are more dire, more prohibitive for women than men, with undesired implications for any children that might be born to a woman (but not to a man) in a subsequent relationship if the get has not been transacted. Was the RCA afraid of being perceived as being too pro-women?

Get refusal is a women's problem, at least insofar as its prime victims are women. But it must also be recognized as a community problem, throwing off familial and social equilibrium. Most importantly, the enduring radical vulnerability of women is an ethical flaw in the community, all the more so for being promulgated and protected by a narrow reading of halachic sources.

Still – and most importantly – the statement makes clear that a man's absolute power to grant or to withhold a get should not be deployed as a nuclear weapon in divorce proceedings. When a marriage is "functionally over" it should be ritually ended, as well. It calls a denial of a get under such circumstances "an exploitation of the halachic process and a manifestation of domestic abuse."

This is clear and unequivocal language. It gives back to Halachah its ethical base, recalibrating its moral compass. But as the many unresolved cases of women languishing in limbo indicate – women neither really married nor really divorced – Orthodox rabbinic authorities are not yet willing to take the bold steps necessary to ameliorate this halachic imbalance.

Bar/bat mitzvah celebrations belong in shul

Rabbi Dow Marmur
in Toronto

English parlance has turned the noun bar mitzvah – and bat mitzvah – into a transitive verb subject to the rules of English grammar. I'm often told by people that I "bar mitzvahed," or even "bemitzved," them.

The use of such language is indicative of how the traditional ceremony of admission into a worshipping congregation has become a pre-teen Jewish equivalent of the Christian baptism of infants. I know of many born Jews who erroneously assume that they've been removed from the fold because they've never celebrated their 13th birthday with Jewish trappings.

Non-Jews use similar language. Thus, for example, the December issue of Toronto Life carries an article about the Canadian filmmaker David Cronenberg, who tells readers that although he was born Jewish, he "was raised without religion and never bar mitzvahed."

Behind the trivial shift in nomenclature can be discerned a substantial and ominous shift in attitude. Whereas bar and bat mitzvah ceremonies are intended as community events to be celebrated with its members, the decline in the importance of synagogue affiliation has privatized and thus drastically changed the ceremony.

Tradition has been stood on its head in the guise of piety and fidelity to Judaism. Many believe that the ceremony, however trivial and vulgar, is the primary and ultimate manifestation of Jewish identity.

The trend began when bar and bat mitzvahs came to be celebrated in synagogues as private family events by invitation only. Regular worshippers, if they exist, would meet elsewhere on the premises. This is now common practice in many congregations around the world.

Those who choose not to join synagogues often arrange ceremonies, not just parties, in restaurants, hotels, "simchah palaces" or their own homes. Tuition has been reduced to learning by heart a few Bible verses in Hebrew, with scant knowledge of their meaning and little evidence of commitment to Judaism.

People who call themselves rabbis are available to conduct these private happenings according to the wishes of the family and the specifications of the caterer.

The "Zionist" version of the malpractice takes the celebrations to Israel. The Western Wall is hospitable to ceremonies that purport to be Orthodox. Others are relegated to a heap of ruins nearby. Events also take place on Masada, in the desert, on any hilltop with a good view, and sometimes even in synagogues available for hire. Many Israeli rabbis augment their salaries by officiating at such events.

Though it didn't make me very popular when I served congregations in England and Canada, I'd insist on community celebrations in the presence of regular worshippers during Shabbat services. My colleagues and I persevered and were usually supported by lay leaders. This made it possible to teach the young at least the basics of Judaism and, no less important, to instil in them respect for their heritage and its relevance to their own lives.

I urged families to travel to Israel as often as possible, but not in order to keep children away from religious school and from celebrating this milestone in their lives in the synagogue to which they should belong. Travel agents weren't amused.

Failure to celebrate in and with the community both reflects and contributes to the potential disintegration of the synagogue. It's already on the verge of becoming a fee-for-service station where the customer is always right, however eccentric the demands.

"Barkmitzvahs" are a case in point. Dogs are being decked out in something that looks like a kippah and a tallit. Rituals have been invented to reflect the status of the animal as a member of the family. There are no reports as yet of canine clergy.

In this scheme of things, rabbis aren't respected for their learning and their ability to teach but for their talents as masters of ceremonies skilled in providing customer service. Synagogue membership becomes superfluous when you can hire people to do your bidding, however idiosyncratic and contrary to traditional practice, at any location of your choice. Anarchy masquerades as spirituality.

Mercifully, it's not like that everywhere. My family has just celebrated the bat mitzvah of my granddaughter Leone in the same London, England, synagogue where her mother, aunt and uncle marked similar events in their lives. It was a truly communal occasion, memorable for Leone no less than for her family and her congregation.

Similar opportunities are available to all who take Judaism seriously and eschew narcissism in favour of authentic Jewish togetherness.

History and culture included in program

CHAT puts focus on Sephardi experience

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Teacher Jimmy Bitton says he hopes a Grade 10 program he conceived will help raise awareness among his students in Toronto's Ashkenazi-dominated Jewish community about Sephardi history and culture.

Grade 10 students at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Kimel Family Education Centre in Vaughan, where Bitton is the history department head, will take part in a field trip on Jan. 8 that's meant to highlight the fact that the Sephardi experience is part of the larger Jewish experience.

"The program has two functions – one is curricular and one is to complement the philosophy of the school," said Bitton, a Sephardi Jew.

He added that TanenbaumCHAT values "a transmission and appreciation of Jewish religious and cultural traditions," and is "welcoming of students and families of diverse Jewish traditions. In order to be welcoming, we have to represent these communities."

The field trip consists of tours of two synagogues – Petah Tikvah Anshe Castilla Congregation, which was Ontario's first Sephardi synagogue, founded in 1958, and the Sephardic Kehila Centre (SKC), which is architecturally modelled after a Spanish synagogue.

"There, they will be greeted by members of the community and given lectures on the community, Sephardic history, giving them a taste of liturgy, giving them a taste of the architecture, to see that Jews lived in the Muslim world, the Arab world and developed a unique culture, [in the same way] as the Ashkenazim developed in Europe," Bitton said.

Among the community leaders the students will hear from are Rabbi Amram Assayag, SKC's chief rabbi; Max Benaim, former SKC and Petah Tikvah president; and Yehuda Azoulay, the founder of the Sephardic Legacy Series Institute, an organization that provides English-speaking Sephardim with the resources to explore their rich culture and history.

After the field trip to the two synagogues, the students will come back to the school for a Sephardi-themed festival "that will include music, henna, couscous and things like that."

Although the trip is scheduled for Jan. 8, the program will run for the entire week.

Jimmy Bitton

"Sephardi music will be played through the PA during the morning and lunch periods. The library will display Sephardi books, and so on," he said.

"Beyond that, the classroom will be a place where we can integrate and pull together what we've done with the curriculum, so the students see that connection and solidify the point... We are learning about Jews in the Muslim world and Muslim Spain... and how a culture develops from that symbiosis that existed between Jews and Arabs."

Bitton said that although there are no figures regarding the number of Sephardi Jews at the school, "a significant number of my students definitely are."

But the program is not intended primarily for the Sephardi students.

"Because we live in – in terms of demographics – an Ashkenazi-dominated society, they tend not to hear about these kinds of things," he said.

The program is "intended for everyone else. That's really the target audience from my perspective. It's to bring this world that they may not know to them."

As a member of the Sephardi community, Bitton said it was important for him to have "some representation for the Sephardic community at the school and also to make sure that the rest of the community understands that this is part and parcel of the Jewish experience.

"Just as lox and cream cheese may be considered Jewish food, by the same token, there are other foods from the Sephardic community that are Jewish food," he said.

"I think at our school, there is definitely a representation of Sephardi history, but I think it needs to be highlighted to a greater extent."

Group aims to change image of Orthodox lifestyle

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Allison Josephs, founder of Jew in the City, will be in Toronto next month to talk about the organization's mission to change people's misconceptions about Orthodox Jews.

As headline speaker for the Mommy Talks seminar titled "Absolutely on Purpose," to be held Jan. 12 at the Schwartz Reisman Centre in Vaughan, Josephs will tell her story about becoming an observant Jew, about her work to improve the Orthodox community's image, and how she came to be actor Mayim Bialik's Torah partner.

Josephs, a 33-year-old wife and mother of four who lives just outside of New York City, said her story begins when she was an eight-year-old girl, living a charmed life.

"I was raised in this very happy, nice, upper-middle-class secular American Jewish family… If you want to picture an idyllic life, thank God, that's what I had."

In a telephone interview with The CJN, she talked about the day her life as she knew it changed, when she learned that a girl in her school was murdered by her father.

"This bubble of stability and happiness that my parents had raised me in… it burst, it shattered, and I started having these big questions like, 'How will I meet my end? What will happen when I'm gone and what will become of me when I leave this world?'"

Allison Josephs

As a teen, Josephs was enrolled at a Jewish high school where she connected with one of her modern Orthodox teachers.

"I had been raised to think that Orthodox Jews were all a bunch of extremists, fanatics, backwards women subjugators, science-deniers, and here this guy was… he was educated, he was so good to his wife, he was so similar to me, but he was living with this purpose, with this spirituality, and everything he did was infused with meaning."

Inspired by him, she slowly began to embrace the Orthodox culture. "But I got a reaction. [People said,] 'Don't become one of them. They'll make you have a dozen children, they'll subjugate you, you'll have to dress frumpy.'"

Josephs recalled meeting with a young journalist who wanted to learn more about the Orthodox community.

"Everything she was expecting to see, like a traditionally decorated apartment – our apartment had mustard-coloured walls and funky furniture – and she expected me to be frumpy and meek, and everything she thought about what an Orthodox woman was, I was the exact opposite," she said.

"When she left my apartment, I said to my husband, 'We have the worst PR, the worst image…' Social media was coming onto the scene and so I realized that I wanted to start a worldwide image campaign… and show a real life person that goes beyond the stereotypes."

In 2007, Josephs founded Jew in the City, an organization that started as a one-woman show, until people started reaching out to help her in her quest to rectify the misrepresentations of Orthodox Judaism in the media.

Since then, Jew in the City has grown to include a team of a dozen volunteers, and Josephs was named one of National Jewish Outreach Program's Top Ten Jewish Influencers in 2012 and was one of the Jewish Week's 36 under 36 in 2013.

Josephs also does corporate cultural diversity training to help service providers better understand their Orthodox and chassidic clientele.

At the Mommy Talks seminar, Josephs said she also plans to talk about her work with Partners in Torah, "which sets up Torah learning over the phone between a person with a stronger Jewish background and somewhat of a beginner," work that led to her developing a relationship with Big Bang Theory star Mayim Bialik.

"One night… I just thought, 'Whatever happened to [a television character played by Bialik named] Blossom?'" she said, adding that she was a fan of the show as a child.

"I Googled her and I saw that she's become more interested in Judaism and minoring in Judaic studies and Hebrew, and I was like, 'Oh, Mayim Bialik probably wants a partner in Torah.'"

She said she tried tracking her down, but was unsuccessful. "Four years later, on her own, she came to Partners in Torah and we got matched."

She said if she ever finds herself feeling disconnected or doubtful about her purpose, "I remind myself of that story."

Among the other speakers at the seminar are Julie Cole, co-founding vice-president of Mabel's Labels; Marci Warhaft-Nadler, founder of Fit vs. Fiction and Sarah Zeldman, an "e-marketing maven" who specializes in helping promote businesses.

Most of Temkin's sales come from the U.S.

He sent the firm a message, saying he was interested, but it took about a year and the help of a friend in Germany to finally get the firm to respond.

When he finally reached the company, he was thrilled to hear it was trying to get rid of its entire stock. Hearing that he was interested in taking the lot, it offered him a price he couldn't refuse.

That's the kind of process that Temkin goes through each time he buy materials and equipment. Since he does everything the old-fashioned way, he has to track down the tools using antique auctions, eBay and anywhere else he can get his hands on them.

Every tool in his studio that isn't actually vintage is modelled after an old-style version of one.

The vintage machines sit in his basement and attic studios in his Toronto home, where he also has a huge collection of wooden hat blockers and a range of mechanical devices, each to perform a different step in the hat-making process.

Each hat takes him six to 10 hours over many days to make. Since everything is made to exact measurements, it takes a lot of skill and care – it took Temkin two years from the time he started making them to the point where he felt confident enough to start charging money for them.

Hat prices start at $425, and at the time of his interview with The CJN, he had a waiting list 10 to 12 weeks long.

Most of his sales come from the United States, with people sending their head measurements using a detailed guide from his website. Each hat's sweatband is personalized either with the buyer's initials, a name, or even a quote. One hat that he was working on read: "A head only a hat could love," at the request of the customer.

Temkin knows that these fancy hats aren't particularly popular in the fashion world. They remain popular with certain groups and certain cultures.

Despite the fact his hats are a niche product, Temkin isn't concerned. In the end, it's really about being functional and keeping your head comfortable, he said.

If you're going outside when it's very hot out, a straw hat would keep your head cool, he explained. If it's very cold out, a warm ear-covering toque is best. But for everything in between, a felt hat is perfect.

And for Temkin especially, it's an absolute must when going outside. "It's as normal as putting on my coat," he said.

'98% will test negative, but why not test everyone?'

Women should be tested for cancer gene: expert

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

All Ontario Jewish women should have the opportunity to be tested for BRCA1 and BRCA2 mutations, says Dr. Steven Narod, a world leader in the field of breast and ovarian cancer genetics.

"Ninety-eight per cent will test negative, but why not test everyone?" he asked at a panel discussion earlier this month titled "The ABCs of BRCA: Everything you Ever Wanted to Know about Cancer and the 'Jewish Gene' But Were Afraid to Ask," presented by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Also on the panel, held at Beth Tzedec Congregation, was Dr. Ellen Warner, a medical oncologist at the Odette Cancer Centre at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre, where her practice and research are devoted to breast cancer, and Dr. Andrea Eisen, head of the Familial Cancer Program at Sunnybrook and co-chair of the Cancer Care Ontario Breast Site Group. The moderator was Libby Znaimer, a journalist specializing in health, arts and lifestyle issues, and a breast and pancreatic cancer survivor.

Women who have harmful mutations in either the BRCA1 or BRCA2 genes – which are more common in certain ethnic groups such as families of Ashkenazi Jewish descent – are more likely to develop breast cancer at a younger age than the general population and are at a much greater risk of developing ovarian cancer.

If a parent carries a BRCA1 or BRCA2 mutation, there's a 50 per cent chance of passing it on to a child.

But even though a woman may have relatives who have had breast cancer, less than one in 10 breast cancers are caused by an inherited gene mutation.

A fact sheet handed out by Willow Breast Cancer Support Canada said that a woman who has a history of breast cancer in her family may want to talk to a genetic counsellor who can assess her personal and family medical history to determine her risk for developing cancer. The counsellor can also discuss options available to reduce the cancer risk and provide information to help her make a decision about whether or not to have genetic testing.

Eisen said that a woman should suspect a possible gene mutation if there are multiple cases of breast or ovarian cancer in her family, if there is cancer in both her breasts, or if there is male breast cancer in the family. As well, "being Ashkenazi is one of the strongest risk factors."

Narod said studies have found that 14 per cent of ovarian cancer cases are due to genetics, so "until we offer [the test] to everyone, we will not make the impact we want to make on the risk of cancer. With a proactive program, we could reduce the cancer by up to 40 per cent."

He said there will always be people who say that there should not be universal testing.

Narod, who headed a 2010 study on familial cancer in Jewish women at Women's College Hospital, in which 7,000 women participated, said that if there is a downside to being tested, it's that women may experience anxiety, "but in the long term, [that is not harmful]. About 20 per cent of the women who tested positive [in the study] suffered some anxiety, and in five per cent of those, it was severe."

Warner said that if a woman does test positive, "she should immediately take a deep breath and relax. She's probably had the gene for 30 or 40 years and does not need to run out and do body-altering surgery. There are many strategies for lowering the risk of developing or dying of cancer in the future."

She said that the birth control pill lowers the risk of ovarian cancer, and a woman can have her ovaries and fallopian tubes removed. "That can be done quite simply, and there is time to complete your family before it is done."

She said that women who test positive should have a mammogram and MRI every year by age 30. "Women think they have to rush out and take off their breasts."

It is important, however, that women who are tested understand the implications. "Some people can't cope with uncertainty, and we have to be careful that they know what they're getting into."

Sharon Baltman

Toronto doctor treats patients by listening

Carolyn Blackman
Staff Reporter

Toronto physician Sharon Baltman, 66, treats her patients by listening.

Author of the memoir Escape from the Bedside, Baltman takes us on the journey of her decision to go to medical school until she ultimately gave up being a general practitioner so she would have more time for her patients.

Currently maintaining her two-day-a-week psychotherapy practice, Baltman, who is divorced with one daughter, told The CJN that she escaped "from the ivory tower of the hospital into private psychotherapy practice in order to listen closely to my patients, and hear their stories."

She said that when she first announced her plans to enter pre-med at University of Toronto, she was told she'd never be a doctor, "because of her long painted fingernails, her big breasts, and the 'three Ms – marriage, motherhood and medicine.'"

She persevered, however, and went into emergency medicine, then family practice.

"I left emergency medicine because I didn't have enough time for my patients. I barely met [them] and rarely saw them a second time."

She switched to a general practice, she said, "so I would have longer-term connections, but ran out of time trying to deal with both the physical and emotional needs [of the patients.]

"In order to hear more about people's lives, and what made them tick, I finally chose full-time psychotherapy work so I could have time to listen to their tales in a quiet, un-rushed venue. I chose not to be a psychiatrist, because I did not want to go through another residency."

While she started with classic Freudian analytic work, she said, she later moved to cognitive behavioural therapy, "to teach patients to deal with the here and now in a concrete way – to reframe their thoughts more positively, and to find the grey zone between the black and white extremes of life."

It's only in the last 10 years, Baltman said, that medical schools have trained doctors in narrative medicine, a method whereby physicians do not merely treat medical problems, but take into account the specific psychological and personal history of the patient.

"It is a way of listening closely to patients' stories about their illness. Instead of asking 'where is your pain,' narrative medicine has physicians asking patients to tell them what they need to know about them. By telling us a story, we get a lot more information about [our patients] and their illness."

For example, she said, if someone comes in complaining of chest pains, "a doctor typically asks where, for how long, and if they've had it before. With narrative medicine, the doctor keeps interrogating until they get the whole story. Maybe it's stress-related, maybe it happens after a certain activity. They try to dig into the story."

Patient care is much better, said Baltman, if physicians know everything that is going on. "On the [other hand], patients feel heard. An important piece of narrative medicine is that everyone is humanized."

She said that many doctors have been practising narrative medicine for years, "but now it is an important part of medical school curriculum. When students learn about eye disease, they may also read a story about someone losing their vision so students get an idea of what the patient is going through. They learn about a patient's experience by reading about them."

Baltman said that in retrospect, her career was headed to her current practice from the beginning. "My career took me here because I wanted to listen. Now I have the opportunity to talk to my patients."

Court returns two Lev Tahor sect children to parents

CJN Staff

MONTREAL — Two young children from the controversial Lev Tahor chassidic sect who were placed in protective custody by Ontario authorities were returned to their parents on Dec. 17 with several conditions.

The children, aged one and four years, were taken from one family by Chatham-Kent Children's Services (CKCS) on Dec. 12, after a bruise was discovered on the face the year-old girl.

Ontario Court Judge Stephen Fuerth approved reuniting them with their families after the parents agreed to scheduled and unannounced visits by child protection workers, not to use "physical discipline," and not to leave the Chatham-Kent area. The sect settled there last month after leaving Ste. Agathe des Monts, Que., where the community of about 250 had lived for more than a decade.

It was further agreed that one of the parents will get help for mental health issues.

Lev Tahor's lawyer Chris Knowles said the children were taken without warrants after a CKCS investigation. No criminal files were opened.

Fuerth said the bruise was "relatively minor," adding that toddlers often get bumps of this kind.

However, he added, "Any unexplained injury can be cause for concern." The mother had said the mark was caused by the child playing with a marker, but a medical exam confirmed that it was a bruise.

The little girl was found to be otherwise healthy and workers reported that the mother appeared to be "at ease with her children."

Knowles said the parents agreed to the conditions not because they admitted to doing anything wrong, but because they wanted their kids back.

The two are not among the 14 children that a Quebec youth court judge ordered on Nov. 27 removed from their two families and placed into foster care.

The community left Ste. Agathe a week before those two families were to appear at a youth protection hearing into allegations of abuse and neglect.

Those children and their parents remain in Chatham-Kent, where Lev Tahor wants to settle.

On Dec. 4, CKCS sought a warrant to seize the 14 children subject to the Quebec court order, which was denied by an Ontario justice of the peace.

An appeal of that refusal was scheduled to be heard on Dec. 23.

The sect's leader and founder, Israeli-born self-styled rabbi Shlomo Helbrans, settled his followers in Ste. Agathe in 2001 from Israel, where Helbrans had been deported from the United States after serving a jail term for the second-degree kidnapping of a child.

Numerous allegations of neglect and abuse of children, as well as women, have been made over the years, but no charges were ever laid. There have been accounts that Helbrans exerts tyrannical control over his followers.

The women wear headscarves and long dark cloaks, which has led some to dub the group the "Jewish Taliban."

The Times of Israel reported that dozens of family members and supporters held a protest outside the Canadian embassy in Tel Aviv on Oct. 14 to raise awareness of the danger they believe their relatives are in by staying with Lev Tahor.

Silver takes helm of women's coalition

MONTREAL — Vivianne Silver believes she's well equipped to realize her vision of building bridges between Montreal women of different backgrounds.

Silver is the new president of the Montreal Council of Women (MCW), a 120-year-old umbrella organization with 70 affiliated groups, as well as individual members, representing a total membership of 30,000.

She's only the third Jewish president – an elected position – in its history and hopes to contribute to a better understanding of Judaism and the community during her two-year term.

Four Jewish groups are affiliated with the MCW, and Silver is working on increasing that: the Jewish General Hospital Auxiliary, Montreal Hadassah-WIZO, Act to End Violence Against Women, Balfour chapter (formerly Jewish Women International of Canada), and the Book Lovers' Forum of Temple Emanu-El-Beth Sholom.

Role model for faith-based schools

Gay-straight club wins human rights award

Myron Love
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — On Dec. 10, International Human Rights Day, representatives of the Gray Academy of Jewish Education Student Gay Straight Alliance group proudly approached the podium at the Union Centre in Winnipeg to accept the Sybil Shack Human Rights Youth award for 2013.

The annual award recognizes the work of a person or group of people under 25 years old who have had an impact on the advancement of human rights. It's named for the late Sybil Shack, a life-long Jewish educator and administrator in the public school system and a leading human rights advocate, and presented jointly each year by the Manitoba Association for Rights and Liberties, the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the Manitoba Human Rights Commission.

"It was a bit of a surprise to have our students presented with this award," said Gray Academy English teacher Barbera Buffie. "It was also a triumphal moment. The award indicates that our student-led gay-straight alliance [GSA] is having an impact and that others are taking notice."

Head of school Rory Paul added that the awards evening was well attended by members of the two-year-old GSA, along with their families and teachers.

"This is something for all of our students to celebrate," he said.

Gray Academy Hebrew and Judaic studies department head Anat Ekhoiz said that among the positive responses have been emails and tweets from former students expressing pride in the school.

GSA groups have been accepted in the Winnipeg school system for some time, Buffie said, but faith-based schools, however, are another matter.

School vice-principal Lori Binder noted that the Gray Academy's GSA group has become a role model for other faith-based schools.

She noted that while the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and the Gann Academy near Boston also have GSA groups, there's only one other faith-based school in Manitoba with a GSA group.

Gray Academy high school English and debating teacher Andrew Kaplan said there had been interest on the part of students in having a GSA at the school for a number of years.

"It's a scary step to take," Kaplan said. "While the administration and staff are fully supportive, the feeling was that this had to be student-initiated."

He said some students approached the administration two years ago about starting a GSA group.

"We spoke to the student body about being a school where gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered students can feel safe," he said "The first meeting was very well attended."

The group meets weekly over lunchtime and plans activities that include outreach to the larger student body.

"Last year, some of our students attended a safe school leadership conference where they met with representatives from other schools, " Ekhoiz said.

Some of the students also attended the Rainbow Resource Centre's third annual Manitoba GSA Conference on Nov. 25.

"Our GSA group has had its successes," Ekhoiz said, "but it is still a challenge. There is still a stigma associated with the group that we are all working to overcome. We believe that the Sybil Shack Award will help fight that stigma."

Montrealer wins insurance battle over Russian anti-gay law

David Brody

MONTREAL — An openly gay Jewish Montrealer has won a dispute with his insurance company and been reimbursed for cancelling a trip to Russia out of fear for his security because of the country's anti-gay law.

David Brody, a longtime Congregation Shaar Hashomayim member and onetime LGBT activist, has been promised in writing the full refund of his claim against La Capitale Insurance and Financial Services Inc., but only after threatening to go to court.

"I am particularly pleased that the insurance company finally recognized my legitimate concerns for my well-being and freedom," Brody said. "I see its decision to reimburse me as a direct validation of my civil rights as a gay Jewish man facing an exceptionally discriminatory law in a foreign land I wanted to visit."

In early June, Brody booked a flight with Lufthansa from Montreal to Moscow for October and arranged a land tour in Russia during his planned 10 days there. This was a personal trip, his first to the country, and primarily to visit a nephew working at the Israeli embassy.

On June 30, Russian President Vladimir Putin signed into law a bill banning the "propaganda of non-traditional sexual relations to minors," commonly referred to in the western media as "the anti-gay law."

As soon as he heard about it, Brody decided to cancel his trip, as the law also applies to foreigners, who can be detained, arrested, fined or deported.

"All they had to do is Google my name to find out I wrote the novel Mourning and Celebration. It scared me, because this could absolutely be interpreted as gay literature. I could have been arrested on the spot and thrown in jail," said Brody, who is over 70.

Published in 2009, the novel imagines the clandestine love affair between two young Orthodox Jewish men in a 19th-century Polish shtetl.

In August, Brody filed a claim with La Capitale for $1,450 – $1,000 for the land arrangements, plus a $450 penalty Lufthansa charged him for cancelling his round trip.

Later that month, the insurance company responded that he was ineligible for reimbursement, because the federal government had not at the time issued a notice advising against Canadians travelling to Russia, as stipulated in the policy, which Brody has held since 2006.

Ottawa had only issued a "caution" about the new law.

Brody, assisted by the Centre for Research-Action on Race Relations (CRARR), followed up with a legal demand letter in November, stating, "I cannot accept your denial of my claim, which is tantamount to discrimination against your LGBT clientele and a violation of my right to the integrity and security of the person."

He also identified himself as Jewish.

"This might have been another grounds to persecute me," said Brody, who was a founder of the now-disbanded Montreal Jewish gay group Yahkdav.

If he had gone to court, the case would have been the first Canadian civil rights case related to the new Russian law.

In a Dec. 9 letter, signed by Martine Powell, director of health care benefits group insurance, La Capitale relented, stating that "given the circumstances motivating your decision not to travel to [Russia], we are approving your claim on an exceptional basis."

Brody added that, while Canada had not issued a travel advisory, Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird in the House of Commons warned Canadians about going to Russia.

Brody said he has no desire to go to Russia anymore. "Polls have shown that over 60 per cent of the population supports this homophobic law. I wouldn't give them the money."

Matthew Chung, one of the two McGill University law students working with CRARR who helped Brody, said, "We were prepared from the start to initiate judicial proceedings, arguing that the company's action constituted an indirect form of discrimination against LGBT travellers to Russia.

"Still, we are entirely satisfied with the outcome of the case. Mr. Brody has received the equal treatment and justice he deserved."

First ambassadorship for Barak

"We would also like to see more Canadian investors in this field, so gas energy will be a very high priority."

Barak – whom family and friends call Rafi – has hit the ground running since arriving in Canada on Nov. 24 to succeed Miriam Ziv.

Almost right off the plane, he handled a conference call on Iran, received his diplomatic credentials from Gov. Gen. David Johnston, attended the Jewish National Fund's Negev Dinner in Toronto honouring Harper, and looked for Canadian winter coats for himself and his wife, Miriam.

This is the first ambassadorship for the Uruguayan-born Barak, who speaks several languages fluently, comes across as genial and informal to a fault, and has worked for Israel's Foreign Ministry for 37 years.

His career has included senior postings in cities as disparate as Lima, Paris, Brussels and Washington, D.C. His position before coming to Canada was as deputy minister of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs.

Barak was also an important figure in Israeli-Palestinian negotiations.

An ardent Zionist his entire life, Barak made aliyah on his own at age 18 and joined the ministry at age 26 after working as a tourist guide when he was a student – he earned an MA in political science from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

More than once during his diplomatic career, Barak was the "No. 2" man at an embassy, "doing everything the ambassador doesn't want to do," he said with a laugh, "but it's a profession where you learn through your own experience... on-the-job training."

The hardest part of the job? "Having limited time and plenty of things to do," Barak answered immediately.

In Washington between 2000 and 2005, Barak, as the No. 2 man, was at the heart of the embassy action, in a period that included 9/11 and the second intifadah.

"[Then-]prime minister [Ariel] Sharon came to visit us eight times during my term, and all eight times, he had to cut his visit short because of some kind of attack that made him go back to Israel," Barak recalled.

He also remembered that during his posting there, he and his wife got to visit Canada to see some of the tourist sites.

"This is part of the excitement of starting something new," Barak said about being an ambassador now. "Each and every time, you have to prove yourself again. I start from scratch, and at the end, I know exactly if I did it very well and what the accomplishments were."

Barak plans to make full use of the fact that Canada is one of Israel's staunchest allies. He wants to see trade expand considerably from today's level of $1.3 billion, improve on the Free Trade Agreement signed in 1996, and work more collaboratively on innovation and security issues, as well as on scientific research, Internet technology and biotechnology.

'This is part of the excitement of starting something new'

"Hopefully, [these] will be announced during the visit of Mr. Harper," Barak said.

On the peace process, Barak was encouraged that negotiations are still going on, and while everything is open for discussion, "at the end of the day, this will be a political decision."

He said any deal has to include recognition of Israel as a "Jewish state... because that is what we are."

Even if the basic issues have not changed over the last decades, "like an old marriage with no new surprises... that does not imply that there are not difficult choices."

Barak said Israel is grateful for Canada's skepticism over the recent interim agreement with Iran on nuclear arms development.

"We are skeptical because, over the years, Iran has not stopped their intentions of having a nuclear weapon," Barak said.

Despite Iran's "charm offensive" under President Hassan Rouhani, the "same ayatollahs" are running the show, and, by not going along with deal, Canada is showing its ability to not do the "politically correct" thing.

Canada understands that "what is right is right," Barak said.

Barak said he plans to meet with Jewish Canadians coast to coast, work "hand-in-hand" with them and celebrate the "rich Jewish life of this country."

He will also thank them for their wide co-operation with many institutions in Israel.

"If you go from north to south in Israel, there's not one place where I don't see a Canadian flag."

Exhibit tells story of the SS St. Louis

Joel Jacobson
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — A display currently at the Museum of Industry in Stellarton, N.S., tells the sad tale of the SS St. Louis and its ill-fated passengers almost 75 years ago.

The story of how 907 potential immigrants seeking refuge from Nazi persecution in Germany and Europe were turned away by several North American countries, including their last hope, Canada, still causes shame among Canadians.

"It's a story that should be told," Debra McNabb, the museum's director, said as the display was seen by dozens of people during a run that will end Jan. 31, 2014. "It's the job of a museum not to censor history. We must not just tell the stories we're comfortable with hearing. We must tell both the light and the dark."

The Ship of Fate exhibit includes a metre-long model of the St. Louis and 11 traditional display panels that tell the little-known story of the voyage. Visitors can use interactive kiosks to read scanned documents associated with the ship.

The panels show photos of German-Jewish families holding one another and smiling as the luxury liner turns away from a nation descending into hate and sails off across the Atlantic. The panels also tell how the ship was turned away by governments in Cuba, some Caribbean nations and the United States prior to attempting to land in Halifax. It was forced to return to Antwerp, Belgium, and the passengers found refuge in the Netherlands, Belgium and France, which became overrun by the Nazis, as well as Great Britain. When the Nazi machine moved into those countries months later, 255 were swept up and exterminated in the concentration camps.

The panels were developed a decade ago by the Maritime Museum of the Atlantic in Halifax. With the help of the Atlantic Jewish Council, which arranged for funding for a graphic designer and researchers, the display was officially opened in 2009.

Even then, there was interest in a travelling exhibit, said Gerry Lunn, the museum's curator of exhibitions. The panels have since visited Pier 21 in Halifax; County Museum in Yarmouth, N.S., and the Confederation Centre in Charlottetown. A website is being developed to give the story of the St. Louis international exposure.

"The exhibit now can go to any synagogue, community centre or town hall – anywhere – if we can obtain funding to enable it to travel," Lunn said.

In their research for the exhibit, Lunn said Maritime Museum staff unearthed Canadian prime minister William Lyon Mackenzie King's correspondence with his then-immigration minister Frederick Blair.

In 1939, King was ready to admit the Jewish immigrants until his immigration chief, Blair, known for his hatred of Jews, sent King a secret memo explaining that the passengers didn't qualify under immigration laws. The oft-quoted phrase "None is too many" has been attributed to Blair. It's a story many have said should still haunt Canadians today.

With the St. Louis heading back toward Europe, but still within reach of Halifax, University of Toronto history professor George Wrong led a group of prominent clergy and academics in petitioning King to grant sanctuary to the refugees on humanitarian grounds.

King, who was travelling in the United States at the time, wrote to Blair, advising that he "strongly consider this request."

But Blair, whose race-based immigration policies saw Canada accept only 5,000 Jewish immigrants (compared to 200,000 by the United States) during the 1930s and '40s, fought the move.

"Much to our shame, King, who had many Jewish friends, didn't force the matter," Lunn said.

In 2009, a survivor of the ship, Lisa Avedon attended the 70th anniversary Halifax commemoration of the events. She was only four years old in 1939, but had vivid memories of her first reception in North America as a passenger on the SS St. Louis.

"There are a few pieces I remember today," the Toronto woman said at the time. "I know I was seasick most of the trip and saw only my stateroom and a bit of the deck. But I'll never forget sitting in Havana harbour, where we were refused admittance at the last minute after being granted visas weeks before."

Lisa said her uncle, living in New Jersey at the time, came to meet Lisa and her family and was sitting in a boat beside the ship. "I called to him, 'Take me with you,' and I was ready to jump off the deck."

Israel studies minor to be offered at Concordia

Janice Arnold
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For the first time, undergraduate students at a Canadian university will be able to earn a minor in Israel studies at Concordia University.

Concordia's senate has just approved the program, which will be offered through the Azrieli Institute of Israel Studies, which was established in June 2011.

The program will be launched next fall, but new courses under development are expected to begin in January 2015, said the institute's co-director Csaba Nikolenyi.

While the senate vote was unanimous, it took two years to get the support of all levels of the university hierarchy, he said.

It's a major advancement for the institute, which was established with a $5-million donation from the Azrieli Foundation.

Until now, the institute's work has been to support academically and financially, graduate and post-graduate students doing research related to Israel as part of their studies in a variety of disciplines, such as political science, history, sociology, religion or literature. Institute funding has even assisted one fine arts student.

It has no professors or courses of its own. Nikolenyi, who is chair of the political science department, is co-director with Norma Joseph, an associate professor of religion.

Norma Joseph and Csaba Nikolenyi

Undergraduate courses being developed will range from the government of Israel to introductory Hebrew and Arabic.

In its short history, the institute has already attracted two students from Israel: Alon Burnstein, the first Israeli political science PhD candidate at Concordia, and Liora Norwich, who was granted a post-doctoral fellowship, said Nikolenyi.

Concordia, along with University of Toronto and the University of Calgary, are the only three universities in Canada that offers Israel studies.

The institute is unique, said Nikolenyi, as it is a research centre with the goal of fostering an environment for scholarship on Israel in all its dimensions.

It has no endowed chair in Israel studies as is the case at the other two universities (in either the political science or history departments), and that was intentional, he said.

Rather, the institute looks forward to the day when it has the means to install a visiting professor in a well established academic milieu specifically for Israel studies, Nikolenyi said.

This institute differs from most others in the field anywhere in that it is not limited to study of the modern state or the pre-state yishuv or Zionist movement, he said.

At Concordia, students can, for example, pursue interests in ancient Judaism because the religion department is strong in Judaic studies. Archeology is not offered at the university, but a course of study along that line might be arranged through the classics department, he said.

Israel studies has been a rapidly growing field in the past decade, he said, and there are now more than 40 such programs around the world today, even in such unlikely places as Saudi Arabia and Indonesia.

The institute, which is located in the former Canadian Jewish Congress headquarters' Samuel Bronfman building, also recently received another vote of confidence: it will host the annual conference of the Association of Israel Studies in 2015.

This conference, which alternates between North America and Israel, will bring anywhere from 500 to 700 of the top scholars in the field to Concordia's downtown campus for four days in May of that year.

The daylong inaugural conference in November saw papers delivered by invited scholars from Concordia and McGill University, as well as the United States, England and Israel. The program was divided into sections on politics, culture, ethnicity and religion, which reflect the institute's multidisciplinary approach.

Immigration minister defends policy on health benefits

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Christopher Alexander

A few weeks ago, when Liberal Party leader Justin Trudeau addressed the congregation at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue as part of its Visions for Canada series, he suggested a question should be posed to Chris Alexander, the next in line in the shul's Q&A program. Ask him to justify the government's decision to deprive refugee applicants of health-care benefits, he suggested.

Well, that's just what happened last week when Rabbi Jarrod Grover asked Alexander, minister of citizenship and immigration, to explain the government's thinking as it tried to balance the needs and commitments to Canadians with the policy of protecting foreigners in Canada.

The government will never agree to provide bogus refugee claimants health benefits that go beyond those provided Canadians, Alexander said.

Until the federal government instituted reforms, Canadian taxpayers were paying for a lot of things Canadians themselves were not getting – something for which there was no public support. Reforms to health care that had been doled out to refugee claimants have saved taxpayers $200 million over five years, he said.

"We say, number 1, that bogus refugee claimants should never have access to health care" but should be in the same position as visitors to Canada, adding emergency hospital care will continue to be provided.

(One day before Alexander spoke, lawyers for refugee advocacy groups asked a Federal Court judge to declare unconstitutional government cuts to refugee health care.)

While reforms to the system were being implemented, Canada continued to be generous in terms of its admission policy, coming behind only the United States among all countries admitting refugee applicants. "It's a record we are proud of that never gets reported," Alexander said.

Immigration issues were one area addressed by Alexander, but the question and answer session led off by Rabbi Grover included queries about Iran, Israel, veterans affairs, unemployment, Pakistan and the new Canadian economy.

This government's policy on Israel reflects the convictions of the top leadership group of the Conservative Party and of the entire government caucus, Alexander said. "It is a deeply held conviction of our entire caucus and our entire party," said Alexander, who greeted the audience with the Hebrew phrase, "erev tov chaverim" (good evening friends).

Since those pro-Israel views were first expressed seven years ago, more and more Canadians have come to "recognize the merits of our position...The Arab spring shows how malign the ideologies are in the region" and how difficult it is to transform to democracies, he said.

Israel remains a democracy and since the 9/11 attacks, North Americans have been reminded of the importance of supporting true friends and allies, "with whom we can have truly open conversations."

Questioned about Iran's nuclear program, Alexander said despite the interim agreement between the P5+1 countries and the Islamic nation, Canada would not relax its sanctions.

"We'll judge Iran by its actions," he said.

Iran remains a "soft" totalitarian state that engenders fear among its citizens. "It is a paranoid state" which under its previous president, Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, "gave voice to unprecedented anti-Semitism."

Iran's policy is geared to acquiring nuclear weapons. "We'd like for Iran to abandon those strategic objectives but we've seen nothing to suggest it," he said.

Alexander, who entered politics after serving in the Canadian Foreign Service, was named Canada's ambassador to Afghanistan in 2003 and two years later served as deputy special representative of the UN Assistance Mission to Afghanistan.

He said Pakistan seeks regional dominance and employs terrorism as a proxy to expand its power. Asked whether that should make Canada wary of permitting immigration from that country, Alexander pointed out that the top three sources for immigration remain the Philippines, China and India. Pakistan is among the top 10 sources of immigrants, he acknowledged, but all potential newcomers have to undergo security screening to determine whether they are members of the Muslim Brotherhood, terrorist groups or had participated in war crimes.

"You can't have a policy to ban people from one country," he added.

Asked about the recognition of foreign credentials, Alexander said the government is being proactive in informing immigrants early in the immigration process about Canadian standards and what is necessary for them to qualify in Canada.

He pointed out that Canada is most in need of skilled trades, and he drew surprised looks when he pointed out that welders can easily earn $150,000, with top people in the field pulling down salaries of $500,000.

Next on the agenda for the synagogue's series is NDP leader Thomas Mulcair. No date has been set for his appearance.

Anti-Israel group sponsored talk in Calgary

Bernamoff said she and her group felt particularly alone when Israeli-American peace activist Miko Peled, who supports a one-state solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, made a stop at the University of Calgary during his Canada-wide campus speaking tour this past fall.

After learning of some of the statements Peled had made in his previous lectures, Bernamoff decided she had to do something.

"This is hate speech," she said. "The speaker said, 'Anybody who supports Israel is a terrorist, is a racist. You put feces in the drinking water of the Palestinians.' This is libel."

She had heard that the anti-Israel group sponsoring Peled's talk was inviting Calgary's large local native population to attend, arguing that Palestinians and Aboriginal people have many shared experiences with colonization and oppression.

That's when Bernamoff resolved to hand out pamphlets at the event.

She contacted the Calgary Jewish Federation to find out whether the federation would work with her and perhaps contribute funds to produce the pamphlets, but Judy Shapiro, the federation's associate executive director, declined.

Shapiro told Bernamoff the federation would not be confronting Peled directly, since Shapiro believes that handing out material at such events often leads to screaming matches and only serves to give publicity to the other side.

"We don't find it effective to challenge specific pro-Palestinian speakers," Shapiro told The CJN, explaining that it's better to focus advocacy efforts on working with faculty and administrators on campuses to develop an environment where a pro-Israel stance is the norm, and to engage informally with individual students at anti-Israel events who appear to be neutral on the Mideast conflict.

"I'm not going to fund ineffective advocacy," Shapiro said.

Bernamoff disagreed that her decision to pamphlet the event was ineffective and said her group's efforts didn't degenerate into a screaming match with the other side.

She said pro-Israel students needed to directly confront everyone who attended the lecture, in the hope that neutral students wouldn't be swayed by Peled's unbalanced perspective.

Bernamoff's group ended up producing its own materials with financial support from StandWithUs, a California-based pro-Israel advocacy organization that recently launched a Canadian arm.

The group doesn't have local campus affiliates, but does directly support students.

Meryle Kates, executive director of StandWithUs Canada, said her organization thought it was important to support Bernamoff's group.

"We really believe it's more important to show a pro-Israel stance year-round than to react to each speaker they bring," she said, but she added that StandWithUs is happy to support students and community members who want to distribute materials at anti-Israel events.

Even if students don't choose to do that, her group might simply monitor an event, as it did during Peled's Toronto stop.

Bernamoff is emphatic that her efforts were successful.

"We had students who said they came to learn about the topic, could sense it was biased and thanked us for sharing our view," she said.

"I know I had an impact."

Despite Bernamoff's enthusiasm, the non-confrontational approach prevails at campuses across the country.

For instance, many Toronto-area student unions have passed anti-Israel motions over the past year, and each time, the response on campus has been muted, while CIJA and groups such as Hillel of Greater Toronto have stressed that such resolutions are non-issues.

York University students drape Israeli flags to counter an anti-Israel rally in 2009.

Adir Krafman, Israel engagement coordinator for Hillel of Greater Toronto, argued that campus anti-Israel motions are unfortunate, but they don't represent the views of most students and are essentially symbolic votes without any tangible impact on universities or students.

Krafman said it's important to focus on proactive efforts, not reactive ones.

"The anti-Israel movement is not as appealing as it used to be. It's a dying movement," he said. "The more attention we give to it, it's giving it oxygen."

Shapiro agreed with these sentiments, arguing that while they may be unsettling for some students, annual Israeli Apartheid Week (IAW) activities on campuses across the country are limited in their effectiveness.

"My advice to the students is always that it's not about stopping other people and denying their freedom of speech, it's about presenting our argument in an effective way," she said.

"If there's a strong Israeli Apartheid Week, make sure you have a strong Israel Week," she added, referring to efforts on some campuses to counter IAW.

Krafman said anti-Israel events should be allowed on campuses, because universities are known as bastions of free speech. Banning groups or speakers isn't effective, he said, although pro-Israel students should mobilize if events become anti-Semitic.

Yet banning a group is exactly what Josh Morry was able to accomplish at the University of Manitoba last year. He was moved to act after seeing posters advertising Israeli Apartheid Week that depicted caricaturized Jews pointing bazookas at Palestinians.

Outraged, he decided to tackle the issue head-on.

"Students who go to class just need a 10-second snippet of something hateful in order to be convinced," Morry said. "I've seen it myself… It's not only dangerous, but I think it has convinced a number of students to have some bizarre opinions on Israel and Jews."

In April, as a representative of the University of Manitoba Students' Union (UMSU), he submitted an ultimately successful motion to prevent the campus group Students Against Israeli Apartheid from receiving UMSU funding and from using campus facilities.

Although he supports freedom of speech on campus, he said there are limits. He thinks campuses are similar to workplaces, where some conduct isn't tolerated.

Morry said the atmosphere at many universities is hostile to pro-Israel students.

"What we're dealing with on college campuses is a group of organized bullies who pick on us because of what we believe and who we are… If we don't take a stand and tell someone to make it stop – in my case I told UMSU council and they did [stop] – the bullying will only continue," he said.

Thinking of going away for school? Try Ottawa

Guest Voice

Arielle Ellis

"Ottawa? Who even goes to school in Ottawa? Are you really going to Ottawa?"

As a Jewish girl from Toronto, that's what I heard when I told friends I was venturing off to Canada's not-so-far-away capital city.

My younger brother is now finishing his final year of high school. When he has friends over for Shabbat dinner, my family is sure to prod them about their options.

"So, where are you thinking of going to school next year?" we ask.

"Oh, you know, Queen's, Western, McGill."

"Of course," I think to myself.

While there is nothing wrong with these very reputable institutions, I'm here to let you in on a secret: there are other choices.

Canada's beautiful capital holds the key to any Jewish girl's fantasy: ripe with opportunities to meet the Jewish boy of your dreams, make new friends, expand your horizons, get involved politically, and have your pick of some of the best internships.

We may not have the largest Jewish student body (yet), but it's definitely close knit.

Last September, I came to the University of Ottawa with incredibly low expectations. I was closed off socially, thinking, "I'm here strictly for my program, and whenever I'm bored, I'll go on the 1-1/2-hour journey to Queen's to visit my friends."

It never occurred to me that one year later, I would be the city-wide president of Hillel Ottawa.

My first week settling into this new environment, I found myself missing my fellow members of the tribe. My mom, who, naturally, subscribed to Hillel Ottawa's newsletter almost a full year before my arrival, informed me of Hillel's annual welcome back barbecue. And, as any good Jewish mother does, she insisted I go at least for a little bit and see what Hillel is all about.

I entered that barbecue as a reluctant first-year, expecting a socially awkward and uncomfortable evening of small talk.

I could not have been more wrong.

Seconds after my arrival, I had already been warmly greeted by multiple students who were genuinely happy to meet me. These other students actually welcomed me into their group of friends, and took me under their wings. It was uncanny how friendly and down to earth everyone was.

That was a turning point in my university experience. The friends I have made since then are genuine, warm and also diverse.

Now, I am incredibly proud to say I am the student leader of the organization that makes that possible. I know how Hillel shaped my social life here in Ottawa. At every event we have, be it at our Shabbat dinners, formals, Jews&Brews, Jews&Java, speed-dating, or any of the other events we put on throughout the year, I know there is always someone there in the same place as I was when I walked into my first Hillel barbecue, and we consistently put forth our best efforts in making everyone feel welcome.

You don't have to be religious to come to Hillel events. You just have to be open to new experiences and meeting new people.

That's the reason we have these events – to give each student the same chance I had to turn around their university experience.

Arielle Ellis is the city-wide president for Hillel Ottawa.

It's not the 'December dilemma'

Class Act
Daniel Held

Waiting for the train at a Singapore subway station, a young, smiling Asian woman asked if she could take a picture with our daughter. We weren't surprised – it must have been the 10th time someone asked to take a picture with our bubbly, blond-haired, blue-eyed two-year-old. In Singapore she was treated as a celebrity and approached like Mickey Mouse at Disney World. The woman took the picture, thanked us and walked away smiling as she reviewed the picture on her phone.

Travelling in Singapore was the first time I felt like a minority.

In Singapore, majority culture is a misnomer. Walking the downtown streets in mid-November, endless rows of stores and malls were already decked out for Christmas. Electronic reindeer and Santas adorned the shops. Christmas trees were decorated and holiday greetings were in neon lights. And yet few Singaporeans are Christian. Christmas shopping has become a universal norm.

Being a minority can at once be empowering and estranging.

At this time of year, we confront the "December dilemma:" How do we react to young Jewish children who envy their friends' celebration of Christmas? Often we say, "Christmas is for Christians. Chanukah is for Jews," and "Christmas is only one day, but Chanukah lasts eight nights!" But these arguments don't hold much water. No matter how much longer Chanukah may be (or how many more gifts a Jewish child may be entitled to), the celebration of Christmas permeates throughout the shopping season in ways Chanukah can't (and, perhaps, shouldn't).

In jest, my Facebook wall is filling with pictures of friends' children sitting in the laps of shopping mall Santas (often wearing a Chanukah shirt). We, and the media, have promoted Chanukah to be the Jewish minority's response to Christmas – a task at which it cannot succeed.

Saying Chanukah is for the Jews can only be part of the response. In order to shape a strong Jewish identity, we must invest in Chanukah and in Purim and in Passover and in Rosh Hashanah and in Sukkot and in Shabbat and in Israel and in tikkun olam and in all the other aspects of Judaism that shape our identity. Devoid of a strong, pre-existing sense of self, Chanukah cannot be an inoculation against the overwhelming presence of Christmas.

Similarly, Judaism cannot be a reaction to majority culture. We cannot light a chanukiyah because our neighbours are decorating their tree or give Chanukah presents because our neighbours have wrapped boxes sitting under the tree. Doing so undermines the meaning of our holiday and what sets us apart from majority culture.

My daughter is too young to understand why so many people bent down to take a picture with her. If anything, she enjoyed the attention of strangers and the opportunity to say "cheese." As she grows up as a Jew in Canada, however, the questions of minority identity will shift. She will ask about Christmas and parties on Friday nights. She will question going to shul and keeping kosher.

The "December dilemma" is a misnomer. While the Christmas carols playing in malls highlight the issue, forming a strong minority identity is a year-round challenge.

Is it good or bad to be stiff-necked?

From the Bimah
Rabbi Yael Splansky

Many times over our Torah describes the Jewish People as "am k'shei oref," a stiff-necked people. What does that mean?

Usually when a person has a stiff neck, it's through no fault of his own, and he's the one who suffers. Taken literally, "stiff-necked" could describe the Jewish People after an injury was inflicted upon them. However, most of our commentators throughout the ages understand "stiff-necked" to refer not to the body of the Jewish People, but its character. It's not a condition imposed upon us from the outside, but a circumstance of our own choosing. Our teachers are divided as to whether being stiff-necked is an ugly trait to be reviled or a sign of strength to be admired. Does it bring danger or protection? Is it a sign of arrogant irreverence or admirable faith and loyalty?

A Negative Trait: After the building of the Golden Calf, God refers to the people of Israel as "am k'shei oref." Despite the warnings and rebukes from Moses and the prophets who follow, this stiff-necked people proves to be susceptible to idolatry and too stubborn to change their ways. But Nachmanides suggests that "God is in the midst of the people because they are a stiff-necked." Throughout the years of wandering in the wilderness, the people of Israel were like a rebellious child, and like a loving and concerned parent, God drew even nearer to keep a watch on us.

Karen Minden, founding director of the Pine River Institute, helps parents better understand the risky behaviours of their teenagers. She teaches that rebelliousness is linked to immaturity, but when redirected, can lead to great inner strength. In his 19th-century commentary, Eitz Yosef, Rabbi Chanoch Zundel of Bialystok similarly concludes that God's tireless devotion to Israel during its teenage years of rebellion in the wilderness eventually paid off. The negative character trait became positive at Sinai. "Once the Israelites committed themselves to the Torah, they would stubbornly resist any attempts to turn them away from it." Once the covenant was struck, stiff necks kept us kept us from bowing down to false gods. At Sinai, fierce resistance turned to fierce loyalty.

Aging parents rejoice when they live to see their most rebellious child become their most attentive child. Jewish teachers laugh when they live to see the most rebellious student grow up to become a rabbi. A stubborn streak can become a rare and honourable mark of loyalty. "A stubborn people may be slow to acquire a faith, but once it has done so, it never relinquishes it" (Gersonides on Exodus 34:9).

An Admirable Trait: Rabbi Yitzchak Nissenbaum lived and died in the Warsaw Ghetto. He saw that the virtues of stubbornness far surpass its detriment. Rabbi Nissenbaum imagines Moses defending his people before God, saying: "True, they once built the Golden Calf, but now they are prepared to surrender their very souls for God and Torah. There will come a time when they will suffer torture, they will have to withstand severe trials, but because of their obstinacy, they will not relent" (Aaron Yaakov Greenberg, Itturei Torah).

One of life's secrets is knowing when to be tenacious in our convictions and when to bend. We see in everyday relationships how stubbornness leads to nothing but a pain in the neck. We are taught that to be a Jew means to constantly look to the right and the left, to consider every angle of possibility, to be flexible and adaptable to new realities. On the other hand, it can be argued that a loyal kind of obstinacy has been the secret of our survival throughout the millennia, and that to be a Jew means to "stick your neck out" for what you believe is right. As we prepare for the coming generations, let us "lift up our heads" (Psalm 24:9), look all around and as far out as we can see, then choose wisely.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish (mis)information quiz

Jewish & Digital
Mark Mietklewicz

Last week, we looked at how to spot rumours and hoaxes that are circulated (and re-circulated) on the Internet. Now it's time to play a little quiz. See if you can determine fact from fiction.

Rumours:

1. Around the time of the 2008 presidential campaign, a billboard outside a "Beth Sholom Synagogue" read "Happy New Year! Please vote for the [Yiddish term for a black person]."
2. YouTube has been removing videos posted by the Israel Defence Forces.
3. An Egyptian cleric once called for a boycott of Starbucks because he said its logo portrays Queen Esther.
4. Tom Green's MTV show was canceled after he taped a sketch in which he appeared at a bar mitzvah dressed as Adolf Hitler.
5. Sex expert Dr. Ruth Westheimer served as a sniper in Israel.
6. Steven Spielberg wrote to Mel Gibson taking him to task for his anti-Semitic remarks. "I am one Jew who doesn't accept your apology."
7. Continuing on the Gibson beat, Mel's daughter, Mary-Catherine Regina Gibson, converted to Judaism to marry Ezekiel Sharon, a devout Jewish record producer.
8. Students in Tennessee are collecting six million paper clips for a memorial to Jewish victims of the Holocaust.
9. Actress Natalie Portman made a $50-million donation to an Israeli hospital.
10. As a teenager, former U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell learned Yiddish while working at a Jewish-owned store in New York.

Truth:

1. False. The "photo" was created by a website that allows people to insert what looks like authentic-looking text into images. [http://bit.ly/jrumor18]
2. False. The IDF spokesperson continues to maintain a page on the video site. [http://bit.ly/jrumor11]
3. True. Most see the logo as a mermaid, but not Egyptian cleric Safwat Higazi, who called for a boycott of the chain. [http://bit.ly/jrumor12]
4. False. As the debunking website Snopes.com puts it, "The rumour isn't true, but people were apparently willing to believe it because it fit their image of Tom Green." [http://bit.ly/jrumor13]
5. True. In 1944, Westheimer, then Karola Ruth Siegel, 16, joined the Haganah as a lookout and sniper. "I could hit the target smack in the centre further away than anyone could believe… Even today I can load a Sten automatic rifle in a single minute, blindfolded." [http://bit.ly/jrumor14]
6. False. The letter is a fabrication and a forgery. [http://bit.ly/jrumor15]
7. False. Don't believe what looks like "news" especially if it's from humour sites like The Onion or in this case, The Daily Currant. [http://bit.ly/jrumor16]
8. True. The award-winning documentary Paper Clips tells the story of the students and their memorial to victims of the Holocaust. [http://bit.ly/jrumor17]
9. False. Portman once appeared at a ceremony in which Jerusalem's Hadassah hospital announced it had raised $50 million. Inaccurate and persistent rumours have tied her to the donation. [http://bit.ly/jrumor19]
10. True. Powell's family moved to a largely Jewish neighbourhood in the Bronx, where he picked up some Yiddish while working at Sickser's baby equipment store. Powell once admitted, "Well, yes, I do understand a bissel." [http://bit.ly/jrumor20]

So how did you do?

- 0-3 correct: you understand a bissel about hoaxes.
- 4-6 correct: rumour has it you're learning.
- 7-8 correct: you're an urban legend.
- 9-10 correct: email maven!

We must honour our sages

Sephardi Window
Rabbi Ilan Acoca

Probably the most popular story in the Talmud is the story of the modular oven (Baba Metzia 59b) whose parts were connected by sand so that it functioned as a unit, but whose parts remained somewhat independent of each other. The question before the sages was whether this should be considered a finished vessel and, therefore, subject to the rules of purity and impurity, or whether it was technically under construction and, therefore, not subject to these rules. The principle was that an unfinished vessel does not have the potential to become impure until it has reached its finished state.

The sages declare that it is indeed finished enough, while Rabbi Eliezer disagrees and says that it's not. At this point, the fireworks begin. Rabbi Eliezer has a number of parlour tricks that he invokes in order to prove that his opinion is correct. Streams are twisted around, carob trees jump several football fields, the walls of the beit midrash begin to collapse, and finally, a heavenly voice descends and announces: "The law always goes according to Rabbi Eliezer!"

None of these "proofs" impress his colleagues, not even the heavenly voice. Quoting from the Torah, they say, "It [the Torah] is not heaven," and "after the majority one must incline."

Later, one of the sages sees Elijah the Prophet in the marketplace and asks how the Holy One reacted to the seeming impudence of the sages, and Elijah replies, "God smiled and said, 'My children have defeated me! They have defeated me!'"

How is it possible for God to declare that His children defeated Him? What was God intending to teach us through this story?

God wanted to emphasize how important it is to have emunat chachamim, trust in our sages, and how we have to respect them.

The Talmud (Shabbat 23a) instructs us to light Chanukah candles and recite the blessing, "Who has sanctified us with His commandments and has commanded us to kindle the Chanukah light." The Talmud poses the following question: "But where in the Torah did God command us to light the Chanukah candles? The Talmud answers, "Rav Avya said from the verse 'You shall not deviate from the words that they [the rabbis] will tell you' (Deuteronomy 17:11), Rav Nechemiah said from the verse 'Ask your father and he will tell you, your elders and they will say to you'" (Deuteronomy 32:7).

This idea reminds me of my father, who passed away 19 years ago. He was someone who had such kavod for the Torah and chachamim. Whenever a chacham walked by, my father stood up in awe and trepidation. It didn't matter who the chacham was – my father had to show respect to the Torah by standing.

I often ask myself where my father and his generation got this respect from? I believe it's something they got from their childhoods. It's something they saw their parents do, and they continued with this magnificent tradition.

Let's all remember this teaching and continue living and perpetuating it into the next generation.

Obama vows to veto any new sanctions

Iran holds war games as nuclear talks resume

The Times of Israel

The Iranian Air Force was set to launch large-scale drills Dec. 20 as part of "annual exercises aimed at testing indigenous air defence systems, improving the units' combat readiness and displaying the country's military might and achievement," according to a report in Iran's semi-official Fars news agency.

The drills involve "different types of interceptor fighters, bomber fighters, transport aircraft and reconnaissance planes," the air force's deputy commander, Brig.-Gen. Alireza Barkhor, told Fars.

The exercises "seek to send a message of peace, friendship and security to the regional countries," he added.

Mohammad Javad Zarif [Wikimedia Commons]

The drills came just as expert-level representatives from Iran and the P5+1 world powers were expected to resume nuclear talks in Geneva on Dec. 20 for a second day of negotiations.

On Dec. 19, a bipartisan group of U.S. senators introduced new sanctions legislation that the Iranians warned could "kill" its interim nuclear agreement with the six world powers reached last month in the Swiss capital.

The bill, which came as talks over the implementation of the interim agreement resumed after a nearly week-long hiatus, would impose sanctions that will come into effect should Iran violate the interim deal or fail to reach a final agreement.

The Obama administration has campaigned heavily against such legislation, arguing that it would make a comprehensive deal with Tehran more difficult to achieve.

The White House vowed to veto the legislation if it passes. Speaking an hour after the senators announced the bipartisan Nuclear Weapon Free Iran Act, White House spokesperson Jay Carney slammed the legislation, describing it as potentially "damaging and destructive to the diplomatic effort."

Carney implied that lawmakers were out of step with American voters in proposing legislation, which he claimed "will undermine our efforts to reach a diplomatic solution and greatly increase the chances for military action.

"I think that there is overwhelming support in the country and in this congress for a diplomatic resolution to this conflict," Carney added.

Characterizing the legislation as "unnecessary," he said that "if it passed, the president would veto it."

Earlier on Dec. 19, days after the Iranian government withdrew from the expert-level talks over the recent nuclear deal in protest at continued U.S. punitive measures, the sides returned to the table in a bid to get talks back on track.

The negotiations, brokered by representatives of the United States, China, Britain, France, Russia and Germany, revolve around on-the-ground implementation of the guidelines established in the Nov. 24 interim agreement.

While the talks were scheduled for Dec. 19-20, Iranian Deputy Foreign Minister for Legal and International Affairs Abbas Araqchi told Fars that the meetings would continue two more days if necessary.

The Iranian officials last met with representatives from the six world powers on Dec. 12 in Vienna. However, following a decision by the U.S. government to blacklist 19 companies for evading Iranian sanctions, the Iranian delegation cut the meetings short and flew back to Iran a day before negotiations were set to end, stating that the U.S. move violated the interim agreement.

Days later, top Iranian officials reiterated their commitment to diplomacy.

"The process has been derailed, the process has not died," Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif told CBS News Dec. 15. "We are trying to put it back and to correct the path and continue the negotiations, because I believe there is a lot at stake for everybody."

Ali Akbar Velayati, a top adviser to Iranian Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, was also quoted last week as saying Iran is ready for a final agreement.

Under the interim agreement signed in Geneva last month, the world powers must ease sanctions against Iran while Iran is required to scale back its nuclear program over the course of six months. While the deal was heavily criticized by Israeli officials, the United States and the other world powers remain optimistic it will pave the way for a permanent agreement with the Iranian regime.

UN urged to remove Falk for genocide remark

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Canada has condemned remarks by UN envoy Richard Falk accusing Israel of genocide, and called on the UN Human Rights Council (HRC) to remove him as its special rapporteur for the Palestinian territories.

At the same time, UN Watch, a non-governmental organization based in Geneva, urged the United States to use its clout to remove Falk "and his unjust mandate" from the Human Rights Council.

"Canada completely rejects and condemns the appalling remarks made by Richard Falk... in which he accused Israel of 'genocidal' intentions," Foreign Affairs Minister John Baird said in a news release last week.

"Canada has previously called for Falk to be fired for his numerous outrageous and anti-Semitic statements, and these comments underscore once more the complete and total absurdity of his service as a UN special rapporteur," he said.

"Not only do these comments undermine the fundamental values of the United Nations, they also belittle the terrible genocides that have tragically taken place throughout history and around the world," Baird added.

David Sharma, Australia's ambassador to Israel tweeted: "Appalled by reported Richard Falk comments on Israel: disgraceful and not befitting a UN special rapporteur."

Falk, professor emeritus of international law at Princeton University, sparked the latest round of condemnations when he told Russia Today that Israel is, "in effect, nurturing a kind of criminal intention that is genocidal."

Falk has made other statements that landed him in hot water. Following the Boston Marathon terrorist attack, he was criticized for calling it blowback for U.S. policies and added: "As long as Tel Aviv has the compliant ear of the American political establishment, those who wish for peace and justice in the world should not rest easy."

Hillel Neuer

He has repeatedly compared Israel to Nazi Germany, leading to accusations he could not fairly carry out the duties as special rapporteur. And he has suggested that the United States was behind the 9/11 terrorist attacks.

Responding to Falk's latest excess, Hillel Neuer, executive-director of UN Watch, wrote to U.S. Ambassador Samantha Power, calling on her to condemn "Falk's odious warrant for terrorism" and to demand that the HRC remove him.

"The United States is the leader of the democratic faction, and if they don't take action on this, nothing will happen," he told The CJN. "Falk is answerable to the council."

Neuer said "there have been Jews throughout history who are anti-Semitic," responding to a tweet from the PLO's negotiating affairs division that questioned whether Falk, a Jew, could be anti-Semitic. "Falk uses his Judaism as a shield," Neuer said.

Neuer noted that a U.S. diplomatic cable revealed through Wikileaks cited Palestinian diplomat Imad Zuhairi as calling on Falk to resign over his continued references to Hamas in his reports and his use of the Holocaust to criticize Israel.

Neuer said Falk's comparison of Israel to Nazi Germany can be used to justify terrorist attacks. "I think the implications are clear. It is a modern warrant for terrorism," he said.

Neuer also criticized mainstream organizations for continuing to invite Falk to address audiences, despite his controversial public statements. "He spoke this week in Ulster, Northern Ireland, at the Transitional Justice Institute. It's despicable that they would invite him," he said.

Native American studies group backs boycott of Israel

JTA

WASHINGTON, D.C. — A Native American studies association is the third U.S. academic body this year to recommend its members boycott Israeli universities.

In a Dec. 15 announcement, the Native American and Indigenous Studies Association said it "encourages NAISA members to boycott Israeli academic institutions because they are imbricated with the Israeli state, and we wish to place pressure on that state to change its policies."

The statement urged "generous dialogue" on the issue and said the boycott is open to discussion at the group's national conference in May in Austin, Texas.

Like the American Studies Association, which announced its own boycott last week, the NAISA boycott doesn't target individuals and isn't binding on members.

The Asian American Studies Association approved a similar boycott last April.

Swedish county plans circumcision ban

JTA

STOCKHOLM — A county in Sweden is planning to ban non-medical circumcision of boys, its commissioner said.

Per-Ola Mattsson, commissioner of Blekinge County, said he would move ahead with plans to ban ritual circumcision by bringing the subject up in February with the county's health board, according to an article published Dec. 19 by the Sydöstran Daily.

Mattsson, who is also chairman of the Public Health Board of Blekinge, reportedly said he opposed the practice because minors "have no possibility to say no to the surgery and therefore the county should not perform these procedures."

Located in southern Sweden, Blekinge County has a population of about 150,000.

In Sweden, non-medical and medical circumcision may be performed only by licensed professionals, as per legislation passed in 2001.

Under the law, Jewish ritual circumcisers, or mohelim, in Sweden receive their licenses from the country's health board, but a nurse or doctor must still be present when they perform the procedure. Representatives of the country's Jewish community told JTA they're pleased with the arrangement, as it does not prevent them from performing the ritual.

In recent years, Scandinavian countries have seen an intensification of efforts to ban ritual circumcision by activists who say it violates children's rights and by anti-immigration nationalists who seek to limit the effect the Muslim presence is having on Swedish society.

In September, the rightist Sweden Democrats Party submitted a motion in parliament in favour of banning ritual circumcision.

In October, the children's ombudsmen of all Nordic countries – Finland, Iceland, Denmark, Sweden and Norway – released a joint declaration proposing a ban on circumcision.

Neo-Nazi party loses funding

JTA

ATHENS — The Greek parliament has voted to cut off state funding for the neo-Nazi, anti-Semitic Golden Dawn Party.

The move is part of an ongoing crackdown against the ultra-nationalist party, whose leaders have been arrested and charged with running a criminal organization. Party leader Nikolaos Michaloliakos has publicly denied the Holocaust, as have other members of the organization.

On Dec. 18, lawmakers voted to 241 to 26 to suspend state funding of $1.2 million, which the party had been eligible for after 18 members were elected to parliament last year.

As part of efforts to combat Golden Dawn, a new law was recently introduced that would bar funding for parties whose leaders are charged with involvement in a criminal organization or terrorism.

DEEPENING TIES: Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, right, and Chinese Foreign Minister Wang Yi spoke at a joint press conference in Jerusalem Dec. 18. Netanyahu called on the world to prevent Iran from producing nuclear weapons. China, a major buyer of Iranian oil, has been a staunch backer of Iran and has resisted heavier sanctions on Tehran. The press conference was the highlight of a visit aimed at deepening diplomatic and trade ties between the two countries.

Filmmaker documents time when Jews were welcome in Egypt

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

There's more than a little irony in the fact that a contemporary filmmaker who bears the name of the pharaoh who is believed to have presided over the biblical Exodus has made a documentary film lamenting the forced departure of Jews from Egypt in the 20th century.

Amir Ramses braved an attempted government ban to tell the story of the Egyptian Jewish community in the first half of the 20th century. His documentary, Jews of Egypt, runs counter to the prevailing "official" narrative in which Jews are seen as the country's enemies.

"I grew up in a society where, when you say the word 'Jewish,' it is always combined with 'Zionist' [or] 'Israeli' and of course as soon as you say these words, hatred appears," said Ramses.

Ramses recently told his story via Skype to Congregation Darchei Noam as the first part of its five lecture series on the history of Jews in Arab lands.

Contacted via email by The CJN, Ramses, 34, said Egyptian society since the 1970s has grown more "chauvinist and xenophobic" and "is trying to give a very narrow identification to what an 'Egyptian' is. I made this film to defend the diversity that Egyptian society once represented."

In the early part of the 20th century, Egypt was a cosmopolitan country in which "Muslims, Christians, Jews, atheists lived next to one another in full tolerance," he explained.

But that all began to change around the time Israel became an independent state.

According to the Justice for Jews in Arab Countries (JJAC), an advocacy group that calls for recognition of the fate of Middle Eastern Jews, in 1948 Egypt was home to 75,000 Jews. By 1958, that number had dwindled to 40,000 and in 1968 there were only 2,500 Jews in the country. Today, there are fewer than 100 Jews in the entire country.

Their forced departure parallels similar events across the Arab world, which saw the Jewish population in 10 countries plummet from 856,000 to fewer than 5,000.

Amir Ramses

Many Jews were forced out of Egypt following the 1956 joint Israeli, British and French attack in what is known as the Suez conflict. Jews were forced to sign a declaration that they would not return and "they're still banned from entering the country," even after the peace treaty with Israel, Ramses stated.

"I think ever since 1956, official media have been forcing a certain perspective of the Jews...Then of course came the radical religious movements in the 1970s who used the Palestinian-Israeli situation to get recognition from the Arab societies so they used a rather racist anti-Jewish speech, like the famous ex-president [Mohammed] Morsi's speech, which was a common Muslim Brotherhood declaration that the Jews are the descendants of monkeys and pigs and that we have to breastfeed our sons with their hatred."

Despite those prevailing attitudes, Ramses felt a fascination to Egyptian Jews who had made significant contributions to the country, in particular its arts scene. He admired singer Laila Mourad, musician Mounir Mourad, comedian Elias Moadab and left-wing political activist Youssef Darwish, a Karaite Jew who converted to Islam.

"I had the luck of being born in a secular family where there were no preconceived notions about the Jews, but the surrounding media and society had a different perspective. Let's say I was always struggling against the concept society was trying to impose, with what my family had put into me since childhood."

Prior to the documentary's release last year, "the ex-government tried to ban [it] after it got media attention...When it became famous and had a theatrical release they tried to ban the screening 24 hours before it came out, and we went to a media war where they finally had to let go and release it."

"I think the film was very well received in Egypt. Through our social media, we received thousands of messages that were really positive. And the big funeral of Carmen Weinstein, the ex-president of the Jewish community (she died in April at age 82), where hundreds of Egyptians wanted to come and be part of it was also very significant of the film's importance to me. It was then I realized that we really did something."

Tech firm provides web accessibility for disabled people

Paul Lungen
Staff Reporter

Gabriel Israel has had lots of experience bridging the differences between Canadian and Israeli business cultures.

As a longtime employee of Amdocs, a U.S.-based software company founded as an offshoot of an Israeli firm, he was thoroughly familiar with the way the company's DNA was infused with Israeli brashness and creativity. Having lived and worked in Canada for 12 years, he's come to understand the methodical and organized way tech business is done here.

In Vision2Mission, the local tech company he created, he's taken the mission of bridging gaps into a new direction – he's offering a solution to the difficulties faced by people with disabilities in accessing and employing computer technology.

The solution he provides was developed in Israel by User1st and, like many products that originate in startup nation, it has applicability everywhere.

"It provides website accessibility for people with disabilities," he said. "It puts a virtual veneer between the user and the computer."

The solutions are many and varied, depending on the disability being addressed. For some, who can't use the mouse, a single click can "change the entire interaction so you use the "tab" and "enter" keys to operate the entire computer."

Another is geared for people who are visually impaired. It employs screen readers to verbally describe everything on the screen. The solution can do this in such a way that "everything is in proper context," he added.

There is a solution for people who suffer from epilepsy, to eliminate screen flashes that might trigger an episode.

All the solutions comply with WCAG 2.0, international guidelines that set standards on accessibility issues, as well as with Ontario law, Israel said.

Israel donated the technology to the MukiBaum Accessibility Foundation, which in the autumn became its first user in Canada.

The User1st technology employed by Vision2Mission is an out-of-the-box solution that its competitors can't match. Other companies can make the interface easier for disabled and elderly people to use, he acknowledged, but to do this they provide web developer toolkits that entail rewriting code, a time-consuming and hence expensive proposition.

Vision2Mission provides a more inexpensive solution with "automatic mapping" in which the software "looks at the existing page and with one tool makes it accessible to the new user.

Gabriel Israel

"Users simply click a button and they are presented with the accessible website layer. Each end user has the ability to select his or her predefined profile of personal limitations. With the User1st cookie and a one-time download of a script, the user will receive the accessible version of the website each time it is accessed," Israel explained.

There are thousands, if not millions, of potential clients who need to make their websites more accessible. "Every single company that has a website is a potential client," he said, adding that Canada is one of 100 countries regulated by law to address accessibility.

Vision2Mission acts as a sort of broker, leveraging its relationships with Israeli tech firms to offer Canadian and international companies the technology.

"I create the business development, sales and contacts and overseas account management to make sure the contract is being properly managed according to an agreed schedule," Israel said.

Clients pay a licensing fee as well an annual maintenance charge, he added.

Vision2Mission also offers consulting services, working with management teams in small- to medium-sized businesses, "realizing their potential, changing their structure, processes, help them grow and achieve profitability," he said.

Making a go of his two-year-old company is a challenge, but "I like challenges. That's part of who I am," Israel said.

A countdown is ticking on his cellphone: 44 days to go toward his next big challenge, though it's not one connected to his work.

When the time runs down, Israel will begin his climb up Mount Kilimanjaro, Africa's tallest peak. It's an eight-day ascent and a two-day descent along Lemosho, the mountain's most scenic route.

Along the way, he'll be snapping photos and selling them to benefit the MukiBaum Accessibility Foundation.

'Frumspeak' can be a barrier to understanding

Views & Reviews
Martin Lockshin

Becoming Frum:
How Newcomers Learn the Language and Culture of Orthodox Judaism
Sarah Bunin Benor
Rutgers University Press

In this book, Sarah Bunin Benor explores the kind of English that you sometimes hear in Orthodox Jewish settings in North America. Some call it "Frumspeak," from the Yiddish word "frum" (religious).

Benor shows how, when speaking among themselves, religious Jews pepper their English with loan words from Hebrew, Aramaic and Yiddish. Even their English syntax can be influenced, as in the sentence "I live here already eight years." Standard English uses the present perfect tense ("I have lived here for eight years"), but Yiddish conveys the idea of the present perfect through a present tense verb plus the adverb shoyn ("already"). Thus the sentence in Yiddish is "Ikh voyn do shoyn akht yor." Even if they don't know Yiddish, some Frumspeakers use this syntax in their English.

I enjoyed some of the examples in this book and learned a few things about the English that I hear in some Orthodox settings. But I was not as impressed by the lengthy socio-linguistic analysis of religious Jews, both the newly observant, who learn Frumspeak as adults, and those born into religious families. Many population subgroups have their own unique way of speaking English. When doctors talk about medical issues or senators at my university discuss government initiatives on education, the in-group members use acronyms and jargon that exclude speakers of standard English.

That Jews develop their own version of "gentile" languages is not news. For the last 2,000 years, whenever Jews spoke German, Spanish, Arabic or French within their communities, they always "Hebraized" that vernacular language.

The real news is that most North American Jews speak and understand only standard English, since they have no direct or indirect influence of any Jewish language, and do not live or gather in Jewish enclaves where a patois like Frumspeak makes sense.

For rabbis and educators this situation presents a dilemma: do you speak in the special language of your in-group, thus bolstering group identity and pride, or do you take pains to speak English that is accessible to all, hoping that your message might interest even those outside the in-group? Conservative and "Open Orthodox" educators generally opt for the second model, even if they happily speak Frumspeak in an insular setting. Frumspeak can become a real liability when its speakers do not even realize they are excluding others.

Benor's book does not address this issue directly, but it got me thinking about whether religious Jews make Jewish observance accessible to the non-expert. We have a proliferation of user-friendly prayer books with English translations and detailed explanatory notes. But one publication that I consider essential for religious Jewish life, the luach, (calendar) has always been written in the most obscure Hebrew imaginable.

Every fall I dutifully buy a copy of the Ezras Torah luach, an inexpensive publication that gives detailed ritual instructions for each day of the Jewish year. The luach tells you the precise Torah reading for Purim morning; for home use, it tells you what Kiddush to say on the seventh night of Passover. I find the book indispensable. But very few people buy it, because the Hebrew is so inaccessible that only someone who has spent years in a yeshiva can understand it. Non-standard acronyms are on every page. How many Jews can decipher what vav-bet-lamed-tzade-gimel stands for? (Hint: it's the abbreviated name of a prayer recited toward the end of the weekday morning service.) Ezras Torah has started to publish an English version, but navigating that book also requires expert knowledge.

This year I discovered a luach that is accurate and still user friendly—Luah Hashanah 5774: A guide to prayers, readings, laws and customs for the synagogue and the home, by Rabbi Miles B. Cohen and Leslie Rubin. Rabbi Cohen is an accomplished scholar of Hebrew who has managed to rise above Frumspeak to produce this day-by-day guide to Jewish practice that can be followed by any reader of standard English. Leslie Rubin, his wife, contributes her significant professional editing skills, and the result is beautifully laid out with helpful coloured printing and drawings (even coloured pictures that show how to set up and light candles each night of Chanukah).

Published by the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism, the book is primarily aimed at a Conservative Jewish audience, providing page numbers for the Conservative movement's most commonly used prayer books. I did not find many significant liturgical differences between this luach and the old-fashioned one. The most significant difference was that the Cohen/Rubin luach recognizes that Israel Independence Day (Yom Ha'atzmaut) requires liturgical changes in the prayers while Ezras Torah treats it as just another weekday. The vast majority of modern Orthodox synagogues do observe Israel Independence Day, but they use the antiquated non-Zionist luach of Ezras Torah, and improvise when Yom Ha'atzmaut comes around.

Rubin and Rabbi Cohen have shown that it is possible to present the intricacies of religious Judaism, bolstering Jewish (and Zionist) knowledge, identity and pride, while writing a book that is esthetically pleasing and accessible. Their book serves as a fine example of how members of an in-group can issue a welcoming invitation to those who might consider joining.

Playing Annie is a dream role for local actor

Cara Stern
Staff Reporter

Jenny Weisz thought that at age 21 she was much too old to fulfil her dream of playing little orphan Annie.

So she was thrilled when she found out her first job after graduating from theatre school would be to play that role in a Young People's Theatre version that uses adult performers in all of the roles.

"I didn't believe it when my agent called and called me 'Annie,'" she said. "I freaked out.

"I was always drawn to her spunk and her adventurous creativity and, of course, her optimism," the Thornhill, Ont., native said. "We all can relate to a character like this who sits at home and dreams and wishes and hopes for those things she wants to come true."

Not only was the character one of her dreams – so was the venue. Weisz recalled seeing shows every year at the Young People's Theatre, and she dreamed of working there.

"It had a huge influence on what I do, and it inspired me to do what I love," she said, adding that she thought performing there would be a goal she would have to work toward over many years.

The performance, which runs until Dec. 29 at the Young People's Theatre, has updated the show about an 11-year-old orphan who escapes an orphanage hoping to find her biological parents, to match a more modern, urban audience. Artistic director Allen MacInnis told the Toronto Star he wanted to inject more depth into the characters and the story.

"What really got me thinking was that I discovered there used to be an orphanage on Front Street right opposite the theatre, and knowing that the real presence was so close got me thinking about putting more reality into the show," he told the Star.

Weisz said the fact that the performers are all trained actors rather than little kids allows them to explore that depth a bit more and bring more life to what can sometimes be seen as a two-dimensional script.

"It raised the stakes, seeing as we're all capable of going into the deeper places, really following your dreams and sticking up for what you believe in," she said.

After each show, there's a question and answer period, and kids are frequently shocked to find out she's not 11 years old, she said, attributing it partly to her looks – she said people often think she's in high school or early university – but also to the show's direction and the children's belief in the story.

She said it's been a great experience working at the theatre, doing the show with two-time Juno Award nominee Sterling Jarvis and Tony Award-nominated actor Louise Pitre, who Weisz said has given her lots of advice, as well as a recent pep talk.

"She was very confident in telling me I have a future [in theatre], I'm professional and deserve to be where I am," she said, "Hearing it from someone like her was astounding."

Although she doesn't know what's next for her, Weisz said she's hoping this gig will pave the way to many more musical theatre shows in the future.

TECHNION - ISRAEL INSTITUTE OF TECHNOLOGY

Dr. Lior Gepstein – "What is new and exciting about our research is that we have shown that it's possible to take skin cells from an elderly patient with advanced heart failure and end up with his own beating cells in a laboratory dish that are healthy and young – the equivalent to the stage of his heart cells when he was just born."

STEM CELL RESEARCH AT THE TECHNION

For the first time, scientists have succeeded in taking skin cells from heart failure patients and reprogramming them to transform into healthy, new heart muscle cells that are capable of integrating with existing heart tissue. Dr. Lior Gepstein, together with Prof. Itskovitz-Eldor and Dr. Michal Amit, has coaxed embryonic stem cells to develop into heart cells and subsequently into beating heart muscle.

Possible cures—once the stuff of science fiction—may be on the horizon thanks to stem-cell research.

The Technion has been at the forefront of embryonic stem cell research. Today, it is one of a select group of academic institutes and companies worldwide—and the only one in Israel—approved by the National Institute of Health for US federally funded stem cell research.

And there are many more breakthroughs at the Technion. As one of the world's leading universities in science, technology and medicine, the Technion is the major source of innovation that drives Israel's economy and contributes to the health and well-being of people around the world.

FOUR NEW EXHIBITS OPEN AT ISRAEL MUSEUM

Earlier this month, the Israel Museum in Jerusalem launched four exhibitions that spotlight a roster of internationally acclaimed and emerging artists from Israel.

Collecting Dust in Contemporary Israeli Art examines the work of 15 artists active in the fields of painting, photography, installation and video, who transform dust into contemporary works of art exploring temporality, memory and Israel's environmental landscape. (This show somehow seems appropriate coming from the land that gave the world that memorable phrase "from dust to dust.")

A retrospective of the works of Israeli artist Gideon Gechtman (1942-2008) explores how art can act as a posthumous memorial. After undergoing open-heart surgery at 31, Gechtman began an intense exploration of issues relating to illness, mortality, bereavement and memory; his artistic output stands as a personal mausoleum, designed to preserve his work and self after his death.

A solo exhibition by Mika Rottenberg consists of six video works that examine the role of women in society and the repercussions of an increasingly digital world. Rottenberg creates strange assembly lines in which actresses become part of an absurd manufacturing process that produces a variety of nameless products using substances such as sweat, hair and cosmetic powder.

The Israel Museum is also presenting Out of Body: Fragmentation in Art, an exhibition that focuses on works that were created as distinct parts of the human body, from ancient Egyptian amulets to contemporary works by Israeli artists. All four exhibitions remain on view until April 5, 2014.

Travelling deep in cotton country

Nancy Wigston
Special to The CJN

When movie locations were being scouted for The Help, Greenwood, Miss., was the obvious choice.

"Greenwood still looks like it did in 1963," says guide Paige Hunt, "whereas Jackson – where the book takes place –has changed. That's Skeeter's place [the writer played by actor Emma Stone]," Hunt announces, pointing out a white-columned house familiar to the fans of the smash-hit film.

We're deep in cotton country, in the heart of the Mississippi Delta, and by no coincidence, the place where American blues was born. The maids in the film lived over in Baptist Town, an 1848 African-American community, where houses are less than palatial. During the days of segregation, the bosses summoned residents to the cotton fields, where the working day lasted from "cain to cain't" (from the time when you can see the sun, until the time that you can't).

"That's terrible," a woman from Saskatchewan says when told that children regularly "hid out" when the bosses came.

"But that's what made the blues," responds our guide, Sylvester Hoover. "A fifth of the world's cotton was traded out of Greenwood," continues Hoover, who remembers working beside his mother as a three-year-old. Cotton is still big in these parts – its straight rows surprisingly lovely – but machines do the picking these days.

When he's not running his corner store, Hoover guides tourists on the seven-year-old Mississippi Blues Trail, where markers fill in history about musicians and the places they made famous. Local legends include bluesmen Robert Johnson, Sonnyboy Williamson, Furry Lewis and Pinetop Perkins.

A natural showman, Hoover spins riveting tales about Jim Crow days while showing us around a room-sized museum, a jumble of everything from the long bags used to collect cotton – he dons one for photographers – to a painting of Robert F. Kennedy. The Kennedys are revered by African-Americans in the South. In 1967, RFK visited these parts, shocked by the conditions he saw, and very sympathetic to change.

Today the Delta welcomes a steady stream of visitors who come for the music – with Oscar-winning movie locations as an added bonus. After Hoover shows us the "authentic" grave of Robert Johnson –there are three in total, so vast is the man's legend – we return to town, crossing the Tallahatchie Bridge, the one made famous by Bobbie Gentry, a local girl who sang about a boy named Billy Joe McAllister and his mysterious fate.

The trail attracts an international group, including visitors from England, Holland and Scandinavia, music fans who cross oceans to see the places where their heroes played, the many men and women first inspired by the call-and-response singing of their ancestors toiling in the fields.

The town of Clarksdale is close to the "crossroads" where Highway 49 meets Highway 61. Its near-mythic status is owed to young bluesman Robert Johnson, who wrote and recorded a 1936 song about standing here, hoping in vain for a ride, a song that was covered 30 years after his demise by bands including British super-rockers Cream. Somnolent Clarksdale is also home to the actor Morgan Freeman, who owns Ground Zero, a "juke joint" across the street from the Delta Blues Museum.

Jimmy "Duck" Holmes plays Good Morning Blues in the Blue Front Café in Bentonia, Miss.

At our first stop, in Bentonia, Miss., we pulled up at the Blue Front Café, founded in 1948 by the parents of the genial man seated on the porch. This man turned out to be famous blues guitarist Jimmy "Duck" Holmes. As the morning light streamed in through the window, Holmes casually pulled up a chair and sang Good Morning Blues for his northern visitors. "This is Bentonia-style blues," he explained, a form unique to the area. Last month, Holmes performed in Norway, his second trip there this year.

For some, Delta music becomes a life-defining passion, like the Dutch musician nicknamed "the boogie-woogie man," who runs a private Rock and Blues museum chock-full of all sorts of memorabilia, in downtown Clarksdale. The guest book at the more official-looking Delta Blues Museum records names from Australia to Wales. In the sunny street outside the museum, a tough-looking but friendly group of Louisiana motorcyclists pose for pictures outside Ground Zero, where Morgan Freeman's bodyguard works when the star isn't in town.

Among the biggest names to emerge from this part of the world is Elvis Presley, who began his career as a crossover artist recording blues and gospel numbers as well as a new thing called rock 'n' roll. A poor boy who spent his first 13 years in Tupelo, Miss., Elvis saw the two-room house where he was born repossessed, his sharecropper father sent to jail (for changing the amount on a cheque from $4 to $14), and his mother's successful petition to reduce her husband's sentence from three years to eight months. In 1948, the family moved to Memphis, hoping for a fresh start.

All this and more can be gleaned at the splendid Elvis Presley Birthplace in Tupelo, run by the State of Mississippi. The state moved the original Presley house here, as well as the chapel that Elvis attended as a child. Fans of the Coen brothers' O Brother Where Art Thou? will recognize the music that influenced Elvis as a child. At the other extreme, a flat-screen TV in the Ladies' Room shows late-period Elvis performing live in Las Vegas.

A statue of the 13-year-old Presley highlights the grounds, and the main building features Elvis memorabilia as well as an auditorium for live performances. Downtown, the hardware store where Mrs. Presley bought her 10-year-old son his first guitar – he had wanted a gun but changed his mind – is still in business.

On spotting a young European visitor sporting the Elvis look, I'm reminded of the terrific 2002 documentary, Schmelvis, featuring an Orthodox Elvis impersonator from Montreal, a rabbi and a doggedly funny investigative team on the trail of the King's maternal Jewish roots. They discover warmth rather than prejudice in Elvis fans, rather like the lively inclusiveness we find in Tupelo.

In the words of Mississippi-born blues artist Muddy Waters: "The blues had a baby and they called it rock and roll." And there's nowhere better to visit that baby's birthplace than the Mississippi Delta.

Award-winning poet struggles with rare disorder

Jacob Scheier

Sheri Shefa
Staff Reporter

Being the youngest Governor General's Literary Award winner for poetry is an impressive feat in and of itself. But having written the award-winning poetry collection shortly after suffering a mental breakdown and being diagnosed with a rare disorder is that much more impressive.

Jacob Scheier was 28 when he published More to Keep Us Warm in 2008, a collection that explores themes including love, loss and religion and was inspired by the death of his late mother Libby Scheier, a Toronto poet, who died in 2000.

Just three years before getting the literary award, Scheier found himself in a psych ward struggling with a rare psychiatric disorder called hallucinogen persisting perception disorder, or HPPD – a condition that nearly caused him to kill himself. It was the start of an ongoing journey that he chronicled in his latest project, a Toronto Star ebook titled My Never-Ending Acid Trip: Why I still hallucinate years after taking LSD.

"When I was a teenager I did a lot of hallucinogenic drugs, especially a lot of LSD… it was a recreational thing," he said in an interview with The CJN.

In his ebook, he wrote about his eight-hour trips, how the acid "made my thoughts more interesting, reality more layered and colourful… As interesting an experience as it is, eight hours is about all people can handle. This is because there is one thought people tend to have on acid that can send them spiralling into a bad trip: what if I never come down? Everyone has heard the urban legend about the kid who never stopped tripping. I'm that kid."

Scheier explained that in 2005, he was diagnosed with clinical depression, and as a result he also suffered from anxiety, for which he was given a small dose of an antipsychotic medication along with his antidepressant.

He said within a few days of taking his medical cocktail, "I began to have hallucinatory experiences quite reminiscent of being on LSD…"

He began to see green lines, facial distortions, trails and afterimages.

"Clinically speaking, I have been on a ceaseless visual acid flashback for eight years, brought on (according to several psychiatrists) by hallucinogen use in combination with little-known side effects from one or more commonly prescribed psychiatric medications," he wrote.

Scheier said that his condition, HPPD, is very rare, "and in my case, it was a rarity within a rarity because I did all that LSD and I stopped when I was 18 or 19, and I didn't have flashbacks, or have any visual oddities… Fast forward eight years later and I take this medication and it triggers it."

He said he managed to reduce the severity of the symptoms with one of the drugs he was prescribed for his anxiety, but it didn't completely alleviate the symptoms.

"I would sort of be tripping, you could say… I was having very severe and constant visual disturbances… As the [ebook] chronicles, I had a total mental breakdown. I was in a psych ward, it was a total nightmare," he said adding that at his lowest point, he nearly killed himself.

"I didn't know what was wrong with me for a long time, it took a long time to get that diagnosis. I thought I was schizophrenic or something. It took me about a year of acceptance and then a year of getting back to normal life."

Although HPPD appears to be a chronic illness, Scheier said the symptoms have alleviated over time.

"But I still have mild visual disturbances. I still see trails when objects pass me… all the time. I'm acclimatized to it," he said.

"I don't think too much about it. But when I decided to write about it, I started to notice the visual disturbances all the time again, because it set off an attention mechanism and so it's like, the more you think about it, the more you see it."

He says based on his experiences and own research, he describes himself as being quite critical of psychiatry.

"I think the profession that people usually turn to, to help them is not as informed as they present themselves to be about what may be going on in the brain… and they are equally as unsure about how the medications they prescribe work and they don't know what to do when they don't work in the way they're supposed to," Scheier said.

"I think [psychiatry is] founded on the best of intentions but I don't think it's very honest with people about its limitations… People should be informed about what they're taking and why."

He said psychiatrists present drugs for mental illnesses "as though SSRIs [selective serotonin re-uptake inhibitors] were the equivalent of insulin for diabetes and that is just false. That is a mythology and they shouldn't propagate that mythology. They should say, 'This drug might make you feel better. I don't really know how it works, I don't really know what's going on in your brain, but you might want to take this.'"

Scheier added that as someone who does still take psychotropic medication to treat his symptoms, he also goes to therapy and exercises, in an attempt to find an alternative treatment to drugs.

"I wouldn't tell anyone that they shouldn't be on medication. I definitely think people should be given the correct information… and people should do what works for them."

He said he hopes his ebook, which is available for download for $2.99 at stardispatches.com/starstore, will stimulate discussion about medication.

"It brings up important questions and I hope people will read it."

How to make a kosher dinner for 4,000

Kosher Living
Richard Rabkin

The Jewish National Fund's Negev dinner honouring Prime Minister Stephen Harper has rightfully received much attention. But what has received less attention are the details of the dinner itself, and specifically of interest for us, how does one go about providing kosher supervision for what was reported to be the largest kosher dinner in Canadian history?

To sum it up in one word: preparation.

More than a year ago, Rabbi Tsvi Heber, director of community kosher at COR-Kashruth Council of Canada received a phone call from the talented folks at PR Creative Caterers informing him that at the end of 2013, they would be catering a function for approximately 4,000 people at the Metro Toronto Convention Centre (MTCC). We knew that this would require a herculean effort and, therefore, needed to begin planning immediately – a year in advance.

A meeting was set up at the MTCC between PR, COR and the MTCC staff. Many of the MTCC staff didn't even know what kosher was, so Rabbi Heber gave a "Kosher 101" seminar explaining the basics. Can you imagine – these people have never had a good piece of brisket? So sad.

Three months before the event, Rabbi Heber, COR senior mashgiach Rabbi Mendel Brogna and COR event specialist Moshe Meyer Mrvic had another meeting with the PR and MTCC staff to map out the entire event from a kosher perspective, including what the menu would be, how many cooking utensils would need koshering and how many mashgichim would be required. At that meeting, they also met with representatives from Exclusive Affair Rentals. Remember, it's not just the food that needs to be kosher – dishes do as well. Event venues don't have a stock of kosher dishes on hand, so the MTCC needed to rent kosher dishes. In fact, due to the sheer magnitude of this event, Exclusive themselves didn't have enough kosher dishes in inventory, so it needed to purchase additional stock. It's not every day that you have an event for 4,000 people.

During the week prior to the event, Rabbi Mendel Brogna set up shop at the MTCC. He had to be organized, so he put together a koshering schedule (koshering can be done in most cases through boiling water or a direct flame). In total, he koshered approximately 20 ovens, 50 table tops, 70 warming boxes, 50 Queen Mary banquet serving carts and 4,000 plate covers. He also had to supervise five mashgichim, 244 chefs and kitchen staff, and 415 waiters and bartenders. Rabbi Brogna's koshering schedule was so tight that he had to book a hotel downtown to stay for Shabbat so he could be at the MTCC koshering until candlelighting, and start up again as soon as Shabbat ended. Someone give that rabbi a raise!

The majority of the (spectacular) food was prepared in PR's kitchen at their head office prior to the event under the supervision of their working mashgiach – someone who is responsible for their kosher program, but also helps in the operations of the business. When the food left PR's premises, it was placed on their trucks and sealed with special COR seals that can only be opened by the mashgiach at the venue – in this case, the MTCC.

On the evening of the event, the six COR mashgichim were placed strategically throughout the venue. Now, there was a room designated for "VVVIPs." Yes, that's three Vs. We weren't sure exactly what that meant, but decided they deserved a very very very important mashgiach, so Rabbi Heber "volunteered."

As he was supervising in the "VVVIP room," Rabbi Heber bumped into – you guessed it – Harper himself. Rabbi Heber introduced himself as a rabbi from the Kashruth Council of Canada, and the prime minister responded that he knew about kosher food. Rabbi Heber asked if he could have the honour of giving the prime minister a brachah, and the prime minister agreed. Rabbi Heber proceeded to give Harper a lengthy blessing, that he should have the strength to continue his steadfast leadership of our country and support for the Jewish People around the world.

Perhaps a small offshoot of Harper's support for the cause of the Jewish People will be a strengthening of the cause of keeping kosher. Who knows? Maybe in the future, kosher dinners for 4,000 people will become a regular affair in Canada.

TV host travels the world celebrating wine and food

Susan Minuk
Special to The CJN

Toronto wine lover Jody Ness is passionate about great food and wine experiences. A longtime restaurateur and wine collector, he represents a new generation of wine lovers with his TV series Wine Portfolio.

Now entering its third season, Wine Portfolio celebrates luxury travel, unique experiences and expressions of culture.

"We started putting together the idea for Wine Portfolio in 2008 and began filming in 2009," said Ness, who serves as host and executive producer of the program.

The series' aim is to showcase wine-producing regions and places of world-class food and wine consumption such as exclusive restaurants and luxury hotels, as well as presenting first-class travel opportunities.

"I can honestly say I got into this business because I lost a bet," Ness told The CJN. "My business partner, Kevin Fox, has a company called ReSource Media, and was asked to do a show about wine. Not knowing where to go with that, he came to me with the thought that the show would encompass wine, food and travel. His first approach to me was, 'Would you consult on a project?' I declined, as my plate was full.

"His second attempt was, 'Would you like to host the show?' Again, I said no. I like building companies and doing projects from behind the scenes as an entrepreneur.

"Finally: 'How would you like to be partners in an entrepreneurial business and we can build this up together with your wine expertise and my filming expertise?' That sparked my interest.

"However, Kevin had one catch: he insisted I host the show. So the bet was on. I told him if he could give me one good business reason that I couldn't refuse as to why I had to be the host, then I would be the host.

"After a beat, he said, 'Jody, if it is your face around the world that people see, then when you make your business call you will receive a more immediate response. As a known person, you will be heard.'

"With a smile, I responded, 'Looks like you found your host.'"

Wine Portfolio is viewed in 40 countries globally, reaching 300 million households. Produced in high definition on location around the world, the program is designed to inspire global audiences to eat, drink, travel and enjoy the best the world has to offer.

"We will never do a show about a country when we are not in that country. We have travelled to at least 20 countries, often visiting more than once. For example, you can travel to Italy 20 times and film in different locations.

Wine Portfolio films 13 episodes a year. "It's fair to say we are in at least 13 countries a year," Ness said.

Social media are the bonding that let people have the ability to be part of what you're doing as you are doing it in real time, he said.

"We're out on the road and will tweet, use Facebook. Wine Portfolio has a Twitter following of 80,000, and, in real time we get a fair number of responses. Followers even suggest places for us to check out. Depending on our schedule, we might shoot a piece and take photos and re-tweet back [about] a great winery or restaurant. It's an interactive point of view that social active media brings to the table," he explained.

"I taste at least 50 different wines every single week, year in and year out. That's over 2,500 wines a year.

"Every place we travel, we post several videos of what that show would be like on our website."

Discussions are now being held about doing a Wine Portfolio show in Israel.

Kids Can Cook

Sue Epstein
Special to The CJN

Children can begin helping in the kitchen at the age of five or six, starting with simple things like stirring and mashing. They can go on to work with simple tools, bake, and eventually, cook on the stove top. If you've ever seen the TV show Master Chef Junior, you know what they're capable of!

I have a friend who has seven children ranging in age from seven to 23. She starts them off early with simple things like scrubbing the potatoes and peeling hard-boiled eggs. As they get older, their jobs become more challenging, according to their abilities. They play music in the kitchen while they are working and sing along to it. The children think helping in the kitchen is fun, not a chore, and that washing dishes is a privilege (it's all in how you present it). By the time her children reach their teens, they're accomplished cooks who enjoy what they're doing.

The main rule to remember when kids are in the kitchen is to keep it simple. Be realistic about children's abilities. Don't let a five- or six-year-old use a food processor. To save arguments, before you start cooking or baking, define which steps you'll do and which ones they'll do.

Only put out the ingredients called for. Children can get carried away, and if a recipe calls for one cup of chocolate chips, they'll think three cups would be even better. Remember that what seems obvious to an adult isn't to a child who's new in the kitchen.

Buy your child his/her own cookbook and help him/her make the recipes from it. There are some wonderful cookbooks designed for children.

As they mature, children can begin to work with small electric appliances, as long as they are supervised. If you have a bread machine, they'll love experimenting with different breads and feel a great sense of pride in showing off the finished product. Teach them a variety of cooking skills and techniques. They can learn how to make salads, main courses and desserts, as well as snacks. Your children will not only learn to enjoy cooking, but it will take some of the burden of preparation off of you.

Allow time for mishaps and don't get upset about them. Spills are easy to clean up, and mistakes can often be rectified. Keep the atmosphere light and hold onto your sense of humour – otherwise it won't be fun for anyone. And keep in mind that these will be tomorrow's memories for your children.

Passing on your family's favourite recipes or customs is a wonderful gift to your children, one they'll treasure long after they're grown and have left the nest.

Children not only love to cook, but take a great deal of pride in what they produce in the kitchen. Here is a simple recipe to get your children started in the kitchen.

PIZZA PINWHEELS

1 flour tortilla
1/3 cup shredded cheese
pizza sauce

Place flour tortilla onto a microwave-safe plate. Sprinkle with shredded cheese. You can top it with sliced mushrooms or other favourites. Heat on high for 20 seconds or until the cheese melts. Carefully roll up tortilla. Cut into pieces and serve with pizza sauce for dipping.
